Having thus got the necessary approval, Mr Holroyd, in 1959, started work on plot 28. He dug the trenches for the foundations. When he got down about two feet, he came upon the remains of the old rubbish tip, broken glass, tins and black slimy sludge. So he made the outer trench 3 ft 6 ins deep, which is much deeper than usual; and he reinforced the concrete floor with a steel mesh. But he did not bother much about the inner walls. He notified the council that the trenches were ready for inspection. The council sent a building inspector, Mr Griffiths, to inspect them. He came, and passed them. Mr Holroyd then filled in the trenches with concrete and built up to damp-course level. The council's surveyor came, and passed the work at that stage too. The house was finished towards the end of 1959.

Early in 1960 Mr Holroyd, the builder, sold the house to a Mr Clark. He was in it only for a few months. Then, in December 1960, he put the house up for sale again. Mrs Dutton went to see it. She liked it. She noticed a crack on the wall of the stairs. The agents told her: 'It's nothing. It's settlement. It's a new house, and you always have settlement.' She did not herself employ a surveyor, because it was a new house. But, to buy it, she borrowed money from a building society and their surveyor passed it. She signed the contract on 19th December 1960. She moved in on 11th January 1961. The deed of conveyance was dated 20th January 1961.

Soon afterwards, when Mrs Dutton had only been in a month or two, she became alarmed. The walls and ceiling cracked, the staircase slipped, the doors and windows would not close. She called in a surveyor, Mr Southall. In September 1961 he diagnosed the trouble. It was due to the subsidence of an internal wall. This a was because that wall had inadequate foundations. The conditions got worse. Mrs Dutton had not much money. She could not afford to put it right. It would cost £2,000, even in 1962, plus surveyor's fees of £240. So it got worse and worse. In 1963 she went to solicitors. They called in an expert surveyor—Mr Carpenter. He had trial holes dug. He found out that the house had been built on a rubbish tip. He said that, at the time when the house was built, this could have been easily seen.

b On 28th February 1964 Mrs Dutton issued a writ against the builder, Mr Holroyd, and the Bognor Regis Urban District Council. Her total damage was £2,740 (being as to £2,240 for cost of repair and £500 diminution in value). The builder, by his insurance company, claimed that he was exempted entirely from liability by the decision of *Bottomley v Bannister*¹ and *Otto v Bolton & Norris*². On that account Mrs Dutton settled the claim against the builder for £625. But Mrs Dutton went on c against the Bognor Regis Urban District Council. She alleged that their building inspector was negligent in passing the foundations. The council did not call any evidence to deny this. Their building inspector had left and gone to Australia. The judge³ found that the council's inspector was negligent. He said⁴:

d 'I find that it should have been detected. The strength of the foundation should be related to the nature of the ground. The distinction between building a house on rock and building a house on sand has been widely known for many centuries.'

The judge gave judgment in favour of Mrs Dutton for £2,115 (being the full sum of £2,740, less £625 recovered against the builder). The council appeal to this court.

e Never before has an action of this kind been brought before our courts. Nor, so far as we can discover, before the courts of any other countries which follow the common law. It raises issues of far-reaching importance. In these days much work is subject to inspection to see that it is done properly. The inspector is usually the servant of a public authority. If the inspector negligently passes bad work, is the inspector liable himself? And also the authority which employs him? We have been treated to a wide-ranging argument well presented on both sides. Many f points have been canvassed. In the end it will be found to be a question of policy which we, as judges, have to decide. But, before we come to it, I must deal with several preliminaries.

2. Building byelaws and regulations

g At the time when this house was built, the work was subject to the Public Health Act 1936 and the byelaws made under it by the Bognor Regis council. The byelaws were in standard form and could not be relaxed except with the consent of the Minister. Byelaw 18 dealt expressly with foundations. It said:

h '(1) The foundations of every building shall be—(a) so designed and constructed as to sustain [the loads of the building] and to transmit these loads to the ground in such a manner that the pressure on the ground shall not cause such settlement as may impair the stability of the building, or of any part of the building . . .'

It is plain that the builder in this case failed to comply with that byelaw. He did not construct the foundations properly. They were not strong enough to take the load of the house. Byelaw 6 required the builder to furnish the council—

j 'with not less than twenty-four hours' notice in writing . . . before the covering up of any drain, private sewer, concrete or other material laid over a site, foundation or damp-proof course . . .'

1 [1932] 1 KB 458

2 [1936] 1 All ER 960, [1936] 2 KB 46

3 [1971] 2 All ER 1003

4 [1971] 2 All ER at 1006

We may, I think, assume that the builder in this case duly gave notice to the council. The council's inspector came and inspected the work, but did it so negligently that he passed the bad work. Byelaw 112 enacted that any person offending against any of the byelaws should be liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding £5.

Since 1965, building work has been subject to building regulations made by the Minister under s 4 of the Public Health Act 1961; and he alone can relax them: see s 6 (1). These regulations are much the same as the standard byelaws previously in force. But they are more specific. They require not less than 24 hours' notice in writing before the covering-up of any excavation for a foundation, any foundation or any concrete or other material laid over a site.

3. Power or duty

Much discussion took place before us whether the council were under a duty to examine the foundations or had only a power to do so. The Public Health Acts do not make this clear. The 1936 Act simply says that it is the duty of the local authority to carry the Act into execution (see s 1 (1)). The 1961 Act says that it is the function of every local authority to enforce building regulations in their district. The word 'function' may mean either a power or a duty.

The reason for this discussion was the case of *East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board v Kent*⁵. The argument was that if the local authority had a mere power to examine the foundations, they were not liable for not exercising that power. But, if they were under a duty to do so, they would be liable for not doing it. This argument assumes that the functions of a local authority can be divided into two categories, powers and duties. Every function must be put into one or other category. It is either a power or a duty. This is, however, a mistake. There is a middle term. It is control.

In this case the significant thing, to my mind, is that the legislature gives the local authority a great deal of control over building work and the way it is done. They make byelaws governing every stage of the work. They require plans to be submitted to them for approval. They appoint surveyors and inspectors to visit the work and see if the byelaws are being complied with. In case of any contravention of the byelaws, they can compel the owner to remove the offending work and make it comply with the byelaws. They can also take proceedings for a fine.

In my opinion, the control thus entrusted to the local authority is so extensive that it carries with it a duty. It puts on the council the responsibility of exercising that control properly and with reasonable care. The common law has always held that a right of control over the doing of work carries with it a degree of responsibility in respect of the work. Such has long been the case where an employer has the right to control the way in which an independent contractor does his work: see Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v Coggins & Griffiths (Liverpool) Ltd and *McFarlane*⁶. It is also the case when an owner or a local authority exercises control over property for the purpose of doing repairs: see *Mint v Good*⁷, *Greene v Chelsea Borough Council*⁸ and *Brew Bros Ltd v Snax (Ross) Ltd*⁹; or over a grating in a highway: see *Macfarlane v Gwalter*¹⁰ and *Scott v Green & Sons*¹¹. So here, I think, the council, having a right of control over the building of a house, have a responsibility in respect of it. They must, I think, take reasonable care to see that the byelaws are complied with. They must appoint building inspectors to examine the work in progress. Those inspectors must be diligent and visit the work as occasion requires. They must carry out their inspection with reasonable care so as to ensure that the byelaws are complied with. But, to whom is

⁵ [1940] 4 All ER 527, [1941] AC 74

⁶ [1946] 2 All ER 345, [1947] AC 1

⁷ [1950] 2 All ER 1159, [1951] 1 KB 517

⁸ [1954] 2 All ER 318, [1954] 2 QB 127

⁹ [1970] 1 All ER 587, [1970] 1 QB 612

¹⁰ [1958] 1 All ER 181, [1959] 2 QB 332

¹¹ [1969] 1 All ER 849, [1969] 1 WLR 301

a that duty owed? And what are the consequences if it is not done?

4. The position of the builder

b Counsel for the council submitted that the inspector owed no duty to a purchaser of the house. He said that on the authorities the builder, Mr Holroyd, owed no duty to a purchaser of the house. The builder was not liable for his negligence in the construction of the house. So also the council's inspector should not be liable for passing the bad work. I would agree that, if the builder is not liable for the bad work, the council ought not to be liable for passing it. So, I will consider whether or not the builder is liable. Counsel for the council relied on the case of *Bottomley v Bannister*¹². That certainly supports his submission. But I do not think it is good law today.

c In the 19th century, and the first part of this century, most lawyers believed that no one who was not a party to a contract could sue on it or anything arising out of it. They held that, if one of the parties to a contract was negligent in carrying it out, no third person who was injured by that negligence could sue for damages on that account. The reason given was that the only duty of care was that imposed by the contract. It was owed to the other contracting party, and to no one else. Time after time counsel for injured plaintiffs sought to escape from the rigour of this rule. But they were met invariably with the answer given by Alderson B in *Winterbottom v Wright*¹³:

'If we were to hold that the plaintiff could sue in such a case, there is no point at which such actions would stop. The only safe rule is to confine the right to recover to those who enter into the contract: if we go one step beyond that, there is no reason why we should not go fifty.'

e So the courts confined the right to recover to those who entered into the contract. If the manufacturer or repairer of an article did it negligently, and someone was injured, the injured person could not recover: see *Earl v Lubbock*¹⁴ and *Blacker v Lake & Elliott Ltd*¹⁵. If the landlord of a house contracted with the tenant to repair it and failed to do it—or did it negligently—with the result that someone was injured, the injured person could not recover: see *Cavalier v Pope*¹⁶. If the owner of land built a house on it and sold it to a purchaser, but he did his work so negligently that someone was injured, the injured person could not recover: see *Bottomley v Bannister*¹². Unless in each case he was a party to the contract.

f That 19th century doctrine may have been appropriate in the conditions then prevailing. But it was not suited to the 20th century. Accordingly, it was done away with in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁷. But that case only dealt with the manufacturer of an article. The cases of *Cavalier v Pope*¹⁶ (on landlords) and *Bottomley v Bannister*¹² (on builders) were considered by the House in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁷, but they were not overruled. It was suggested that they were distinguishable on the ground that they did not deal with chattels but with real property: see per Lord Atkin¹⁸ and Lord Macmillan¹⁹. Hence they were treated by the courts as being still cases of authority. So much so that in 1936 a judge at first instance held that a builder who builds a house for sale is under no duty to build it carefully. If a person was injured by his negligence, he could not recover: see *Otto v Bolton & Norris*²⁰.

h The distinction between chattels and real property is quite unsustainable. If the manufacturer of an article is liable to a person injured by his negligence, so should

12 [1932] 1 KB 458

13 (1842) 10 M & W 109 at 115

14 [1905] 1 KB 253

15 (1912) 106 LT 533

16 [1906] AC 428

17 [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

18 [1932] AC at 598, [1932] All ER Rep at 19

19 [1932] AC at 609, [1932] All ER Rep at 25

20 [1936] 1 All ER 960, [1936] 2 KB 46

the builder of a house be liable. After the lapse of 30 years, this was recognised. In *Gallagher v McDowell Ltd*¹, Lord MacDermott CJ and his colleagues in the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal held that a contractor who built a house negligently was liable to a person injured by his negligence. This was followed by Nield J in *Sharpe v E T Sweeting & Son Ltd*². But the judges in those cases confined themselves to cases in which the builder was only a contractor and was not the owner of the house itself. When the builder is himself the owner, they assumed that *Bottomley v Bannister*³ was still authority for exempting him from liability for negligence.

There is no sense in maintaining this distinction. It would mean that a contractor who builds a house on another's land is liable for negligence in constructing it; but that a speculative builder, who buys land and himself builds houses on it for sale—and is just as negligent as the contractor—is not liable. That cannot be right. Each must be under the same duty of care and to the same persons. If a visitor is injured by the negligent construction, the injured person is entitled to sue the builder, alleging that he built the house negligently. The builder cannot defend himself by saying: 'True I was the builder; but I was the owner as well. So I am not liable.' The injured person can reply: 'I do not care whether you were the owner or not. I am suing you in your capacity as builder and that is enough to make you liable.'

We had a similar problem some years ago. The liability of a contractor doing work on land was said to be different from the liability of an occupier doing the selfsame work. We held that each was liable for negligence: see *AC Billings & Son Ltd v Riden*⁴, and our decision was upheld by the House of Lords⁵; see also *Miller v South of Scotland Electricity Board*⁶. I hold, therefore, that a builder is liable for negligence in constructing a house—whereby a visitor is injured—and it is no excuse for him to say that he was the owner of it. In my opinion *Bottomley v Bannister*³ is no longer authority. Nor is *Otto v Bolton & Norris*⁷. They are both overruled. *Cavalier v Pope*⁸ has gone too. It was reversed by the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, s 4 (1).

5. The position of the professional adviser

Counsel for the council then submitted another reason for saying that the inspector owed no duty to a purchaser. He said that an inspector is in the same position as any professional man who, by virtue of his training and experience, is qualified to give advice to others on how they should act. He said that such a professional man owed no duty to one who did not employ him but only took the benefit of his work; and that an inspector was in a like position. To support this proposition, counsel for the council brought out a long-forgotten case in the House of Lords called *Robertson v Fleming*⁹. It was a Scottish case about the responsibility of a lawyer. Lord Wensleydale said¹⁰:

'He only, who by himself, or another as his agent, employs the attorney to do the particular act in which the alleged neglect has taken place, can sue him for that neglect . . .'

That observation was made in 1861 when the legal profession laboured under the fallacy which I have already mentioned—the fallacy by which it was thought that, when one contracting party was negligent, no one could sue him for that negligence

1 [1961] NI 26

2 [1963] 2 All ER 455, [1963] 1 WLR 665

3 [1932] 1 KB 458

4 [1956] 3 All ER 357, [1957] 1 QB 46

5 [1957] 3 All ER 1, [1958] AC 240

6 1958 SC (HL) 20 at 37-38

7 [1936] 1 All ER 960, [1936] 2 KB 46

8 [1906] AC 428

9 (1861) 4 Macq 167

10 (1861) 4 Macq at 199

a except the other contracting party. That doctrine did not avail manufacturers after 1932: *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹¹; nor did it avail professional men after 1964: *Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd*¹². In neither of those cases, strangely enough, was *Robertson v Fleming*¹³ referred to. But the result of them is to lessen the authority of that case and the observations in it.

b Nowadays, since *Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd*¹², it is clear that a professional man who gives guidance to others owes a duty of care, not only to the client who employs him, but also to another who he knows is relying on his skill to save him from harm. It is certain that a banker or accountant is under such a duty. And I see no reason why a solicitor is not likewise. The essence of this proposition, however, is the reliance. In *Hedley Byrne v Heller*¹² it was stressed by Lord Reid¹⁴, by Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest¹⁵, and by Lord Hodson¹⁶. The professional man must know that the other is relying on his skill and the other must in fact rely on it.

c 6. Reliance

Counsel for the council made a strong point here about reliance. He said that, even if the inspector was under a duty of care, he owed that duty only to those who he knew would rely on this advice—and who did rely on it—and not to those who did not. He said that Mrs Dutton did not rely on the inspector and he owed her, therefore, no duty.

d It is at this point that I must draw a distinction between the several categories of professional men. I can well see that in the case of a professional man who gives advice on financial or property matters—such as a banker, a lawyer or an accountant—his duty is only to those who rely on him and suffer financial loss in consequence. But, in the case of a professional man who gives advice on the safety of buildings, or machines, or material, his duty is to all those who may suffer injury in case his advice is bad. In *Candler v Crane, Christmas & Co*¹⁷, I put the case of an analyst who negligently certifies to a manufacturer of food that a particular ingredient is harmless, whereas it is in fact poisonous; or the case of an inspector of lifts who negligently reports that a particular lift is safe, whereas it is in fact dangerous. It was accepted that the analyst and the lift inspector would be liable to any person who was injured by consuming the food or using the lift. Since that case the courts have had the instance of an architect or engineer. If he designs a house or a bridge so negligently that it falls down, he is liable to everyone of those who are injured in the fall: see *Clay v AJ Crump & Sons Ltd*¹⁸. None of those injured would have relied on the architect or the engineer. None of them would have known whether an architect or engineer was employed, or not. But beyond doubt, the architect and engineer would be liable. The reason is, not because those injured relied on him, but because he knew, or ought to have known, that such persons might be injured if he did his work badly.

g This view is in accord with a case in the USA, *Nelson v Union Wire Rope Ltd*¹⁹. During the building of a court house, a lift plunged down six floors with 19 workmen aboard. It had been regularly inspected by an insurance company and passed as safe. The insurance company made these inspections gratuitously in order to promote their business. The inspector was negligent. He passed the lift as safe when it was unsafe. The Supreme Court of Illinois, by a majority, held that the insurance company were

11 [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

12 [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465

j 13 (1861) 4 Macq 167

14 [1963] 2 All ER at 583, [1964] AC at 486

15 [1963] 2 All ER at 594, [1964] AC at 502-503

16 [1963] 2 All ER at 601, [1964] AC at 514

17 [1951] 1 All ER 426 at 433, [1951] 2 KB 164 at 179

18 [1963] 3 All ER 687, [1964] 1 QB 533

19 (1964) 199 NE 2d 769

liable for the negligence of the inspector. They said²⁰ that the defendant's liability—'is not limited to such persons as might have relied upon it to act but extends instead to such persons as defendant could reasonably have foreseen would be endangered as the result of negligent performance.'

I quite agree.

7. Proximity

Counsel for the council submitted that in any case the duty ought to be limited to those immediately concerned and not to purchaser after purchaser down the line. There is a good deal in this, but I think the reason is because a subsequent purchaser often has the house surveyed. This intermediate inspection, or opportunity of inspection, may break the proximity. It would certainly do so when it ought to disclose the damage. But the foundations of a house are in a class by themselves. Once covered up, they will not be seen again until the damage appears. The inspector must know this or, at any rate, he ought to know it. Applying the test laid down by Lord Atkin in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹, I should have thought that the inspector ought to have had subsequent purchasers in mind when he was inspecting the foundations—he ought to have realised that, if he was negligent, they might suffer damage.

8. Economic loss

Counsel for the council submitted that the liability of the council would, in any case, be limited to those who suffered bodily harm; and did not extend to those who only suffered economic loss. He suggested, therefore, that although the council might be liable if the ceiling fell down and injured a visitor, they would not be liable simply because the house was diminished in value. He referred to the recent case of *SCM (United Kingdom) Ltd v W J Whittall & Son Ltd*².

I cannot accept this submission. The damage done here was not solely economic loss. It was physical damage to the house. If counsel's submission were right, it would mean that, if the inspector negligently passes the house as properly built and it collapses and injures a person, the council are liable; but, if the owner discovers the defect in time to repair it—and he does repair it—the council are not liable. That is an impossible distinction. They are liable in either case. I would say the same about the manufacturer of an article. If he makes it negligently, with a latent defect (so that it breaks to pieces and injures someone), he is undoubtedly liable. Suppose that the defect is discovered in time to prevent the injury. Surely he is liable for the cost of repair.

9. Limitation of action

Counsel for the council also said that, if this action were allowed, it would expose the council to endless claims. The period of limitation would only start to run when the damage was done, i.e. when the cracks appeared in the house. This would mean that they might be liable many years hence. I do not think that is right. The damage was done when the foundations were badly constructed. The period of limitation (six years) then began to run. That appears from *Bagot v Stevens Scanlan & Co Ltd*³. Diplock LJ said that—

'having regard to the nature of the duty . . . alleged to have been breached in this case . . . in effect to see that the drains were properly designed and built, the damage from any breach of that duty must have occurred at the time when the drains were improperly built, because the plaintiff at that time was landed with property which had bad drains when he ought to have been provided with

²⁰ (1964) 199 NE 2d at 779

¹ [1932] 2 AC at 580-581, [1932] All ER Rep at 11

² [1970] 3 All ER 245, [1971] 1 QB 337

³ [1964] 3 All ER 577 at 579, [1966] 1 QB 197 at 203

a property which had good drains, and the damage, accordingly, occurred on that date.'

The council would be protected by a six year limitation, but the builder might not be. If he covered up his own bad work, he would be guilty of concealed fraud, and the, period of limitation would not begin to run until the fraud was discovered: see *Archer v Moss*⁴.

b ro. Policy

This case is entirely novel. Never before has a claim been made against a council or its surveyor for negligence in passing a house. The case itself can be brought within the words of Lord Atkin in *Donoghue v Stevenson*⁵; but, it is a question whether we should apply them here. In *Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd*⁶ Lord Reid said that the words of Lord Atkin expressed a principle which ought to apply in general 'unless there is some justification or valid explanation for its exclusion'. So did Lord Pearson⁷. But Lord Diplock spoke differently. He said⁸ that it was a guide but not a principle of universal application. It seems to me that it is a question of policy which we, as judges, have to decide. The time has come when, in cases of new import, we should decide them according to the reason of the thing.

d In previous times, when faced with a new problem, the judges have not openly asked themselves the question: what is the best policy for the law to adopt? But the question has always been there in the background. It has been concealed behind such questions as: Was the defendant under any duty to the plaintiff? Was the relationship between them sufficiently proximate? Was the injury direct or indirect? Was it foreseeable, or not? Was it too remote? And so forth.

e Nowadays we direct ourselves to considerations of policy. In *Rondel v Worsley*⁹ we thought that, if advocates were liable to be sued for negligence, they would be hampered in carrying out their duties. In *Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd*¹⁰ we thought that the Home Office ought to pay for damage done by escaping borstal boys, if the staff was negligent, but we confined it to damage done in the immediate vicinity. In *SCM (United Kingdom) Ltd v W J Whittall & Son Ltd*¹¹ some of us thought that economic loss ought not to be put on one pair of shoulders, but spread amongst all the sufferers. In *Launchbury v Morgans*¹² we thought that, as the owner of the family car was insured, she should bear the loss. In short, we look at the relationship of the parties; and then say, as a matter of policy, on whom the loss should fall. What are the considerations of policy here? I will take them in order.

g First, Mrs Dutton has suffered a grievous loss. The house fell down without any fault of hers. She is in no position herself to bear the loss. Who ought in justice to bear it? I should think those who were responsible. Who are they? In the first place, the builder was responsible. It was he who laid the foundations so badly that the house fell down. In the second place, the council's inspector was responsible. It was his job to examine the foundations to see if they would take the load of the house. He failed to do it properly. In the third place, the council should answer for his failure. h They were entrusted by Parliament with the task of seeing that houses were properly built. They received public funds for the purpose. The very object was to protect purchasers and occupiers of houses. Yet, they failed to protect them. Their shoulders are broad enough to bear the loss.

4 [1971] 1 All ER 747, [1971] 1 QB 406

5 [1932] AC at 580, [1932] All ER Rep at 11

j 6 [1970] 2 All ER 294 at 297, [1970] AC 1004 at 1027

7 [1970] 2 All ER at 321, [1970] AC at 1054

8 [1970] 2 All ER at 325-326, [1970] AC at 1060

9 [1967] 3 All ER 993, [1969] 1 AC 191

10 [1970] 2 All ER 294, [1970] AC 1004

11 [1970] 3 All ER 245, [1971] 1 QB 337

12 [1971] 1 All ER 642, [1971] 2 QB 245

Next I ask: is there any reason in point of law why the council should not be held liable? Hitherto many lawyers have thought that a builder (who was also the owner) was not liable. If that were truly the law, I would not have thought it fair to make the council liable when the builder was not liable. But I hold that the builder who builds a house badly is liable, even though he is himself the owner. On this footing, there is nothing unfair in holding the council's surveyor also liable. a

Then, I ask: if liability were imposed on the council, would it have an adverse effect on the work? Would it mean that the council would not inspect at all, rather than risk liability for inspecting badly? Would it mean that inspectors would be harassed in their work or be subject to baseless charges? Would it mean that they would be extra cautious, and hold up work unnecessarily? Such considerations have influenced cases in the past (as in *Rondel v Worsley*¹³). But here I see no danger. If liability is imposed on the council, it would tend, I think, to make them do their work better, rather than worse. b

Next, I ask: is there any economic reason why liability should not be imposed on the council? In some cases the law has drawn the line to prevent recovery of damages. It sets a limit to damages for economic loss, or for shock, or theft by escaping convicts. The reason is that, if no limit were set, there would be no end to the money payable. But I see no such reason here for limiting damages. In nearly every case the builder will be primarily liable. He will be insured and his insurance company will pay the damages. It will be very rarely that the council will be sued or found liable. If it is, much the greater responsibility will fall on the builder and little on the council. c

Finally, I ask myself: if we permit this new action, are we opening the door too much? Will it lead to a flood of cases which the council will not be able to handle, nor the courts? Such considerations have sometimes in the past led the courts to reject novel claims. But I see no need to reject this claim on this ground. The injured person will always have his claim against the builder. He will rarely allege—and still less be able to prove—a case against the council. d

All these considerations lead me to the conclusion that the policy of the law should be, and is, that the council should be liable for the negligence of their surveyor in passing work as good when in truth it is bad. I would therefore dismiss this appeal. In parting from the case I would like to pay my tribute to the help we have received from counsel on both sides and the very good research they have done in the course of the case. e

SACHS LJ. The facts in the present case are simple, but they raise interesting and important issues of law, and at the outset I would like to pay my tribute to the admirable help received by this court from Mr Tapp and Mr Wood through the lucid and powerful submissions which they presented. f

In 1958 application was made on behalf of one Mr Holroyd, a builder, who was developing an area known as Gossamer Estate, Bognor Regis, for planning permission to erect a detached house for private occupation on plot 28 of which he owned the freehold. On 23rd October 1958 the council notified their approval of the plans deposited in accordance with the byelaws made by them under the Public Health Act 1936. He proceeded with the erection of a house on that plot and can conveniently be referred to as the 'building owner'. In due course an inspector from the offices of the Bognor Regis Council ('the council') came to inspect the foundations to see whether they complied with the above byelaws; without his approval the building work could not in practice have gone ahead. He in fact gave approval, but his inspection was so negligent that he failed to observe that the land in the centre of the plot was of such a nature that the foundations being laid were gravely inadequate. The building then went ahead and so the defective foundations were covered up and hidden from any normal subsequent inspection. g

¹³ [1967] 3 All ER 993, [1969] 1 AC 191 h

- a After its completion the building owner sold the house on plot 28 to a Mr Clarke for £4,050, conveying the property to him on 21st January 1960. On 19th December 1960 Mr Clarke contracted with Mrs Dutton (the plaintiff in this action) to sell her the house for £4,800. It being a new house no surveyor was employed by her to inspect it—but it was in this court common ground that if such a surveyor had been employed he could not have been expected to find out this particular hidden defect.
- b The plaintiff moved into the house on 11th January 1961; by the autumn certain cracks commenced to appear in consequence of the hidden defect; the house began to subside with lamentable results which she had no financial means to remedy. The 1962 cost of the necessary work of curing the structural defects and of repairs was at trial agreed to be £2,240 (including surveyors' fees). To that sum there was added £500 described as the reduction in the value of the house; from the resulting £2,740 there was deducted £625 recovered from Mr Holroyd, and judgment was entered for
- c £2,115. The plaintiff recovered nothing towards the rise over eight years in the cost of the work she could not afford, nor any sum for the gross inconvenience she suffered. The settlement of the claim against the building owner for a mere £625 was due to fears as to the effect on her rights of what later in this judgment is referred to as 'the *Bottomley v Bannister*¹⁴ point.' After that settlement she continued to proceed against
- d the council, claiming that they, as well as the building owner, were liable to her in the circumstances above set out. The council have not chosen to take third party proceedings against the building owner with a view to obtaining a further contribution from him—although it is common ground that this is something they could have done as between the defendants.

- e The various relevant provisions of the Public Health Act 1936 and the byelaws made thereunder by the council having been referred to in the judgment of Lord Denning MR, there is no need to recite them again. But so much depends on the position created by them that it is convenient at the outset to stand away from the points of detail and consider the overall object and the practical effect of the Act and the byelaws as a whole in regard to the erection of dwellings.

- f The object was clearly to ensure that through byelaws made by councils (or by the Minister if a council made none) as backed by powers to enforce them, that each dwelling erected in the council's area should have a standard of sanitation and soundness of construction that would be satisfactory for the health and well-being of those who might live in it. The byelaws were to lay down the requirements, which of course might vary according to the locality, whilst the Act itself provided the council with enforcement powers—'the teeth'. The practical effect of the Act and the byelaws taken together was to give the council through its appointed officers all-embracing control over most of the building operation—and in particular control
- g over sanitation and foundation work. Any work that is not complying with a byelaw can be stopped by the council's officers on their ascertaining that non-compliance. Further, if any work has been done which failed to comply with those byelaws the council can require its alteration or removal and in default could itself remedy the defect. The teeth are to be found in the provisions of the Act, such as ss 65 and 287.

- h In the result no builder dare go ahead with sanitation or foundation work without the approval of the council's surveyor. The latter's control in practice can and often does override that of any site foreman or architect. It is, moreover, an obvious fact that when control is being exercised over work which is subsequently covered up (such as drains and foundations) any fault in the work thus covered will not in the
- i nature of things be discovered on any normal subsequent survey made either on behalf of a purchaser or on behalf of any building society with whose aid the building is being acquired. It is plain that this control was designed to provide a protection against jerry building, similar faults, and their effects—not least to guard against poor drainage, and foundations.

The question whether the Act and the byelaws result in the council having a duty to those who later purchased the dwellings is one as to which a considerable number of points have been raised in the course of the submissions in this court. I have formed the view that in the end the crucial approach is that indicated by Lord Pearson when, in his speech in the Dorset Yacht case¹⁵, he said:

'It is true that the *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁶ principle as stated . . . is a basic and general but not universal principle and does not in law apply to all the situations which are covered by the wide words of the passage. To some extent the decision in this case must be a matter of impression and instinctive judgment as to what is fair and just.'

In the course of that approach due regard must, of course, be had, inter alia, to how far-reaching may be the effect of holding that such a duty existed. In essence it is a matter of the policy of the common law. Before coming to this crucial stage, it is as well to dispose of certain points raised on behalf of the council which, if accepted, would result in a decision in their favour without really having to examine the final question as posed by Lord Pearson¹⁵.

As regards each point in turn any examination of the law will, of course, be concerned with the liability of a defendant for negligence which produces hidden or latent physical defects—that is to say defects not detectable on any normal earlier examination before they become apparent to the plaintiff who brings a claim. That is the type of defect with which this appeal is concerned and I would wish to guard against anything said later in this judgment being interpreted as affecting other defects: *Bottomley v Bannister*¹⁷.

In limine comes the submission that the principles in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁸ have no application to realty. In this behalf it was argued that a building owner can never be under any liability to a purchaser or anyone else for defects in the building he has erected save by virtue of some liability created by contract; and that accordingly as a building owner cannot be liable in negligence for hidden defects which he has created then a fortiori the person who caused the defects to arise cannot be liable either. Arguendo this submission came to be styled the *Bottomley v Bannister*¹⁷ point because of what was said in that case, decided just before the judgment in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁸ in the House of Lords. Particular reliance was placed on what Scrutton LJ said¹⁹:

'Now it is at present well established English law that, in the absence of express contract, a landlord of an unfurnished house is not liable to his tenant, or a vendor of real estate to his purchaser, for defects in the house or land rendering it dangerous or unfit for occupation, even if he has constructed the defects himself or is aware of their existence.'

That passage on the face of it strongly supports the contention of the council as also does what was said in similar vein as to a landowner's special position by Lord MacDermott CJ in *Gallagher v McDowell Ltd*²⁰.

In the latter case, however, it was held that building contractors who had erected a house for the Northern Ireland Housing Trust would be liable in negligence to the wife of the first tenant of that house for a defect in the wooden floor of one of the rooms which caused her to sustain an accident and ordered a new trial on that footing. Accordingly, the passages that relate to the liabilities of an owner of realty are obiter. Moreover, *Bottomley v Bannister*¹⁷, being a pre-*Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁸ decision, must

¹⁵ [1970] 2 All ER 294 at 321, [1970] AC 1004 at 1054

¹⁶ [1932] AC at 580, [1932] All ER Rep at 11

¹⁷ [1932] 1 KB 458

¹⁸ [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

¹⁹ [1932] 1 KB at 468

²⁰ [1961] NI 26 at 38

a now be looked at in the light of what was decided in the latter case. Such other post-*Donoghue v Stevenson*¹ decisions as were cited to us were at first instance, e.g. *Otto v Bolton & Norris*². As regards *Cavalier v Pope*³, also much relied on by counsel for the council, the House of Lords were concerned with a case where the landlord had allowed the premises which he had let to the plaintiff's husband to get into a dangerous state of disrepair. It is perhaps sufficient for the purposes of the present case to observe that that was not perhaps a comparable instance of actually creating the dangerous state of affairs, nor does it appear that the defect was in any way hidden; on the contrary, the disrepair was so obvious that the plaintiff and her husband had threatened to leave the premises. The facts accordingly bear no relationship to those in the instant case. In the result there is thus nowhere to be found any authority binding this court to hold that the principles enunciated in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹ cannot apply to an owner of realty.

c It is obvious that a builder who by his negligence creates a hidden defect is liable to anyone suffering damage from it just as a manufacturer is liable when a hidden defect in the goods he makes injures a workman using them and as a producer of consumable goods is liable when a hidden defect injures a consumer. I can find nothing in principle which absolves from liability a builder who creates a hidden defect because he happens to be or to become the owner of the premises built. On the contrary, as Lord MacDermott CJ himself said in *Gallagher's case*⁴, 'the doctrine of *Donoghue v. Stevenson*¹ can apply to defective houses as well as defective chattels' and in my judgment there is no exception behind which landowners as such can shelter. Thus the *Bottomley v Bannister*⁵ point fails.

e *East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board v Kent*⁶

Next it was urged on behalf of the council that the present case was one to which the well-known decision in *Geddis v Bann Reservoir Proprietors*⁷ as to liability for the negligent exercise of powers did not apply having regard to what was said in the speeches in the *East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board case*⁶, where the board was held not to be liable for having failed to use in the exercise of its powers reasonable expedition in repairing a breach in a sea wall (which they do not appear themselves to have erected) with the result that the flooding of the plaintiff's land caused by the breach was not abated as promptly as it would have been had such expedition been used⁸. Particular stress was laid on a passage in the speech of Lord Romer where he summarised the principle he considered to be involved in that case. He said⁹:

g 'Where a statutory authority is entrusted with a mere power, it cannot be made liable for any damage sustained by a member of the public by reason of a failure to exercise that power.'

He proceeded to emphasise that the only duty of the board was not to add to such damage as would have been suffered by the plaintiff had they done nothing.

h As a matter of first impression that statement of the law seemed to provide a formidable point in favour of the council. But even on the basis that the instant case is concerned with a 'mere power' there is a very relevant distinction between the

i 1 [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

2 [1936] 1 All ER 960, [1936] 2 KB 46

3 [1906] AC 428

4 [1961] NI at 41

5 [1932] 1 KB 458

6 [1940] 4 All ER 527, [1941] AC 74

7 (1878) 3 App Cas 430

8 [1940] 4 All ER at 530, [1941] AC at 84

9 [1940] 4 All ER at 543, [1941] AC at 102

facts in the East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board case¹⁰ and the facts now under consideration. Where in a case relating to the exercise of powers the issue arises whether on the facts the cause of any damage is non-feasance or whether that cause is a misfeasance, the borderline can be difficult to discern. The East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board case¹⁰ is one in which the failure to proceed with the building work sufficiently quickly was held to be in essence a case of non-feasance—although Lord Atkin's dissenting speech¹¹ shows how close it came to that borderline. In the present case, on the contrary, the negligence plainly occurred in the course of a positive exercise by the council of its powers. The moment it exercised its power under s 61 of the 1936 Act to make byelaws it assumed control over all such building operations within its area as were the subject of those byelaws. That assumption of control was a positive act and thereafter in my opinion any negligence in its exercise fell within the ambit of the decision in the Geddis case¹²; had the council's surveyor failed to make any inspection at all of the foundations that, of itself, might, according to the circumstances, have constituted negligence. But be that as it may, it is quite plain that the approval of the foundations by the council's surveyor was a positive exercise of its powers of control—in the same way as would be the switching on of a green light by a signalman, to adopt the helpful analogy raised arguendo by Stamp LJ. Insofar as in the present case we are concerned with the exercise of mere powers, we are dealing with a case of misfeasance.

It follows that on that ground there is, in my judgment, nothing in the decision in the East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board case¹⁰ which can afford a defence to the council; accordingly it is not necessary to consider the further point taken by counsel for the plaintiff, based on passages in the speeches of Viscount Simon LC, Lord Thankerton and Lord Porter¹³ respectively (see also the speech of Lord Atkin¹⁴) that the decision there in substance turned on the question of causation.

Nature of loss

It was strongly contended on behalf of the council that the nature of the loss suffered by the plaintiff was in essence economic and that for economic loss no action would lie in negligence. For my part, however, I would adopt what was said by Salmon LJ in *Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp*¹⁵:

'So far, however, as the law of negligence relating to civil actions is concerned, the existence of a duty to take reasonable care no longer depends on whether it is physical injury or financial loss which can reasonably be foreseen as a result of a failure to take such care.'

That appears to me to accord with the views expressed in *Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd*¹⁶ by Lord Devlin and by Lord Pearce. That proposition must, of course, be taken in conjunction with what Lord Denning MR said in *SCM (United Kingdom) Ltd v W J Whittall & Son Ltd*¹⁷, where he adverted to the need to apply common sense to the particular situation being considered so as to avoid too wide an area of liability for damages being recoverable for some act of negligence.

In the instant case there is ample evidence of physical damage having occurred to the property—but it has been argued that this damage is on analysis the equivalent of a diminution of the value of the premises and does not rank for consideration as physical injury. Counsel for the council found himself submitting that if, for instance,

¹⁰ [1940] 4 All ER 527, [1941] AC 74

¹¹ [1940] 3 All ER at 533, [1941] AC at 88

¹² (1878) 4 App Cas 430

¹³ [1940] 4 All ER at 533, 539, 545, [1941] AC at 87, 96, 105

¹⁴ [1940] 4 All ER at 536-537, [1941] AC at 92-93

¹⁵ [1970] 1 All ER 1009 at 1027, [1970] 2 QB 223 at 278

¹⁶ [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 602-603, 616-617, [1964] AC 465 at 517, 538

¹⁷ [1970] 3 All ER at 250, [1971] 1 QB at 344

a the relevant defect had been in the ceiling of a room then if it fell on somebody's head or on to the occupier's chattels and thus caused physical damage then (subject of course to his other points failing) there would be a cause of action in negligence, but not if it fell on to a bare floor and caused no further damage. Apparently in the former case damages would be limited so as to exclude repairs to the ceiling; in the latter case there would be no cause of action at all. That subtle line of argument failed to attract me and would lead to an unhappily odd state of the law.

b If physical damage is, contrary to my view, a sine qua non before a cause of action can arise against a builder or a building owner, then it seems to me to have occurred in the present case. But in my judgment to pose the question is it physical damage or economic damage is to adopt a fallacious approach. In this case—and perhaps generally in cases concerned with the exercise of duties and powers by a public authority—the correct test is: what range of damage is the proper exercise of the power designed to prevent? In this way the question whether any particular damage is recoverable is brought back into the area of policy indicated by Lord Denning MR in his judgment in the SCM case¹⁸; and appropriate weight can, if necessary, be given to the fact that this case concerns a house and not a chattel. At this stage, it suffices to say that nothing in the nature of the loss sustained by the plaintiff of itself precludes a claim being maintained for that loss.

d Before coming to this conclusion I have naturally considered the carefully marshalled submissions made with the aid of the most recent edition of the United States Restatement of the Law of Torts but I am unable to accept that in this country, at any rate, anything said there applies to the facts now under review.

e Proximity, reliance and statute of limitations

e Before turning to the crucial question in this case there still remain to be considered the submissions made on behalf of the council in relation to three points which can be conveniently considered as a group—although of course each was raised as of itself providing a defence to the action.

f As to proximity, it was contended that there was not a sufficiently close relationship between the council's negligence and the plaintiff as regards the subject-matter of the claim on two grounds, each being said to be sufficient to sustain the council's contention, although of course they should also be looked at in combination. First, it was argued that as the defects were due to bad work by the building owner, any negligence on the part of the council was in law not sufficiently proximate to enable the plaintiff to claim against it. There is, however, no substance in this point—which seems somewhat reminiscent of the out-dated conception which led to arguments being adduced as to the distinction between causa causans and causa sine qua non and also those touching the one-time doctrine of 'last opportunity'. Nowadays, at any rate, the signalman who has fallen asleep and the engine driver who fails to see the obstacle on the line can both be liable (cf *Grange Motors (Cymbran) Ltd v Spencer*¹⁹); so can an architect, a building contractor and a demolition contractor all concerned with the same site (*Clay v A J Crump & Sons Ltd*²⁰).

h Next came the suggestion that because the plaintiff in the present action was not the original purchaser from the building owner but was next in the line of succession in purchasers the relationship between her and the building owner was not sufficiently proximate. That suggestion overlooks the very essence of the *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹ decision. As regards hidden defects the fact that there have been intermediate purchasers or users is not in point where the defect can only come to light at the stage when the plaintiff is injuriously affected. Here again there is no distinction in this

18 [1970] 3 All ER at 250, [1971] 1 QB at 344

19 [1969] 1 All ER 340, [1969] 1 WLR 53

20 [1963] 3 All ER 687, [1964] 1 QB 533

1 [1932] AC 562, [1932] 1 All ER Rep 1

respect between a defect in a house and a defect in a chattel; so that suggestion also has no substance.

Next came the much pressed point that the plaintiff ought to have established affirmatively that she personally or by her agents relied on the inspection by the council when she entered into the contract to acquire the house. It was correctly pointed out that there was no evidence of any such reliance. In aid of this submission were cited passages in the speeches of Lord Reid, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest and Lord Pearce in the Hedley Byrne case², and also a number of passages to be found in judgments of appeal courts in the United States. Clearly there can be categories of cases in which the duty to a plaintiff may depend on whether he has placed reliance on the defendants' conduct, be it conduct by way of acts or by way of words. On the other hand, in the vast majority of cases the question whether a plaintiff actually thought about and relied on the defendants' conduct is quite irrelevant; the point in those cases is not whether he thought about the matter and can so state in evidence but simply whether he is entitled to the benefit of a duty owed by the defendant irrespective of whether at the time he thought about that question.

Finally, amongst this group came the submission that in this class of case the discovery of any defect in the foundations—or indeed generally in a building—might only occur after a considerable number of years and that to allow such claims to be maintained would in effect defeat the intent of the statute of limitations. Whatever be the moment a cause of action in negligence arises, there is again no difference in law applicable to negligence producing a defect in a building and negligence producing a defect in a chattel. There is, moreover, much force in the point made by counsel for the plaintiff that as regards buildings the worse the defect the sooner it is likely to be discovered, and the longer it remains undiscovered the less likely it is that negligence can be proved. This point raised on behalf of the council cannot of itself provide a defence.

In coming to that conclusion I have not sought to rely on the dictum of Diplock LJ, sitting at first instance, in *Bagot v Stevens Scanlan & Co Ltd*³. That dictum being concerned with doubts whether admissions to the contrary effect made by both parties were valid, the point does not appear to have been argued there; nor was it the subject of discussion before us. So I prefer to express no concluded view, as the point may be susceptible of argument—especially as the limitation period in this class of case might, having regard to ss 1 (3) and 7 of the Limitation Act 1963, on the basis adopted by Diplock LJ, vary according to whether or not personal injury was suffered by a plaintiff. Much, moreover, may depend on whether the views expressed under the heading 'Nature of loss' are correct.

It follows that none of the above points which have been grouped together can of itself provide the council with a defence. They do, however, raise questions which it is proper to take into account when considering the final question on the lines of approach indicated by Lord Pearson⁴.

A duty situation?

Having thus cleared the way of a number of obstacles each submitted in turn to preclude the plaintiff succeeding in her claim, the stage has now been reached for approaching the final question—as between the council and the plaintiff was there 'a duty situation', to adopt the apt phrase used by Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest in the Dorset Yacht case⁵? For that purpose I will, as stated earlier in this judgment, respectfully adopt the approach signposted by Lord Pearson⁶ in a passage which follows closely the line taken by Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest.

² [1963] 2 All ER at 583, 594, 617, [1964] AC at 487, 502, 538

³ [1964] 3 All ER 577 at 579, [1966] 1 QB 197 at 203

⁴ In Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd [1970] 2 All ER at 321, [1970] AC at 1054

⁵ [1970] 2 All ER at 307, [1970] AC at 1038

⁶ [1970] 2 All ER at 321, [1970] AC at 1054

a Before, however, so doing, it seems convenient to pause and look around to see what is the area into which one has emerged. It is the area of the exercise of functions of bodies created by statute for the benefit of a community or of individuals who form part of that community. It is an area in which the essential purpose of the legislation is to provide a clear measure of protection which the common law does not of itself afford. That protection is its primary object. That area differs from those in which b between parties (e.g. builder and site owner) whose primary object is their own pecuniary or other advantage and for whom the benefits accruing to others are at least secondary. A fortiori it differs from the area in which the courts are concerned with acts done voluntarily by persons for their own benefit (e.g. the insurers of lifts in the United States cases).

c When first asked the direct question: 'To whom does the council owe a duty when exercising the powers derived from the fasciculus of sections in the 1936 Act commencing at s 61 and headed 'Byelaws with respect to buildings and sanitation?', counsel for the council seemed, if I may respectfully so suggest, hesitant in his reply. Having eliminated special cases—such as those in which some specific communication to the council could be said to produce reliance on the surveyor by the builder or by d the site owner—the answer in due course came, 'It is under no duty to anybody.' The Act was submitted to be passed for the benefit of the community at large (without imposing any duty justiciable on its behalf), so that a proper standard of building be maintained in the area, but not for the benefit of any category of individuals or any individual. There was thus no duty to any individual and it was urged that no neglect by the council, however gross, could be justiciable at the instance of one who suffered damage.

e That answer and those submissions I reject. The Act was passed to protect those who might come to own or occupy the relevant houses against jerry building and similar faults and was intended to benefit such persons. That protection and benefit was the primary purpose of the relevant provisions of the Act; and that is a purpose which falls within the instructions given to the council by the words in s 1, 'it shall be f the duty of the following authorities to carry this Act into execution'. It follows that as between the council and the owners and occupiers of houses over the building of which it has control there exists at least in respect of hidden defects of the type under consideration a duty situation—unless (per Lord Reid and Lord Pearson in the Dorset Yacht case⁷) there are some countervailing factors which should on policy grounds lead to a contrary conclusion.

g Early amongst the countervailing points relied on by counsel for the council was the suggestion that those who might suffer damage had a sufficient remedy against the building contractor (assuming that the *Bottomley v Bannister*⁸ point was rejected). That seems a poor point for many reasons—for instance the common law does not normally limit the person who suffers damage to a remedy against one of two culpable persons. In the category of case with which we are here concerned it is more-over particularly important that a dual liability should exist. It is commonplace h today that a development project involving the building of a group of houses by a site owner is often so arranged that everything is done by a specially formed company which may be dissolved when the project is completed; such an arrangement can have taxation advantages and can also afford financial protection if the project results in a loss. Those for whose benefit the Act was passed both need and should have the benefit of such dual liability as may be available in a state of affairs which i could not have come about if the council had done what it ought to do.

Next came the suggestion that to uphold the plaintiff's claim in this case would open the way to a flood of similar claims against councils and—perhaps more importantly—against others who make inspections under statutory powers, such as factory inspectors and those who carry out annual tests on motor vehicles for which no renewal of a licence can be obtained without the aid of a test certificate. This could be a formidable point if established to the degree propounded by counsel for the council. But as regards similar claims under the 1936 Act there must be remembered the very great difficulties that normally beset a plaintiff on whom lies the burden of proving that a hidden defect resulted from a surveyor's negligence as opposed to, at highest, from an error of judgment. Practical experience points against any flood of such claims. a

7 [1970] 2 All ER at 302, 321, [1970] AC at 1032, 1054

8 [1932] 1 KB 458

b

As regards inspections under other powers—here again it must be kept in mind that the instant case is concerned with negligence against which normal intermediate examination would not generally afford protection. No doubt there will be some claims made as regards the exercise of other statutory powers; but without a close examination of those particular powers and also of the chances of proving negligence in relation to their exercise no reliable forecasts can be made. For my part I do not find myself in that state of fear in which counsel for the council sought to envelop me. Indeed in the end I find nothing in this point to deter me from deciding this appeal in accordance with the justice of the case. c

As regards the several other points raised, of which it was said that individually or in the aggregate they should on policy grounds lead to the instant claim being excluded from the general ambit of the main principle to be found in *Donoghue v Stevenson*⁹, it seems sufficient, save in one instance, to refer to what I have said earlier in this judgment as to some of the points and to add that as regards the others I am in general agreement with what has been said about them by Lord Denning MR. d

The one point for further mention relates to the measure of damages. What is the answer to the question: what range of damage is the proper exercise of the relevant power designed to prevent? Primarily, it is designed to prevent owners and occupiers having to live in a dwelling built to a lower standard than that prescribed by the Act and the byelaws made under it. Prima facie the measure of damage must accordingly include the cost of the work required to raise the dwelling to the requisite standard. In addition the design being to avoid injury to health or to other property due to sub-standard construction, damage suffered under this head would (subject of course to the usual rules as to causation and mitigation) be recoverable and also something for general inconvenience suffered whilst occupying the premises and for disturbance during repairs. e
f

For my part, however, I doubt whether a claim lies for any reduction in the market value of the premises over and above the cost of the relevant work, e.g. if, for instance, a house with underpinned foundations were shown to be worth £300 less in the open market than one with good original foundations. The Act is not concerned with market value as such and it could be consistent with the policy applicable to this class of case to draw a line which would preclude recovery of this type of economic loss (cf the *Gorris v Scott*¹⁰ line of cases). The measure of damages for negligence is not the same as the measure for breach of warranty—and as regards negligence I would also wish to reserve the question whether the measure against a building contractor might not exceed that recoverable against a council. As, however, counsel for the council in the course of his reply specifically disclaimed reliance on any distinction between the two component parts (£2,240 and £500 respectively) of the £2,740 for which the council was held liable, it is not necessary further to consider this doubt of mine. (Some such sum would anyway presumably be appropriate for the wretched inconvenience suffered.) g
h

The suggested countervailing points being found to be ineffective, it follows that as between the council and the plaintiff there existed a duty situation even if the former were exercising mere powers. A fortiori, of course, was there such a situation if, as I would hold, the council were under a duty, imposed by the 1936 Act, to exercise i a control. In either case the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the negligence that has been established.

⁹ [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

¹⁰ (1874) LR 9 Exch 125

The plaintiff has not raised the question whether a claim for breach of statutory duty would lie in this case in the absence of negligence. So it is unnecessary to consider whether the instant case is one that falls on the *Groves v Lord Wimborne*¹¹ or on the *Phillips v Britannia Hygienic Laundry Co*¹² side of the line. That is a point which may have to be considered on some future occasion, particularly since s 61 of the 1936 Act has been amended by the Public Health Act 1961, so that instead of byelaws there are now always regulations made by the Minister which it has become the duty of councils to enforce.

I would dismiss the appeal.

c STAMP LJ. Under s 1 of the Public Health Act 1936 the defendant council had the duty to carry the Act into execution within its area. Under s 61 of that Act it was provided that every local authority might and, if required by the Minister, should make byelaws for regulating (inter alia) the construction of buildings and the materials used in their construction. The council did make such byelaws. In my judgment they must be taken to have done so pursuant to the duty cast on them by s 1 of the Act. The byelaws so made imposed no duties on the council, but having made them, it became one of the functions of the council to see that the byelaws were complied with. They became part of the machinery enabling the council to perform its duty to protect the health and amenities of the local inhabitants. The byelaws did not impose on the council any duty to ensure that a house built within their area was not built on an insecure foundation, but contained machinery enabling them to perform that task, and a powerful sanction if the byelaws were not complied with.

By the joint effect of byelaws 2 and 6 (1) a builder intending to build a house was required to furnish the council, with not less than 24 hours' notice in writing—
(a) of the date and time at which the operation would be commenced; and (b) before the covering up of any drain, private sewer, concrete or other material laid over a site, foundation or damp-proof course. A builder who failed to do this acted at his peril for, by para (2) of byelaw 6, it was provided that if the builder neglected or refused to give any such notice, he should comply with any notice in writing by the council requiring him, within a reasonable time, to cut into, lay open or pull down so much of the building, works or fittings as prevented the council from ascertaining whether any of the byelaws had been contravened. Byelaw 18 (1) provided in effect that the foundations of every building should be so designed and constructed that the stability of the building was not impaired.

The machinery set up pursuant to the Act was well designed to secure that houses built in the area of the council were not jerry-built houses or built on unsound foundations. The machinery gave the council the opportunity, which it took in this case, to see that the house which the plaintiff subsequently purchased was not such a house. The council, however, by its surveyor acted so carelessly that it did not discover the house was built on unstable land. The council's surveyor told the builder that the foundations were passed as satisfactory and showed him the green light to build on what was in fact an unstable foundation. The result was he did build and the plaintiff, when she came to purchase the property, purchased a house which began to fall down. She has suffered loss.

j Before examining the law, or approaching the authorities relied on, I find it convenient to deal first with the submission made on behalf of the council that the injury to the plaintiff was not caused by any act or default of the council. It was, so the argument ran, the builder, and not the council, who carelessly built the house on an insecure foundation, and so created the lack of stability of which the plaintiff complains. I cannot accept this submission. As I see it, the situation was essentially this. The council had power, derived from the Act and the byelaws made thereunder, either to give or refuse its approval to the foundations; to show the green light or the red. In error, because they had carelessly done their work, they showed the green. In my judgment he who shows the green light in such circumstances as these causes the consequential injury. Let me illustrate this. Let it be supposed that one side of a winding road be under repair and there be a man on duty to ensure that the traffic coming in opposite directions is not on the road at the same time. The man on duty holds up the green flag or shows the green lights or shouts 'Go on' to driver A, not observing, as he should have done, that driver B is coming in the opposite direction. Can it be doubted as a matter of common sense, that it is the man on duty who causes the damage suffered in the ensuing collision? The analogy, like most analogies, is not complete, but serves to illustrate the point. It is not complete because I have assumed no carelessness on the part of driver A, whereas in the instant case it is common ground that at the time the council illuminated the green light, the builder had carelessly laid the foundations. It was, however, precisely to correct such earlier carelessness that the action of the council was taken; and because I accept the submission that but for the council's error the house would, on the balance of probability, never have been built on its insecure foundations, that I accept that the act of the council did cause the injury. In this connection, I refer to the speech of Lord Reid in *Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd*¹³, where he considers to what extent the law regards the acts of another person as breaking the chain of causation between the defendant's carelessness and the damage to the plaintiff, and where he concludes¹⁴ that if the intervening action—here the action of the builder—was likely to happen, it does not matter whether that action was innocent, tortious or criminal, and remarks that unfortunately, tortious or criminal action by a third party is often the 'very kind of thing' which is likely to happen as a result of the careless act of the defendant. What happened in this case was in my judgment 'the very kind of thing' which was likely to happen if the council was careless.

If it be correct that the action of the council caused injury to the plaintiff, the questions which as I see it fall to be determined are, first, did the council owe a common law duty to the plaintiff not to injure the plaintiff by approving the foundations until they had taken proper steps to ensure that they were fairly laid; not to raise the green flag until they had seen that the road was clear; and secondly, was the injury which the plaintiff suffered an injury for which damages can be recovered?

If some of the remarks in the speech of Lord Atkin in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁵ were to be applied without qualification there would, I venture to think, be no difficulty in answering the questions raised. Lord Atkin said¹⁵:

"The liability for negligence, whether you style it such or treat it as in other systems as a species of "culpa", is no doubt based upon a general public sentiment of moral wrongdoing for which the offender must pay. But acts or omissions which any moral code would censure cannot in a practical world be treated so as to give a right to every person injured by them to demand relief. In this way rules of law arise which limit the range of complainants and the extent of their remedy. The rule that you are to love your neighbour becomes in law, you must not injure your neighbour; and the lawyer's question, Who is my neighbour? receives a restricted reply. You must take reasonable care to avoid acts or omissions which you can reasonably foresee would be likely to injure your neighbour. Who, then, in law is my neighbour? The answer seems to be—persons who are so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reasonably to have them

¹³ [1970] 2 All ER 294 at 298 et seq, [1970] AC 1004 at 1027 et seq

¹⁴ [1970] 2 All ER at 300, [1970] AC at 1030

¹⁵ [1932] AC 562 at 580, [1932] All ER Rep 1 at 11

- a in contemplation as being so affected when I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question.'

Persons who might become the purchaser of a house built on an insecure foundation are in my judgment so closely and directly affected by the act of a local authority in passing or refusing to pass the foundations as secure, that the authority ought reasonably to have them in contemplation as being affected when the local authority apply

- b their mind to the question whether they should or should not do so. It is common ground that the defects in the foundations in the instant case were, as they were bound to be, concealed; and no reasonable inspection of the property by any purchaser would disclose the defects, which could only become manifest as the foundations started to settle; and unless the local authority were carrying out an academic exercise, for what other purpose, except primarily to protect future owners of the
- c house, was the exercise performed? And if this case does not fall precisely within any other authority, the court must have in mind what Lord MacMillan said in a much cited passage in his speech in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁶:

- d 'The grounds of action may be as various and manifold as human errancy; and the conception of legal responsibility may develop in adaptation to altering social conditions and standards. The criterion of judgment must adjust and adapt itself to the changing circumstances of life. The categories of negligence are never closed.'

If, in the instant case, the council ought reasonably to have had one in the position of the plaintiff in contemplation as one who might be injured by what it did, I ask the rhetorical question, why should not the local authority be liable to the

- e plaintiff for the injury which she has suffered?
- Of course, the passage in the speech of Lord Atkin¹⁷, which I have quoted, is not to be read literally and without regard to the context, or, as has been said, it would comprehend careless conduct of any kind through any means, causing damage of any kind, whether physical or not, to anyone who could bring himself within the definition of a neighbour. Lord Atkin was not formulating a complete criterion, as
- f was indicated by Lord Reid in the Hedley Byrne case¹⁸:

'That decision [in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁹] may encourage [the courts] to develop existing lines of authority, but it cannot entitle us to disregard them.'

- A host of authorities has been cited which it is submitted inhibit this court from concluding that the council was under a liability to the plaintiff. In my judgment, their relevance depends on the view one takes of the facts of the case. I turn in a
- g moment to consider those principally relied on by the council.

- In view of the course which the case took in the court below, counsel for the plaintiff felt unable to contend that this is a case where the council had a statutory duty to inspect the foundations and accepted, as I understand it, that the council in doing what it did was exercising a statutory power. If then, as was submitted on behalf
- h of the council, one came to the conclusion that the council as a result of the carelessness of its officer, merely failed to prevent damage which had already happened, it would, so I think, follow, on the authority of the decision of the House of Lords in *East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board v Kent*²⁰, that here there was no liability. That case is authority for saying that where a statutory body in exercise of a statutory power fails through foolish error to remedy a damaging situation which has already occurred, it is no more liable for the failure than if it had not exercised the
- i power at all. To constitute a tort, there must be a duty owed to the plaintiff by the defendant not to cause injury and an act of omission which causes it; and on the

16 [1932] AC at 619, [1932] All ER Rep at 30

17 [1932] AC 562 at 580, [1932] All ER Rep 1 at 11

18 [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 580, [1964] AC 465 at 482

19 [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

20 [1940] 4 All ER 527, [1941] AC 74

facts of the East Suffolk case¹, the House of Lords concluded that the authority there had not caused any injury. On the facts of this case, however, I take the view that but for what the council did so carelessly, the house would, on the balance of probability, never have been built on the unstable foundation, and I would hold that that careless act did cause the injury and that this is not a case which is to be equated with one where the authority, while endeavouring to exercise a power to cure a damaging situation, fails to do so.

Nor, in my judgment, is the East Suffolk case¹ an authority for the proposition advanced on behalf of the council that it would be wrong, because it would deter statutory bodies from exercising their functions, to hold that a council which had no duty to exercise a power may be in a worse position if, while endeavouring to exercise it, it does so in a way which causes injury to the plaintiff. So to hold would in my view be to fly in the face of the authorities which were analysed in the East Suffolk case¹ and establish that although an authority exercising a power is not liable for injury which would have been suffered had it not exercised the power, it is liable to injury carelessly caused in the exercise. Viscount Simon LC in his speech² in that case expressed the view that if what was done had caused fresh damage, the authority would have been liable for that damage. None of their Lordships in the East Suffolk case¹ dissented from the statement of the law by Lord Parker of Waddington in *Great Central Railway Co v Hewlett*³:

'...it is undoubtedly a well-settled principle of law that when statutory powers are conferred they must be exercised with reasonable care, so that if those who exercise them could by reasonable precaution have prevented an injury which has been occasioned, and was likely to be occasioned, by their exercise, damage for negligence may be recovered.'

I add only this in relation to the East Suffolk case¹, namely, that regarded as an authority on causation, the facts there were so very different from those in the present case, that I cannot regard it as authority to support the contention that in the instant case, the local authority cannot be regarded as having caused the injury suffered by the plaintiff. There, the event which caused the damage had already happened before the board did that of which complaint is made. Here, as I emphasise again—and this is the basis of my judgment—the house would on the balance of probability never have been built but for the carelessness of the council.

On behalf of the council, reliance was placed on the decision of the House of Lords in *Robertson v Fleming*⁴, as authority for the proposition that where A does something on behalf of B for the benefit of others, including C, if as a result of the carelessness of A in the performance of his task, C loses an intended benefit which would have accrued to him had the act or service been carefully performed, C cannot recover damages against A. Accepting that *Robertson v Fleming*⁴ is authority for the proposition so stated, the proposition does not in my judgment assist the council, but merely shows that I have no duty so to act as to confer an advantage on my neighbour. The proposition assumes that what C loses is an intended benefit and his position after the act of carelessness by A is precisely the same as it was before.

Nor can I equate the facts of the instant case with those in *Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd*⁵, where liability for a careless misrepresentation was established. There, the liability was held to extend only in favour of one who acted in reliance on the misrepresentation; and since in the instant case the plaintiff did not rely on the council, so here, it is submitted, there is no liability. But the speeches in the Hedley Byrne case⁵ extended the area of liability and did not restrict it. The speeches there are to be read with regard to the question which fell to be decided, and

1 [1940] 4 All ER 527, [1941] AC 74

2 [1940] 4 All ER at 533, [1941] AC at 87

3 [1916] 2 AC 511 at 519, [1916-17] All ER Rep 1027 at 1029

4 (1861) 4 Macq 167

5 [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465

a I cannot accept that any of their Lordships would have regarded their language as exempting from liability C, a man who having taken on himself the task of directing the traffic, carelessly told B that the road was clear, with the result that A was injured in the ensuing collision. The distinction between the Hedley Byrne case⁶ and this case is that there there could be no damage suffered except by a person who relied on what was done and said by the defendant, and the defendant could only have had in contemplation as someone who might be injured by his carelessness, a person who might rely on his statement. Hence, the insistence in the speeches in the Hedley Byrne case⁶ on the necessity for reliance by the plaintiff and proximity as a necessary ingredient of the tort. Here, on the other hand, if my approach to the facts be right, injury could be and was suffered by the plaintiff as a result of the council's carelessness, and she was a person so closely and directly affected by the act of the council that they ought reasonably to have had her in contemplation as being so affected. Accordingly, in my judgment it is not necessary for the plaintiff here to establish that the plaintiff relied on the council in order to complete her cause of action.

d Reliance was also placed on such cases as *Cavalier v Pope*⁷ and *Bottomley v Bannister*⁸, as establishing that where injury arises from the defective state of land or of a ruinous house sold or let by the defendant who ceases to be in occupation of the property, he is not generally liable, apart from contract, unless he has acted fraudulently. It would, so the argument runs, be anomalous if the vendor who had erected the house was under no common law duty to a purchaser for injury caused by the careless way in which he or his builder had done so, but the local authority, who played no part in the construction, was nevertheless held to be liable. It is not in my view open to this court to question the true effect of this line of authority. Nor do I see any necessity so to do in order to hold the council liable; for as a matter of logic or common sense, there is, as I see it, no reason to acquit the council of negligence because the former owner or even the builder cannot be made liable. The fact that the owner or builder of a house has no common law duty to a purchaser not to put into the market a dangerous house, would not lead to the conclusion that the local authority, taking on themselves to satisfy themselves that the house is built on secure foundations, have no duty to a purchaser to carry out carefully the very task which they have set out to perform.

g I now come to consider the submission advanced by counsel for the council to the effect that it would be an extension of the law to hold that the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff is an injury for which damages may be recovered. It is pointed out that in the past a distinction has been drawn between constructing a dangerous article and constructing one which is defective or of inferior quality. I may be liable to one who purchases in the market a bottle of ginger beer which I have carelessly manufactured and which is dangerous and causes injury to person or property; but it is not the law that I am liable to him for the loss he suffers because what is found inside the bottle and for which he has paid money is not ginger beer but water. I do not warrant, except to an immediate purchaser, and then by the contract and not in tort, that the thing I manufacture is reasonably fit for its purpose. The submission is I think a formidable one and in my view raises the most difficult point for decision in this case. Nor can I see any valid distinction between the case of a builder who carelessly builds a house which, although not a source of danger to person or property, nevertheless owing to a concealed defect in its foundations starts to settle and crack and becomes valueless, and the case of a manufacturer who carelessly manufactures an article which, although not a source of danger to a subsequent owner or to his other property, nevertheless owing to a hidden defect quickly disintegrates. To hold that either the builder or the manufacturer was liable, except in contract, would be to open up a new field of liability, the extent of which could not I think be logically controlled, and since it is not in my judgment necessary to do so for the purposes of this case, I do not, more particularly because of the absence of the builder, express an opinion whether the builder has a higher or lower duty than the manufacturer. But the distinction between the case of the manufacturer of a dangerous thing which causes damage and that of a thing which turns out to be defective and valueless lies I think not in the nature of the injury but in the character of the duty. I have a duty not carelessly to put out a dangerous thing which may cause damage to one who may purchase it, but the duty does not extend to putting out carelessly a defective or useless or valueless thing. So again one goes back to consider what was the character of the duty, if any, owed to the plaintiff, and one finds on authority that the injury which is one of the essential elements of the tort of negligence is not confined to physical damage to personal property but may embrace economic damage which the plaintiff suffers through buying a worthless thing, as is shown by the Hedley Byrne case⁹. So the point that raises the difficulty in this case does not, as I see it, arise from the fact that the injury suffered here was the loss of the value of the house or the cost of putting it right. What causes the difficulty—and it is I think at this point that the court is asked to apply the law of negligence to a new situation—is that whereas the builder had, as I will assume, no duty to the plaintiff not carelessly to build a house with a concealed defect, yet it is sought to impute a not dissimilar duty to the defendant council. At this point I repeat and emphasise the difference between the position of a local authority clothed with the authority of an Act of Parliament to perform the function of making sure that the foundations of a house are secure for the benefit of the subsequent owners of the house and a builder who is concerned to make a profit. So approaching the matter there is in my judgment nothing illogical or anomalous in fixing the former with a duty to which the latter is not subject. The former by undertaking the task is in my judgment undertaking a responsibility at least as high as that which the defendant in the Hedley Byrne case⁹ would in the opinion of the majority in the House of Lords have undertaken had he not excluded responsibility.

6 [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465

8 [1932] 1 KB 458

7 [1906] AC 428

In coming to the conclusion that the situation in the instant case was what Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest¹⁰ there called 'a duty situation', I derive assistance from the conclusion of the majority in the House of Lords in the Dorset Yacht case¹¹. There the defendant was held liable not on the ground that it had committed a breach of its statutory duty, nor on the ground that in exercise of its statutory powers it had itself done an act which caused the plaintiff damage, but, as here, for a careless failure or omission while exercising its powers to prevent the happening of that which caused the damage.

If I am correct in my view that the council here was, like the careless architect in *Clay v A J Crump & Sons Ltd*¹², in control of the situation, in that it had taken on itself to see whether or not the foundations were safe and that but for its carelessness the house would not have been built, I am also assisted to my conclusion that the council is here liable on the authority of that case. I too would dismiss the appeal.

I would particularly express my appreciation of the skill of counsel in leading me, however unsuccessful the journey may have been, through what was previously an unknown and at one time seemed an impenetrable forest.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords granted.

Solicitors: Doyle, Devonshire, Box & Co, agents for Sparrow & Sparrow, Bognor Regis (for the council); Woodham Smith, Borradaile & Martin, agents for Hubbard & Co, Chichester (for the plaintiff).

Wendy Shockett Barrister.

⁹ [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465

¹⁰ In Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd [1970] 2 All ER at 307, [1970] AC at 1038

¹¹ [1970] 2 All ER 294, [1970] AC 1004

¹² [1963] 3 All ER 687, [1964] 1 QB 533

a Howitt (Widow and administratrix of Richard Arthur Howitt) v Heads

YORK ASSIZES

CUMMING-BRUCE J

21st, 22nd OCTOBER 1971

b

Fatal accident – Damages – Assessment – Deduction from damages – Earning capacity of widow – Young widow intending eventually to resume employment – Whether her earning ability factor to be taken into account.

c Fatal accident – Damages – Assessment – Dependent child – Whether prospects of re-marriage of mother to be enquired into when calculating damages – Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971, s 4 (1).

Fatal accident – Damages – Assessment – Multiplier – Considerations relevant to multiplier since passing of Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971, s 4 (1).

d The plaintiff's husband was killed on 26th June 1970 as a result of a road accident for which the defendant was wholly liable. At the date of his death the husband was 21 years of age and had married the plaintiff, then aged 20, only three weeks before the accident. A child was born to the plaintiff widow on 22nd October 1970 of whom the deceased husband was the father. The widow brought an action for damages under, inter alia, the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959 on behalf of herself e and the child. The deceased had been a post office engineer, earning at the date of his death £20.46 per week. He had prospects of promotion and it was estimated that by the date of the trial of the action he would have been receiving a net remuneration of £26 per week. The widow, who until she ceased work shortly before the birth of the child had been earning £10 a week as the manageress of a confectionery business, stated at the hearing that she would probably be resuming employment at f some future date—perhaps when the child was at school—as she and her husband had originally intended. The trial judge allowed £18 per week (£936 per annum) for the total dependency of widow and child. The question then arose as to the capital value that should be placed on the loss of dependency.

g Held – (i) In calculating under the Fatal Accidents Acts the financial value of the injuries sustained by the widow as a result of her husband's death, the court had to disregard (a) the widow's prospects of remarriage by virtue of s 4 (1)^a of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971 and (b) her earning potential (despite her expressed intention to return to work) since her capacity to earn was a result of her ability and was not a gain resulting from the death of her husband (see p 495 c to f g and j and p 496 a, post); Goodger v Knapman [1924] SASR 347 and Usher v Williams (1955) h 60 WALR 69 followed.

(ii) Although s 4 (1) of the 1971 Act did not expressly provide that the court should not enquire into a widow's prospects of remarriage when calculating the damages payable for the benefit of a child of the deceased, for the purposes of determining in the present case the total sum of damages to be awarded, such an enquiry was immaterial; it was only in relation to the apportionment of the damages awarded j that it might be relevant (see p 492 h to p 493 a, post).

(iii) Disregarding the widow's prospects of remarriage and her earning potential, a Section 4 (1) provides: 'In assessing damages payable to a widow in respect of the death of her husband in any action under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846 to 1959 there shall not be taken into account the remarriage of the widow or her prospects of remarriage.'

the proper multiplier to be applied was 18 and accordingly the capital value to be placed on the loss of dependency was £16,848 (see p 497 f, post). a

Notes

For actions under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959 and deductions from damages, see 28 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 100, 101, para 110, and 103, 104, para 113, and for cases on the subject, see 36 Digest (Repl) 211-214, 1111-1132.

For the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971, s 4, see Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) Current Statute Service, p 807. b

Cases referred to in judgment

Davies v Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries Ltd [1942] 1 All ER 657, [1942] AC 601, 111 LJB 418, 167 LT 74, 36 Digest (Repl) 231, 1229.

Goodger v Knapman [1924] SASR 347.

Taylor v O'Connor [1970] 1 All ER 365, [1971] AC 115, [1970] 2 WLR 472, Digest (Cont Vol C) 754, 1194l. c

Usher v Williams (1955) 60 WALR 69, Digest (Cont Vol A) 1209, *2119d.

Cases also cited

Mallett v McMonagle [1969] 2 All ER 178, [1970] AC 166.

Mitchell v Mulholland (No 2) [1971] 2 All ER 1205, [1971] 2 WLR 1271. d

Action

This was an action in which Bernadette Howitt, the plaintiff widow and administratrix of the estate of Richard Arthur Howitt, claimed (i) under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959 damages for herself and for Richard Paul Howitt her infant son by her deceased husband and (ii) under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934 damages for the deceased's estate. The deceased died in a road accident on 26th June 1970. The defendant, Brian Arthur Heads, admitted that the death of the deceased was caused by his negligent driving and the sole issue was that of assessment of damages. The facts with regard to that issue are set out in the judgment. e

JFS Cobb QC and CJ Holland for the widow. f

JA Cotton for the defendant.

Cur adv vult

22nd October. CUMMING-BRUCE J. This is an action for damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959 and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934, brought by the widow for the benefit of herself and her infant son. The case has for me an element of novelty in that it is the first time that I have to make the assessment of damages since the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971 came into force. As a consequence of that Act, in assessing damages payable to a widow in respect of the death of her husband in any action under the Fatal Accidents Acts, there shall not be taken into account the remarriage of the widow or her prospects of remarriage. I observe that this is a case in which the action is brought for the benefit not only of the widow, but of the infant son of the deceased, and having regard to the language of s 4 (1) of the 1971 Act, it appears that although it is the duty of the court to disregard the prospects of remarriage of the widow—her remarriage in relation to the damages payable to herself—no such exclusion is expressly provided in the case of damages payable for the benefit of children of the deceased. There may be cases in which that difference is of real significance. There was no discussion of this point in argument before me, and counsel for the defendant did not embark on any enquiry as to prospects of remarriage, doubtless having in mind the policy of the Act which had its origin in public distaste for enquiry into the delicate topic of prospects of remarriage after death of the first husband. I have come to the conclusion that, g a on the facts of this case, it is not material for any decision that I have to make in determining the total sum to embark on the question of prospects of remarriage. It may fall to be discussed in relation to apportionment, but I am satisfied that it would make no difference to what is described as the global sum.

h

i

The death of the deceased took place on 26th June 1970. He was then 21 and the widow, as she is now, was 20. They had been married three weeks before the death of the deceased. The background of the marriage is that they had been courting b for four years. Some five or six months before the marriage they had bought a little house with the aid of a loan of £400, which they were repaying at £2 a week, and during the months before marriage and after purchase of the house, he and she had worked hard on the house, on electrical wiring, plumbing and decoration. The son was born posthumously on 22nd October 1970. Before marriage the widow c had been, in spite of her youth, employed as the manageress in a confectionery business at a remuneration of £10 a week. After marriage she continued working in that employment. Their intention was that she should continue to work until the pregnancy made it sensible for her to stay at home. In evidence (which I accept) in discussion of their long-term plans, the widow said they had contemplated a family d of two children, and that she envisaged she might well return to remunerative employment herself at some future date, when the children were off to school. I appreciate that there are many changes and chances which affect such carefully laid plans, and I do not approach the case on the basis that these two had any settled or clear idea as to what sort of family they would, in the end, decide to have, but the widow, who was a candid witness, did her best to describe their mutual intentions as far as they had got.

e My task is to assess a sum proportionate to the injury resulting from the death of the deceased, so I turn to the facts relevant to dependency. I had the advantage of a paper setting forth computations of the expected net earnings of the deceased over the future years, and computations of his earnings after tax during the period in which he had been employed in his employment. By occupation he was a post office engineer. He had served his apprenticeship. He was at all times employed in that f occupation and, as far as is known, intended to stick to it. On the first page of the computations of expected net income after deduction of income tax and national insurance contributions, there are set out actual earnings for the 26 weeks up to 26th June 1970, when he died, at £20.46 per week take-home pay. Then in the succeeding items on that page, which summarises the calculations set out in subsequent pages, there are computations based on his gross and net remuneration after the rises in pay, increases in basic rates, which took place on 1st July 1970 and 1st July g 1971. The third item shows his remuneration, assuming he had been promoted to the grade of technician (1). That, curiously, shows a drop in gross and net earnings. Counsel for the widow explained to me that that was founded on the fact that in that grade, although there is greater security of employment, there is a fall in gross remuneration and the final item shows what his estimated earnings would have h been assuming he had been promoted to a senior technician. Of course the prospects of such promotion are clouded in uncertainty, but I approach the case on the basis that his history up to his death had been of a man who had settled with stability into skilled employment, in which he appeared to have a secure future with the prospects of added remuneration shown in the paper. Of course the paper does not deal with future changes in basic rate, but confines itself to those increases of which i the court can take note as a result of actual knowledge.

I take the view that I should approach the case on the basis of a net remuneration of £26 and I do so. Now what deductions fall to be made from that sum in relation to those sums which were expended as a result of the personal expense of the deceased? The widow agreed in evidence that by today it would cost at any rate £4 a week to feed her husband. I was told that he did not spend much on his clothing; that he did not smoke; that he had a moderate intake of alcoholic refreshment.

That last feature of his expenditure was elaborated slightly. He used to go out in these early days of marriage about twice a week with his friends. The widow said that he enjoyed going to rugby football matches at weekends, and I accept that he spent a little more then than during the working week. He ran a secondhand car which he used for the purposes of getting to and from his work, and for the purposes of his and her recreation. The petrol expenditure of the car, insofar as he used it for the purposes of going to his place of employment, was, I understand, subject to a contribution towards the petrol cost on such occasions. I had no detail thereof. He was described, and I accept the description, as being a man of some technical capacity and skill in matters mechanical and electronic. Thus he was a person who was able to tinker with his motor car and achieve improvements in its performance which others might have to do expensively at a garage. And he was able to help the widow in the wiring of the house that they bought.

The marriage only endured for a matter of three weeks before he was killed, and thus there is not, and cannot be in this case, any view of the settled habits of the two in matrimony. They had not had time to achieve a routine. But I approach the case on the basis that the widow had married a steady young man who entered marriage eager to build a home. They bought their house with a loan which they were repaying, and he was evidently taking a lot of trouble, giving up a good deal of time, to feather the nest. But it is a case in which there cannot be any detailed enquiry into the financial budget of the family—the more so because during the brief period of cohabitation the widow was still earning £10 a week, and thus was only asking for a modest sum from the deceased as a contribution to the housekeeping. I accepted her evidence that during that period he was behaving in a responsible way and was saving what he could. I find as a fact that after she ceased work the prospect was that the deceased would face the financial responsibilities that they had as a family, so that would place a limitation on the opportunity that he would have for spending money on his amusements. I have come to the conclusion that, taking £26 as the net earnings over a prospective period, the element that represents the widow's dependency is a sum of £18 a week, and it is on the basis of that financial deprivation that I approach the assessment of damages.

Counsel for the widow invited me to add to the pure financial loss, the fact that he subscribed to the family an additional element relating to the financial value to the widow of the services of the deceased, by reason of the fact that he was the kind of man who had both the qualification and the intention of doing the kind of work in the home, or on the car, which in the case of many families has to be met by paid services. I am satisfied that, during the period before marriage, he was indeed working with her in the way described on their little house and affected significant improvements to it, with the result that when it had to be sold after death they got a good deal more for it than they had paid. However, facing the vast number of uncertainties which are inevitable on a history such as this, I have decided that the sum of £18 which I allow for dependency is a fair figure, representing the total dependency of the widow and their son.

On the basis of that dependency I approach the next problem, which is the problem of the capital sum which fairly represents the injury to the widow occurring from the death. I have to do it with rather less guidance from authority than has for many years been possible in Fatal Accidents Acts cases, as a consequence of the new situation flowing from the effect of s 4 (1) of the 1971 Act. Here is a young widow, now aged 21, with one child. Her prospects of remarriage are not to be taken into account. The situation as I see it is this: on the widow's evidence it is likely, being evidently a lady of ability, that when it is convenient for her to make suitable arrangements for their son, she probably will at some stage—perhaps when the boy starts going to school—resume employment, not only to have the advantage of the money, but also because obviously it is likely to make life more interesting for her. And so, peering into the future, I envisage a situation in which it is likely that after a period of a years, probably not very far ahead, she will resume employment and make a good deal of money every week as a result. That, of course, is on the contingency that she does not remarry with all the implications that that might have—implications which I have to leave out of account.

b What is the correct approach in a Fatal Accidents Acts case to the situation of a widow who has an earning capacity which she will probably use after a fairly short period of years? As far as I know there is no explicit authority in English cases, though there is a good deal of authority to the effect that a wife's private means are not to be taken into account. There is a useful discussion in the well-known textbook, Kemp and Kemp¹, on the relevance or otherwise of a widow's capacity to support herself, and there have been two cases in Australia, one of which was approved in the High Court of Australia, dealing with the matter. In *Goodger v Knapman*² (and I rely on the citation from that case given in the textbook to which I have referred) c Murray LJ said:

d 'Mr. Thomson asked me to make a further reduction by reason of the widow being relieved from the heavier part of her domestic duties and thereby set free to go out and earn something on her own account. I do not accede to the suggestion, as I am unable to see how liberty to work can reasonably be brought within the description of a pecuniary advantage she has derived from the death of her husband. Any money she might earn would be the result of her labour, not of his death.'

The same decision was made by Wolff J in Western Australia in *Usher v Williams*³:

e 'The argument for the diminution of the claim by some allowance for the widow's earning potential proceeds on the theory that the husband's death has released a flood of earning capacity... In my opinion the plaintiff's ability to earn is not a gain resulting from the death of her husband within the principle established by *Davies v. Powell Duffryn Collieries, Ltd*⁴. The widow's ability to work was always there and she could perhaps, as women do, particularly in professions, have preferred to work after marriage. The same argument that is put f forward for the defendants could be applied to any woman who goes out to work through necessity to support herself and her children following her husband's death, and if it can be applied to the widow there is no reason why it should not be used to diminish or extinguish the children's claims in a case where, by her efforts, she is able to support them as well as her husband did in his lifetime... g I therefore hold that the widow's earning capacity is not to be taken into account in diminution of damages.'

I agree with the principle enunciated in those cases and I follow them. I therefore make no deduction in respect of the widow's capacity to earn, even though I am satisfied as a matter of probability that she will fairly soon be obtaining a significant degree of financial independence. So when I approach the capitalisation of the loss, h it appears that the situation is really very different from the assessment of damages that arises in other branches of the law of torts. I have to make a calculation of the financial value of the injuries sustained by the widow. As a result of the 1971 Act I have to close my eyes to what may be reality and close my mind to the financial consequences for the widow of prospects of remarriage. This in many cases inevitably introduces an element of unreality to the assessment of real loss of the widow. j It would not, having regard to the Act, be right for me to express any view at all on what the prospects of remarriage are in this case. In consequence that one element

1 The Quantum of Damages (2nd Edn), vol 2, p 272

2 [1924] SASR 347 at 358

3 (1955) 60 WALR 69 at 80, 81

4 [1942] 1 All ER 657, [1942] AC 601

of reality has to be left out of account as I form my view of the widow's future prospects. And, as a result of the view that I have formed following the Australian cases, I am of the opinion that I must also exclude from my calculation any advantage that the widow may in the future derive from remuneration as a consequence of her own intention to return to work, which in the present case means that I exclude another factor which is a reality in the future life of the widow. a

The exercise on which I embark, in seeking to capitalise her loss therefore has two elements of some artificiality; but by statute I consider that I am bound to postulate one artificiality, and on principle, having regard to the approach of the court to the widow's own capacity to earn, I think it is my duty to introduce the second artificiality. Having regard to the age and good health of the deceased, subject to what is commonly described the changes and chances of life, he had a prospect of remunerative employment of not less than 40 years, and having regard to the widow's health and youth, her expectation of life is at least as good as his. And so, subject as I say to changes and chances of the unknown future, the widow has been deprived of the prospect of a settled and stable financial future afforded by the deceased over a period of some 40 years. b

The reason why there is very little to guide me on the capitalisation of the financial loss is that in past years, through the whole experience of the Fatal Accidents Acts, in such a case the courts, inevitably taking into account the prospect of remarriage of the young lady of 20 or 21 with one child, or sometimes two or more children, have taken the view that that was a real element in the future which should be given great significance according to the facts of the particular case, in curtailing the probable period for which the injury following the death would continue. Now, for the reasons stated, I have to disregard that very important factor. c

Counsel for the widow put in, as an aid to testing the effect of an award of £15,000, some tables showing what the effect would be if such a sum was invested to yield either 3 per cent or 4 per cent and I approach the case on the basis of the guidance given in the House of Lords in *Taylor v O'Connor*⁵. I cite in particular a passage from the speech of Lord Pearson, which I think counsel for the widow had in mind when he caused to be prepared the tables that he put before me. Lord Pearson said⁶: d

'The fund of damages is not expected to be preserved intact. It is expected to be used up gradually over the relevant period—15 or 18 years in this case—so as to be exhausted by the end of the period. [The case with which their Lordships were dealing was a case where the deceased was 53 at the time of death and the respondent 52.] Therefore, what the respondent receives annually—£3,750 in this case—is made up partly of income and partly of capital. As the fund is used up, the income becomes less and less and the amounts withdrawn from the capital of the fund become greater and greater, because the total sum to be provided in each year—the £3,750—is assumed (subject to what is said below), to remain constant throughout the relevant period. It is not difficult, although somewhat laborious, to work out without expert assistance how long a given fund will last with a given rate of net interest and a given sum of money to be provided in each year.' e

Then Lord Pearson gives the first few lines of such a calculation to show the method, which was the method counsel for the widow presented to me. When one looks at counsel's figures showing the consequences of an award of £15,000 invested at 3 per cent on the basis that the loss of dependency was £1,000, so that that is the income one is seeking to afford the widow throughout the future, it appears that on that investment of 3 per cent the fund disappears altogether in the twentieth year. f a And at 4 per cent it disappears in the twenty-third year. Counsel for the defendant called evidence from a stockbroker who made calculations on the ways in which a capital fund might be invested, having regard to the present state of the market, and he pointed out that if the capital sum awarded to the widow was invested in dated stock, that it could command an interest rate of 8 per cent. Of course the disadvantage of investment in a dated Treasury bond is that at the end of the dated period, b the capital is returned intact at its initial value; therefore in the event of the value of money having fallen say by half over a long period, the real value of the capital at the end of the period is one half of what it was initially. Hence it is that those who deal with investment advice always have to do a balancing act between high interest-bearing stock, which will depreciate in real value over the years, and growth stock which is unlikely to command a dividend of more than 3-4 per cent, but which will provide for the preservation of the real value of the capital.

⁵ [1970] 1 All ER 365, [1971] AC 115

⁶ [1970] 1 All ER at 379, [1971] AC at 143, 144 g

c The stockbroker naturally said that in his experience it was common, after deciding the income that the capital owner required, to give advice striking some sort of balance between the secure interest policy and the low interest value of growth security. On an £18 a week dependency the annual loss of dependency is £936. So that I seek by my award to provide the widow with capital that will afford her and d her son over the foreseeable future an income of £936, and I find in the speeches of the House of Lords in the case to which I have referred an indication that it is by the management of the capital fund that the widow may reasonably expect to counteract the probable fall in the value of money as a consequence of inflation. I have looked at annuity tables and I have taken them into account as providing one test of the appropriateness of the calculations, but I accept unhesitatingly the view e frequently expressed that the actual evidence of such computations (and there is no evidence in this case of actuarial character) is of limited value in assistance in a Fatal Accidents Acts case.

I hope that I have thus indicated the factors that have affected my mind, and I have decided that the capital value that should be placed on the loss of dependency by the widow is the sum of £16,848. If my arithmetic is correct it will be found that f can be represented as a multiplier of 18. There is a claim under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934 in respect of which I award the conventional sum of £500 which falls to be deducted from the Fatal Accidents Acts claim. There are funeral expenses at £71.23 which fall to be added to the claim under the 1934 Act by way of addition. Those are the figures which I award before dealing with apportionment.

g [His Lordship, after considering the submissions of counsel relating to apportionment, directed that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff widow and administratrix for £18,384.23, apportioned as to £571.23 under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934, as to £16,348 under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846-1959 (apportioned as to £14,348 in respect of the widow and as to £2,000 in respect of her infant son) and as to £1,465 interest on £16,919.23 at the rate of 7½ per cent from 27th h August 1970, the date of the service of the writ, until the date of judgment.]

Judgment for the widow accordingly.

Solicitors: Lee & Priestley, Bradford (for the widow); Eaton Smith & Downey, Huddersfield (for the defendant).

John M Collins Esq Barrister.

Commissioners of Customs and Excise v Beecham Foods Ltd

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD REID, LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, LORD WILBERFORCE, LORD PEARSON AND LORD DIPLOCK

29th OCTOBER, 1ST, 2ND, 3RD, 4TH, 8TH NOVEMBER 1971, 26TH JANUARY 1972

Purchase tax – Chargeable goods – Drugs and medicines – Syrup of blackcurrant containing vitamin C – Ribena – Ribena on market principally as health drink for normally healthy persons – Predominant use as a refreshing drink which might also make good any vitamin C deficiency in diet – Use to increase vitamin C intake of expectant and nursing mothers – Occasional use to prevent recurrence of scurvy – Whether a ‘drug or medicine’ – Whether exempt from charge as a preparation consisting of a scheduled substance and a vehicle – Purchase Tax Act 1963, s 2 (1), Sch 1, Part I, r 1 and Group 33 – Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968 (SI 1968 No 1511), art 1, Schedule, Head III.

The respondents manufactured, under the trade name ‘Ribena’, a syrup consisting as to 70 per cent of syrup of blackcurrant BPC (which had a natural vitamin C content), as to 25.6 per cent of syrup BP, and as to 0.19 per cent of added vitamin C. When diluted with water, Ribena provided a drink which was (a) thirst-quenching, (b) pleasant in appearance and taste, and (c) rich in vitamin C. Ribena was predominantly sold and advertised as a health drink to normally healthy persons, in particular children who were allowed and encouraged to have it not only because it was refreshing but also because it would help to make up any vitamin C deficiency there might be in their diet. Expectant and nursing mothers might be advised to take Ribena in order to increase their intake of vitamin C. Ribena was not strong enough to effect a cure for the disease of scurvy, caused by lack of vitamin C, but it could be used to stabilise a cure and prevent a recurrence of the disease. By s 2 (1)^a of the Purchase Tax Act 1963 the goods chargeable to tax were those comprised in the groups listed in Part I of Sch 1 to the Act other than goods which were exempt from all charge to tax under Part I. By s 2 (2), the list of groups in Part I were to be interpreted, inter alia, in accordance with r 1 at the beginning of Part I which provided that where a group began with a general description of the goods comprised in the group, the goods mentioned below in the group (including those mentioned under a heading ‘exempt’) comprised only goods falling within the general description. Section 2 (3) empowered the Treasury to amend Part I of Sch 1 to the Act by order made by statutory instrument. Group 33 of Part I of Sch 1 to the Act comprised ‘Drugs and medicines, manufactured or prepared (except toilet preparations)’ and, as amended, exempted from charge under the heading ‘exempt’ goods specified in the Schedule to the Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968^b. Group 35, so far as material, comprised ‘Manufactured beverages, including... syrups, concentrates... for the preparation of beverages’. Article 1 of the 1968 Order provided that ‘Drugs and medicines, manufactured or prepared (except toilet preparations) of any of the classes specified in the Schedule to this Order shall not be included in any class of goods which are chargeable goods’ under the 1963 Act. Head III in the Schedule to the 1968 Order comprised ‘The substances described under this head [which included vitamins], and preparations consisting only of one of those substances and one or more of the following things, namely, an excipient, vehicle, base or preservative...’ The appellants contended that Ribena was a ‘medicine’ within the general heading ‘Drugs and medicines’ to Group 33 and, since it consisted of a vitamin and a a 'vehicle' (i.e. blackcurrant syrup), was exempt from tax chargeable under Group 33, and therefore under any other group including Group 35, as being goods specified in the Schedule to the 1968 Order; alternatively, that even if Ribena was not a drug or medicine within the general heading to Group 33 it was, being goods specified in the Schedule to the 1968 Order, definitively declared to be a drug or medicine, and hence exempt, by the terms of art 1 of the 1968 Order.

^a Section 2, so far as material, is set out at p 509 f and g, post

^b SI 1968 No 1511

b Held (Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest dissenting) – Ribena was chargeable to purchase tax under Group 35 of Sch 1 to the 1963 Act for the following reasons—

(i) Ribena plainly fell within Group 35 as a manufactured syrup for the preparation of a beverage; the fact that a beverage had medicinal qualities did not prevent it falling within that group; accordingly Ribena was chargeable under Group 35 unless it was a 'medicine' and was thus within the general heading to Group 33 and was exempt from tax by virtue of the exemption contained in that group; in consequence of r 1 in Part I of Sch 1 to the 1963 Act, Ribena could only obtain the benefit of the exemption under Group 33 if it fell within the general heading 'Drugs and medicines'; if it did not fall within that heading it was irrelevant that it was one of the goods specified in the Schedule to the 1968 Order (see p 500 d and g, p 509 b and c, p 510 a and j to p 511 b and p 512 j, post);

d (ii) Ribena did not fall within the general heading 'Drugs and medicines' in Group 33 since it was not a medicine; the broad question was whether it was only an article of diet, included in the diet as being conducive to general health, or a medicine taken for the cure or prevention of some particular disease; on the evidence Ribena was on the market as a 'health drink' for everyone however healthy and was sold to and for normally healthy persons; it was sold neither therapeutically nor prophylactically, but as a diet supplement to those not shown to be in particular need of vitamin C more than any other element of normal diet; it was therefore immaterial that Ribena could be, and in a relatively minute number of cases was, used for purposes which might be described as medicinal (see p 501 e to g, p 506 g, p 508 d to g and p 511 j to p 512 c f and j, post).

f Per Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest and Lord Pearson. In determining the question whether Ribena was a medicine no assistance could be obtained from the view which the commissioners had, rightly or wrongly, formed with regard to other comparable products. Accordingly (per Lord Pearson) it was right not to allow interrogatories on this matter (see p 503 b and p 512 g, post).

Decision of the Court of Appeal [1971] 1 All ER 701 reversed.

g Notes

For chargeable goods for the purposes of purchase tax, see 33 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 223-227, paras 383-387, and for cases on purchase tax, see 39 Digest (Repl) 348-351, 822-839.

For the Purchase Tax Act 1963, s 2, Sch 1, Part I, r 1, Group 33 and Group 35, see 26 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 635, 675, 690.

h The Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968 (SI 1968 No 1511) was superseded by the Purchase Tax (No 1) Order 1970 (SI 1970 No 364) which has in turn been superseded by the Purchase Tax (No 5) Order 1971 (SI 1971 No 1166).

Appeal

j This was an appeal by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise against an order of the Court of Appeal (Russell, Edmund Davies and Cross LJJ) dated 3rd December 1970 and reported [1971] 1 All ER 701 reversing a decision of Ungood-Thomas J dated 9th May 1969 and reported [1969] 3 All ER 135, and holding that a product manufactured by the respondents, Beecham Foods Ltd, under the name 'Ribena' was a drug or medicine within Group 33 of Sch 1, Part I to the Purchase Tax Act 1963 and that it was exempt from charge to purchase tax as being one of the goods specified under Head III in the Schedule to the Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968. The facts are set out in the speech of Lord Reid. a Jeremiah Harman QC and J P Warner for the commissioners.

R J Parker QC and J G Marriage for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration. b

26th January. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD REID. My Lords, the question in this case is whether purchase tax is payable in respect of sales of Ribena. It is a syrup the composition of which is shown on the label on the bottles in which it is sold: c

	Per cent.
'Syrup of Blackcurrant B.P.C.	70
Syrup B.P.	25.6
Vitamin C added19

and it is said to contain not less than 75 mg vitamin C per fluid ounce. Dilution is advised with water, soda water or milk. d

The commissioners maintain that it is taxable under the Purchase Tax Act 1963, Sch 1, Group 35, as a manufactured syrup for the preparation of a beverage. I think that it clearly comes within this class. When diluted the syrup makes a pleasant fruit drink. We have to determine the character of the goods at the stage of sale by the wholesaler to the retailer. This syrup has been on the market for many years. Sales have been very large and there has been widespread publicity and advertising. Any retailer when buying it would know the types of customers who buy it. Some will buy it without regard to any medicinal quality, simply as a pleasant fruit drink. It is rather expensive as a mere fruit drink and no doubt many will buy it with more or less regard to its medicinal properties, and more or less regard to its quality as a pleasant beverage. Some may buy it chiefly for its medicinal qualities. I can see no reason why the fact that a beverage has medicinal qualities should prevent it from falling within this group. It must be a question of fact and degree whether a particular product does fall within the group. Here I think there can be no reasonable doubt. e

But that is only the first step in determining whether this product is taxable. Group 33 comprises drugs and medicines manufactured or prepared (excluding toilet preparations) and it contains an exemption of goods specified in what is now the Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968¹. If Ribena comes within this order admittedly the effect is not only that it is exempt from tax under Group 33 but that it is also exempt from tax under any other group including Group 35. f

So the real question in this case is whether Ribena comes within the scope of that statutory instrument. Head III comprises the substances described under this head (one of which is vitamins) and also preparations consisting of one of these substances and one or more of the following things, namely an excipient, vehicle, base or preservative. The respondents maintain that Ribena consists only of a vitamin and a vehicle. I cannot agree. I think that 'vehicle' must mean a substance which being mixed with the active substance—here vitamin C—serves as a convenient means of conveying the active substance from the manufacturer into the body of the consumer. I cannot regard the blackcurrant syrup as being in the whole circumstances a vehicle within the meaning of the provision. Typically a vehicle would be an inactive substance which is of no independent value to the consumer. It would be too narrow so to confine the term, e.g. the flavour of the vehicle may be important to g a the consumer. But I think that the vehicle must be ancillary to the active substance. I do not think that that can be said of the blackcurrant juice in Ribena. Taking all the facts from whatever point of view one looks at the matter the blackcurrant juice appears to me to be a main element and probably the most important element in the product.

b The problem can also be approached by asking whether Ribena is in any true sense a medicine within the meaning of Group 33 and the Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968. There is no definition of 'medicine' so it must be construed as an ordinary word of the English language. One must look at the whole picture and decide whether, even giving to medicine a wide meaning, Ribena can be so regarded.

c It is said for the commissioners that Ribena is a mere dietary supplement. I do not think that that is at all helpful. Suppose a person needs or thinks he needs more vitamin C than he is likely to get from his ordinary diet. He may take orange juice which to my mind is plainly not a medicine, or he may take tablets of ascorbic acid which to my mind plainly is a medicine. Ribena comes somewhere between the two. Whether it is a medicine must I think be decided on wider grounds. No doubt it is capable of being used as a medicine. The label on the bottle tells you how much to take if you need or think you need a particular quantity of vitamin C. But equally one could by enquiry discover how much orange juice to take to get a particular amount of the vitamin.

d It appears to me that really the only points in favour of the respondents' contention are that Ribena is carefully prepared according to a pharmaceutical formula and that it contains a fairly large amount of the vitamin. So it is more convenient for use for medicinal purposes than other natural or manufactured foods or drinks which contain this vitamin. But I do not think that that makes it a medicine. The fact that a preparation contains some substance which by itself or in a different preparation would clearly be a medicine does not get one very far. Indeed I think that the same preparation sold with one get-up and method of marketing, advertising and user might not be a medicine while the same preparation sold with a different get-up and method of marketing, advertising and user might properly be regarded as a medicine. As with so many English nouns there is no clear limit to the denotation of the word medicine. All the circumstances must be considered and there may be cases where it is extremely difficult to decide whether or not the term medicine is properly applicable. But here I think that however one approaches the matter it would be a misuse of language to call Ribena a medicine and I would therefore allow the appeal. I agree with the view of my noble and learned friend Lord Wilberforce as to costs.

g LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, in his careful judgment Ungood-Thomas J² helpfully analysed the provisions of ss 1 and 2 of the Purchase Tax Act 1963 and the relevant provisions of Sch 1. As a consequence I find it unnecessary to refer other than briefly to certain of the issues which have arisen. If Ribena comes within the general description of the goods comprised in Group 33 but is included in the goods mentioned under a heading 'Exempt' then Ribena would be exempt from all charge to tax even though it comes within the general description of goods comprised in another group.

h I turn then to consider Group 33 which is a group comprising drugs and medicines manufactured or prepared (except toilet preparations). It is common ground that Ribena is either manufactured or prepared and that it is not a toilet preparation. If it comes within the general description of being either a drug or medicine then it will be exempt from tax if it is mentioned under a heading 'Exempt'.

j There are two exempt classes. The first is 'Goods complying with the Provisions of Part II of this Schedule'. Part II is headed 'Conditions of Exemption of Drugs and Medicines Comprised in Group 33, under Para. (1) of Heading "Exempt" in that Group'. Condition 4 in Part II is that:

'There must not appear in the get-up of the goods or on the goods apart from any get-up—(a) any trade mark as defined in the Trade Marks Act 1938 ...'

This condition was not satisfied because the trade mark Ribena does so appear. But had this condition been satisfied and if the other conditions were satisfied then it seems as though it was conceded in the Court of Appeal³ that on that basis Ribena would have been 'exempt'. Such a concession would involve or imply that in the first place Ribena came within the description 'Drugs and medicines'. If the concession was made but is withdrawn or if there was some misunderstanding in regard to it, it would not be fitting that it should form any basis for arriving at a conclusion. In my view, as I will indicate, the question whether Ribena is or is not within the description 'Drugs and medicines' is the central question in the case. I will approach that question on the basis that if any concession was either previously made or implied it should neither guide nor influence decision.

The second exempt class is of goods specified in the Schedule to the Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968⁴. Head III of the Schedule to the Order covers:

'The substances described under this head, and preparations consisting only of one of those substances and one or more of the following things, namely, an excipient, vehicle, base or preservative, or of two or more of those substances whether with one or more of the following things, namely, an excipient, vehicle, base or preservative, or not ...'

One of the substances described under Head III is 'Vitamins'. So the question arises whether Ribena is a preparation consisting of vitamins and one, or more than one, vehicle. This question was very fully explored by Ungood-Thomas J⁵ who in his judgment amply sets out his reasons for deciding that Ribena is within the particular description relied on in Head III of the Schedule. In turn this question was fully examined and explained by Russell LJ, who set out his reasons for agreeing on this question with the learned judge. Both Edmund Davies and Cross LJ came to the same conclusion and set out their reasons. I do not find it necessary to reiterate the various matters that arise in connection with this question. I agree with Ungood-Thomas J⁵ and with all the members of the Court of Appeal³.

Article 1 of the Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968 is in these terms:

'Drugs and medicines, manufactured or prepared (except toilet preparations) of any of the classes specified in the Schedule to this Order shall not be included in any class of goods which are chargeable goods within the meaning of the Purchase Tax Act 1963.'

On a first reading of these words anyone might be pardoned for supposing that it was being said that a preparation which was within one of the classes specified in the Schedule was either a drug or a medicine. Hence the point was taken that the form of the statutory instrument was such that it declared definitively that everything in the Schedule is a drug or medicine, manufactured or prepared. But in this connection it has to be remembered that r 1 in Part I of Sch 1 to the Purchase Tax Act 1963 is in these terms:

'Where a Group begins with a general description of the goods comprised in the Group, the goods mentioned below in the Group (including those mentioned under a heading "Exempt") comprise only goods falling within the general description.'

³ [1971] 1 All ER 701, [1971] 1 WLR 326

⁴ SI 1968 No 1511

⁵ [1969] 3 All ER 135, [1969] 1 WLR 1518

a In agreement with the Court of Appeal⁶ I have reached the conclusion that the point which was taken (i.e. that the statutory instrument declares definitively that everything in the Schedule is a drug or medicine, manufactured or prepared) is not sound. The exemption of goods which are specified in the Schedule to the Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968 will only operate in the case of goods which to begin with fall within the general description of the goods comprised in the group.

b It follows from what I have said that in my view the main question calling for decision is whether Ribena is a 'medicine'. No one has suggested that it could be described as a drug. In approaching this main question I do not consider that assistance can be derived from considering what view the commissioners may, whether rightly or wrongly, have formed or what attitude they may have adopted in regard to some other goods or other preparations. What then is a medicine? Ungood-Thomas J⁷ pointed to a dictionary definition of medicine (when used in a sense other than a substance) as 'the science and art concerned with the cure, alleviation, and prevention of disease, and with the restoration and preservation of health'. In line with Ungood-Thomas J I think that a fair approach is to regard a medicine as a medicament which is used to cure or to alleviate or to prevent disease or to restore health or to preserve health.

d It is clear that some goods may be comprised under more than one group of Sch 1 to the Purchase Tax Act 1963. This is shown by the fact that one of the rules provides that where goods are chargeable at more than one rate, tax is to be chargeable in respect of them at the higher or highest of those rates. The direction on a bottle of Ribena is that, being concentrated, it should always be mixed with water or soda water or cold milk. It can fairly be described as a concentrate for the preparation of a beverage. I consider therefore that it is comprised within Group 35. This circumstance does not, however, in any way affect the question whether it is also within Group 33. Something which may properly be described as a medicine within Group 33 may at the same time be a beverage within Group 35. As the legislature has accepted this, and has not introduced any such test as that of predominant user, it cannot be that something which, fairly examined and viewed, is in fact a medicine will cease to be a medicine merely because many people, finding it palatable, consume it as a beverage.

f As Ungood-Thomas J⁸ pointed out, purchase tax is a tax on the wholesale value of goods which are purchased; enquiry as to the classification of goods is directed at the wholesale stage. I agree therefore that whether a particular item is or is not a medicine cannot depend simply on its ultimate use or on the intention of an individual purchaser. So, at the wholesale stage, what is Ribena? Does a purchaser buy something that is only a medicine (in which case unless it is an exempt medicine there will be a tax at the rate of 25 per cent); or something that is only a beverage (with tax at the rate of 15 per cent); or something that is both a medicine and a beverage (in which case unless it is an exempt medicine the tax will be at the rate of 25 per cent)? For the reasons which I have given if Ribena is both a medicine and a beverage then as it is an 'exempt' medicine it will be exempt from all charge to tax either as a medicine or as a beverage.

h Ungood-Thomas J⁹ said that roughly five-sixths of the Ribena sold is sold through grocers and only one-sixth through chemists. If, even while recognising that there may perhaps be five times as many grocers as chemists, this is thought to be some sort of indication that there are more people who buy Ribena in order to consume it as a beverage than there are who buy it to consume it or take it as a medicine, this cannot effect the question to be decided. If Ribena fairly and properly regarded is a medicine and is and can be used as a medicine and if similarly fairly and properly

6 [1971] 1 All ER 701, [1970] 1 WLR 326

7 [1969] 3 All ER at 141, [1969] 1 WLR at 1527

8 [1969] 3 All ER at 141, [1969] 1 WLR at 1526, 1527

9 [1969] 3 All ER at 145, [1969] 1 WLR at 1532

regarded it is also a beverage and is and can be used as a beverage then its character and description cannot vary or be altered according as the nature and extent of its use by different groups of purchasers fluctuates. a

What then is Ribena? The ingredients are recorded on the bottles that contain it. As I have mentioned it is, as Ungood-Thomas J¹⁰ and all members of the Court of Appeal¹¹ have held, a preparation that is within the particular description relied on in Head III of the Schedule to the Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968. The important substance which the preparation contains is vitamin C. The other parts consist of materials prepared in accordance with the formulae of the British Pharmaceutical Codex and the British Pharmacopoeia. The clear conclusion of the learned judge in regard to Ribena was thus expressed¹²: b

It has always contained a minimum of vitamin C, originally 30 milligrammes per fluid ounce in accordance with the British Standard of what I understand to be the body's requirements of vitamin C, and later 75 milligrammes per fluid ounce in accordance with different, American standards. The 30 milligramme standard was checked and, where necessary, made good by adding vitamin C, for example when the black currant crops were of poor quality; and the 75 milligramme standard is similarly maintained, although for the 75 milligramme standard some substantial addition of vitamin C is always required. This case is in fact limited to a period throughout which Ribena has been kept on the 75 milligramme standard. Ribena has thus an assured vitamin C content, corresponding to a medically-ascertained standard of the body's daily needs. It is thus clearly suitable, in appropriate cases, for use as a medicine.' c

Having found that Ribena is clearly suitable in appropriate cases for use as a medicine, Ungood-Thomas J proceeded to consider the extent of its use as a medicine. His first conclusion was that Ribena is appropriate for use therapeutically only in rare and exceptional cases. His next conclusions related to its use prophylactically. Some bottles of Ribena (smaller in size than the usual size but whose labels were much as usual) are labelled 'For Sale in Clinics only'; the sale of these through local authority clinics is in total appreciably less than 1 to 2½ per cent of the total sales of Ribena. One witness (Dr Bell) gave evidence that he had recommended liquids containing vitamin C for nursing mothers and bottle-fed babies and (after heavy saturation doses of vitamin C) for children suffering from vitamin C deficiency in order to maintain the required vitamin C level until normal conditions of supply through proper diet were restored. In such cases he had allowed mothers to choose from various liquids including Ribena. He acknowledged that his recommendation of vitamin C for nursing mothers was not a frequent occurrence and might relate to 'a hard-up or feckless mother'. In this connection Ungood-Thomas J pointed out that it would be much less costly to take vitamin C in tablet form than to take it by consuming Ribena. d e
f
g

The labels on the bottles of Ribena show the precise ingredients and the minimum content of vitamin C and indicate the quantities suitable to be taken. In the advertisements the emphasis throughout is on the ingredient vitamin C for the purpose of maintaining and improving health and increasing vitality. It has not been suggested that the claims as to the content of vitamin C are other than correct. Nor can it be denied that a certain intake of vitamin C is necessary for the preservation of health. If, therefore, the consumption of Ribena results in an intake of vitamin C and if one of the reasons why people consume it is so that there will be an intake of vitamin C which will preserve and maintain health it would seem as though what is being consumed comes within the definition of medicine. That it is consumed for health h
i

¹⁰ [1969] 3 All ER 135, [1969] 1 WLR 1518

¹¹ [1971] 1 All ER 701, [1971] 1 WLR 326

¹² [1969] 3 All ER at 142, [1969] 1 WLR at 1528

a reasons is supported by the facts as found (a) that Ribena is a good deal more expensive than are soft drinks and (b) that its sales are higher in winter than in summer. It is not suggested that the name medicine may only be used in reference to what is taken on the orders of or the prescription of a doctor. Nor is it suggested that only something unpleasant of taste is to be regarded as medicine.

b What is said, however, is that Ribena is described as, and well described as, a 'health drink'. But this description would seem merely to suggest that Ribena is both a medicine and a beverage. The phrase attaches equal importance to the preservation of health and to the quenching of thirst. If both objectives may be simultaneously attained neither need be excluded. It is further said that in any reasonably normal diet there will be an adequate intake of vitamin C and that consequently any further consumption resulting from taking Ribena is neither necessary nor of value. But if something which can properly be called a medicine c is taken by someone who need not take it the nature of what he takes is not changed.

Ungoed-Thomas J¹³ was referred to a report made in 1967 by the Standing Joint Committee on the Classification of Proprietary Preparations. Under the National Health Service Act 1946 patients being treated under the general medical services are entitled to be provided with 'proper and sufficient drugs and medicines and d prescribed appliances'. This does not cover food nor, for example, ordinary beverages. But the Act does not define 'drugs and medicines' and there are many substances which are on the borderline between drugs and foods. It was clear therefore that medical practitioners needed guidance whether substances on the borderline could or could not be 'prescribed': expenditure of public money would be involved. In general the committee regarded a drug as a substance that has a pharmacological effect in the body and is used to prevent or treat disease; they regarded a food as a e substance that is taken to replace the physiological waste of tissue to supply energy and heat and to build up tissues. Where then should vitamin preparations be placed? The advice of the committee was as follows:

f 'Vitamin preparations should be regarded as drugs when used, for example, in the management of actual or potential vitamin deficiency. They should be regarded as foods when used routinely for persons such as healthy school children, factory workers and athletes and should not for this purpose be ordered on Form E.C.10.'

They classified Ribena as a food rather than a drug. This considerably influenced Ungeod-Thomas J. He posed the test whether Ribena is on the market for routine use by healthy persons or for use for the management of actual or potential vitamin g deficiency. He considered that Ribena was used routinely by healthy persons and therefore should be regarded as a diet supplement. In agreement with the Court of Appeal¹⁴ I do not think that the advice of the committee referred to above affords a correct test in the present case. The medical practitioner has to decide what to prescribe for a particular patient. So he will know whether a particular patient h does or does not need a particular medicine and if the patient does not need it it would be wrong to prescribe it and (at least in some cases) thereby to involve the expenditure of public money for an unnecessary purpose. So if Ribena is both a medicine and a beverage a doctor would not prescribe it for someone who did not need it as a medicine. We are here concerned with a very different question from that which was considered by the committee. For purchase tax purposes some i liquids may be both medicines and beverages. The only question here is whether Ribena is within this cross-section.

It seems to me that Ribena both can be used and is used 'in the management of actual or potential vitamin deficiency' and that as such it is a medicine which is taken to preserve and maintain health. Vitamin C (which is ascorbic acid) might be taken in tablet form. The medical and therapeutic effect will be the same whether taken in a liquid or in a tablet and vitamin C tablets would doubtless be within the description of 'Drugs and medicines'. It may well be the case that very many who consume Ribena both as a medicine and as a beverage and who do so in order to ensure that they will have no vitamin deficiency are not in fact in any peril of having such a deficiency. But this merely illustrates that something that can properly be called a medicine may be consumed by those who do not need to consume it. As Edmund Davies LJ said¹⁵:

¹³ [1969] 3 All ER at 141, 142, [1969] 1 WLR at 1527

¹⁴ [1971] 1 All ER 701, [1971] 1 WLR 326

'A preparation does not cease to be medicinal simply because it is taken by those who do not in reality need it and to whom it can do no good, even though they may think otherwise ...'

Furthermore if Ribena is a medicine if taken to supply an ascertained vitamin deficiency it can hardly cease to be a medicine if taken (even unnecessarily in most cases) to make sure that there will be no deficiency.

If Ribena is both a medicine and a beverage the circumstances that it is largely consumed as a beverage does not change its character. No test of predominant user is laid down. Nor can the motives that prompt consumption (if in any way material) ever be ascertained with any precision. Those who buy and consume may be the more content to take what they believe to be a needed medicament because they take it while pleasantly satisfying another need. These matters were adverted to by Russell LJ when he said¹⁶:

'I only remark in particular that Ribena is a pharmaceutical preparation; its function is to get vitamin C into human bodies in case they should need it; it is sold and advertised on the basis of that function; to describe it as a health drink is not to deny but rather to affirm these matters; to say that it is merely a fruit beverage is difficult to reconcile with its relatively considerably greater cost, its greater sales in winter than in summer, and the recommendation of dosages on the bottles.'

While I think that the case is a difficult one I have not been persuaded that the Court of Appeal¹⁷ reached a wrong conclusion and I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD WILBERFORCE. My Lords, in my opinion Ribena is a health drink, of a kind which is not a drug or medicine but which is chargeable with purchase tax under the group 'Manufactured beverages . . . and syrups, concentrates . . . for the preparation of beverages'. I think that this would be the conclusion of the average housewife or shopper, a class which pays for the greater part of 30 million (equated) bottles a year, but no member of which was called at the trial. I propose to give briefly some reasons why the law should reach this result.

We are here operating in a frontier zone of some width between food or nutrition and medicine. The frontiers are perpetually shifting as medical knowledge, fashion, and standards of life change; they will not be the same in every society or every age. The mediaeval garden grew as medicines many plants and flowers now recommended as dietary or culinary ingredients. Conversely until recently food was not, or at least not scientifically, esteemed for its chemical content. One cannot imagine Lucullus or Henry VIII calculating his protein intake.

Modern fashions direct attention to the presence in food of proteins, carbohydrates, minerals and vitamins, and this works in two directions. Nutrition experts and doctors relate their presence or absence to conditions of health or illness; and consumers in general, especially those responsible for others, such as children or invalids, are becoming accustomed to prefer products which contain them. Manufacturers of a food and drink have naturally not neglected to respond to this appeal, often in the creditable belief that by including vitamins etc in what they sell they are offering a better product and, incidentally or purposively, one which will sell better.

¹⁵ [1971] 1 All ER at 711, 712, [1971] 1 WLR at 337

¹⁶ [1971] 1 All ER at 707, [1971] 1 WLR at 332

¹⁷ [1971] 1 All ER 701, [1971] 1 WLR 326

Vitamins are chemical substances found naturally in many fruits and vegetables. It appears that they can be naturally synthesised by mammals but the art of doing this has been lost by homo sapiens, who has evolved instead the science of synthesis in a laboratory. They can now be manufactured and sold singly or in compounds, in small or massive concentration. It is this variety in the manner of administration which has given rise to many of the arguments in this case. The respondents contend that vitamins ipsa natura are drugs or medicines; the commissioners argue that they are not, or at least not necessarily so. The extreme arguments on either side are, in my opinion, fallacious or at least inconclusive. It does not follow that because vitamins in food 'are good for you' (if they are) they are drugs or medicines, any more than what originates from the River Liffey. Nor are they drugs or medicines because a doctor advises that their intake be increased. Nor because they are pharmaceutically prepared, or because they are prepared from ingredients which conform with the British Pharmaceutical Codex, are they necessarily drugs or medicines; for the Codex sets a standard for many things (e.g. syrup, BP, blackcurrant juice, and even blackcurrants) which, by themselves, cannot be drugs or medicines. They are in the Codex because they may be used as ingredients in making drugs or medicines. An argument much relied on was to say that Ribena must be looked at in the wholesale stage and that what is decisive is what is in the bottle. As the bottle discloses the presence of 75 mg of vitamin C per fluid ounce, this makes it a drug or medicine. This argument contains multiple fallacies. First, it does not follow from the fact that purchase tax is levied on the wholesale price that the goods in question must be isolated at the wholesale stage. To do so would be arbitrary and irrelevant. What is taxed is goods; the method of manufacture and the market to which they are directed and in which they are used can surely not be neglected. Secondly, it cannot be right to concentrate attention on an analysis of what is in the bottle. The range between, say, morphine and a placebo is infinitely varied and mere analysis will often fail to give an answer. In this frontier area very similar products, or even products chemically the same, may be drugs or medicines or beverages according to how they are presented, or how they are sold. Thirdly, the mere presence of vitamin C is insufficient to constitute a drug or medicine. The vitamin itself is not necessarily either.

On the other hand, the commissioners' extreme argument is unappealing. They say that Ribena is and is marketed as a dietary supplement and that this shows that it is not a drug or medicine. But this is too simple. One cannot encapsulate a complex situation in a phrase. A dietary supplement may be a medicine or it may not. A health food, or health drink, may be a medicine or it may not; to call a product one of these things does not solve the problem. What it does, and this may be valuable, is to call attention to the existence in the time in which we live, and in which Ribena is sold, of the wide frontier zone to which I have called attention and which includes products which other times might have considered either clearly food or clearly medicine. The description health drink is helpful and relevant but not yet decisive.

The respondents' strongest argument, to my mind, which has to be met, is based on the actual content of vitamin C in Ribena—75 mg per fluid ounce, which is made up by an addition to the natural vitamin C of laboratory-produced ascorbic acid (another name for the same thing) and which quantity corresponds with the standard set by nutritional authorities in the United States of America for the intake necessary for daily health. The scientific validity of this is in fact precarious; both the 'saturation' theory, in itself, is doubtful and even if it is accepted the saturation figure is one on which experts disagree—the United States of America has, it appears, come down to 60 mg while the British experts think that 30 mg are enough. But laying scepticism aside and assuming that a daily intake figure has some scientific validity, the question remains whether goods which are sold with this quantity in them are medicines or not.

Again, as often happens with frontier cases, each side tried a sorites argument. A doctor prescribes vitamin C pills—clearly a medicine; next time the patient buys the same or similar pills at the counter—still a medicine; then he buys a liquid concentration of the same vitamin—still a medicine; finally a neighbour suggests Ribena. The commissioners start at the other end. Their consumer buys oranges to give him his daily vitamin C; then natural orange juice; then concentrated orange juice, or blackcurrant juice; finally Ribena with added vitamin C. Each argument may be forensically satisfying, but each fails to conclude the matter. The question remains where the invisible line is crossed.

We must, in my opinion, look at the whole picture. Ungoed-Thomas J¹⁸ has done just this and that is why I agree with his judgment. On the respondents' side is the fact I have mentioned of the degree of concentration of vitamin C; on their side, too, is the fact that Ribena sells more in winter than in summer, showing at least that it is not an ordinary soft drink, and that it costs more than ordinary soft drinks. The label on the bottle, with its reference to ingredients and suggestion as to 'dose' (although the word is not used) is on the respondents' side. It is sold in chemists or pharmaceutical departments of great stores, although much more is sold in grocers. On the other hand its advertisements, directed at the normal healthy person and aspiring athletes, the scale of consumption (30 million bottles a year) and its key description 'The great natural health drink of our time' seem to me to place it in a category, perhaps the creation of our age but undoubtedly a thriving creation, of health food, something which modern man takes not therapeutically, or prophylactically, but as part of his way of better living. Ungoed-Thomas J puts it thus¹⁹:

'Ribena seems to me, in accordance with the refrain of those advertisements, to be on the market as a "health drink", a health drink for everyone however healthy. On the evidence, including in particular that of the advertisements and sales to which I have referred, it would seem to me to flout common sense to conclude otherwise than that it is mainly and generally at any rate on the market for, and sold to and for, normally healthy persons; sold neither therapeutically nor prophylactically but as a diet supplement to those not shown to need vitamin C in particular more than any other element of normal diet but to the ordinary reader and listener of such advertisements as I have mentioned.'

I think this is exactly right. It is to my mind satisfactorily confirmed by the 1967 Report of the Standing Joint Committee on the Classification of Proprietary Preparations appointed by the Ministry of Health. This was concerned with the classification of borderline substances for the purpose of deciding whether they should be provided free, as drugs and medicines, under the National Health Service Act 1946. In para 5 of the report the committee said:

'Vitamin preparations should be regarded as drugs when used, for example, in the management of actual or potential vitamin deficiency. They should be regarded as foods when used routinely for persons such as healthy school children, factory workers and athletes.'

And of toilet preparations, which may be medicated, they say:

'The fact that a drug is present does not of necessity convert the preparation as a whole into a drug . . . They [preparations used for their prophylactic value] are—like foods—in the category of substances which the individual should be expected to provide for himself as requirements of ordinary life.'

No doubt the committee was dealing with a different problem but there seems to me both logic and satisfaction in finding that a similar solution can be given to the questions whether a patient should get Ribena free under the National Health Service and whether a consumer should get it free of purchase tax. The passage quoted has the merit of good sense.

¹⁸ [1969] 3 All ER 135, [1969] 1 WLR 1518

¹⁹ [1969] 3 All ER at 146, [1969] 1 WLR at 1532

a There are a number of subsidiary arguments and contingent issues, on which it is unnecessary to do more than express agreement with Ungood-Thomas J²⁰. I refer only to one, for if decided one way, it would of itself decide the appeal. This arises under the Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968¹, Head III of the Schedule. The effect of this is to exempt from charge under the group 'Drugs and Medicines' (and consequently altogether) preparations consisting only of a vitamin and an excipient, vehicle, base or preservative. Accepting that Ribena comes within this description
b (as to which I feel considerable doubt) the exemption in my opinion does not help it unless it is previously established that Ribena is a drug or medicine. The exemption, as other exemptions under the Act, only applies to goods coming within the head of charge, so that if, as I think, Ribena is not within the latter, it is not exempt.

That Ribena, whatever else it may be, falls within the beverages group appears to me perfectly clear, and since it does not come under 'Drugs and medicines', it is chargeable under that group. I would allow the appeal.

c In the Court of Appeal² a concession was, it appears, made on behalf of the commissioners which undoubtedly influenced the decision of that court. Your Lordships thought it right in this House to allow it to be withdrawn. In my opinion it is only fair to the respondents that this situation should mitigate the costs which they should pay and I would propose that, while the commissioners should have their costs of d the trial and in this House, there should be no order as to the costs in the Court of Appeal.

LORD PEARSON. My Lords, the question is whether the health drink Ribena is chargeable with purchase tax. Ribena is composed as to 70 per cent of a prepared syrup of blackcurrant juice (which has by nature a content of vitamin C), as to 25·6 e per cent of a syrup of sugar and as to 0·19 per cent of added vitamin C. When diluted with water it makes a palatable drink.

Section 2 of the Purchase Tax Act 1963 provides, so far as is material for the purposes of this appeal, as follows:

f '(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the goods which are chargeable goods are those comprised in the Groups listed in Part I of Schedule 1 to this Act, other than goods which are exempt from all charge to tax under the said Part I; and the rates of tax chargeable in respect of chargeable goods of any class are those prescribed by the said Part I.

'(2) The list of Groups in the said Part I shall be interpreted in accordance with the rules set out at the beginning of the said Part I.

g '(3) The Treasury may by order made by statutory instrument—(a) make any change in the classes of goods which are chargeable goods . . . (c) amend Part I of Schedule 1 to this Act.'

Section 17 has needed to be considered, but I think in the end it is not material for the purposes of this appeal.

h The rules set out at the beginning of Part I of Sch 1 are, so far as material, as follows:

'NOTE:—The list in this Part of this Schedule is to be interpreted in accordance with the following rules.

'1. Where a Group begins with a general description of the goods comprised in the Group, the goods mentioned below in the Group (including those mentioned under a heading "Exempt") comprise only goods falling within the general description.

i '2. Goods comprised in a heading "Exempt" are exempt from all charge to tax.

'3. A heading "Not chargeable under this Group" is to be taken as excluding the goods referred to from any charge to tax under that Group (but not other Groups), and not as restricting or extending the descriptions of goods to be treated as comprised in the Group.

²⁰ [1969] 3 All ER 135, [1969] 1 WLR 1518 2 [1971] 1 All ER 701, [1971] 1 WLR 326
 1 SI 1968 No 1511

'4. Where any goods are chargeable at more than one rate, tax is to be chargeable in respect of them at the higher or highest of those rates.'

Then, still in Part I of Sch 1 to the Act, there is prescribed in Group 35 a tax rate of 15 per cent for 'Manufactured beverages, including . . . syrups, concentrates . . . for the preparation of beverages . . .', subject to certain exceptions which are not material for this appeal. As Ribena is a syrup of blackcurrant juice and sugar, with a percentage of vitamin C, and when diluted with water forms a palatable health drink, I have no doubt that it falls within those words of Group 35 and so is prima facie chargeable with purchase tax at the rate of 15 per cent. But, having regard to the rules, one has to look further and see whether Ribena is chargeable at some higher rate, or is exempt, under some other group. The commissioners' contention is that Ribena does not fall within any other group and so is chargeable simply under Group 35. The respondents' contention is that Ribena falls within Group 33, and is comprised in a heading 'Exempt' in that Group and therefore, by virtue of r 2, is exempt from all charge to tax.

The provisions of Group 33, as originally enacted, were as follows:

'GROUP 33

'comprising Drugs and medicines, manufactured or prepared (except toilet preparations).

'Goods not comprised below in this Group . . . 25%.

'Exempt

'(1) Goods complying with the provisions of Part II of this Schedule.

'(2) Goods specified in the Schedule to the Purchase Tax (No. 2) Order 1961 as amended by the Purchase Tax (No. 1) Order 1962.'

Part II of the Schedule remains, substantially at any rate, in the same form. It is headed 'Conditions of Exemption of Drugs and Medicines comprised in Group 33, under Para. (1) of Heading "Exempt" in that Group.' Condition 4 provides:

'There must not appear in the get-up of the goods or on the goods apart from any get-up—(a) any trade mark as defined in the Trade Marks Act 1938 . . .'

I understand that condition 4 rules out Ribena because the name 'Ribena' is in itself a trade mark. In any case Ribena would have to be a drug or medicine in order to gain exemption under Part II of the Schedule, and so would raise the same question as arises under Part I of the Schedule, as will be shown.

In Part I of Sch 1 to the Act, in Group 33, the second paragraph of the heading 'Exempt' has been frequently amended by Treasury orders made under s 2 (3) of the Act. It will be sufficient to refer to the Purchase Tax (No 2) Order 1968 which provides:

'1. Drugs and medicines, manufactured or prepared (except toilet preparations) of any of the classes specified in the Schedule to this Order shall not be included in any class of goods which are chargeable goods within the meaning of the Purchase Tax Act 1963.

'2. (1) In Group 33 of Part I of Schedule 1 to the Purchase Tax Act 1963, in paragraph (2) of the heading "Exempt", for the reference to the Purchase Tax (No. 1) Order 1967 there shall be substituted a reference to this Order.

'(2) The Purchase Tax (No. 1) Order 1967 is hereby revoked.'

There is a curious duplication of provisions in this 1968 Order. Article 1 confers exemption on drugs and medicines manufactured or prepared (except toilet preparations) of any of the classes specified in the Schedule to the Order. The effect of art 2 is that goods specified in the Schedule to the Order are exempt, but (by virtue of r 1) only if they are drugs and medicines manufactured or prepared (except toilet preparations). There seems to be no satisfactory explanation of the duplication. However that may be, I think it is clear that Ribena is not entitled to exemption from purchase a tax unless it is a drug or medicine. As it is clearly not a drug, the material question is whether it is a medicine. It is to be noted that although Ribena is clearly a beverage (to be exact a syrup for the preparation of a beverage) and so prima facie chargeable under Group 35, it will nevertheless by virtue of r 2 be entitled to exemption from all charge if it is a medicine and exempt from charge under Group 33.

b I should mention in passing that, but for a concession that was made in the Court of Appeal³, there would have been a serious question whether if Ribena were a medicine it would be within any of the classes specified in the Schedule to the 1968 Order. The opening words of Head III of the Schedule are as follows:

‘The substances described under this head, and preparations consisting only of one of those substances and one or more of the following things, namely, an excipient, vehicle, base or preservative . . .’

c The substances described under this head include vitamins. The serious question would have been, in the convenient phrase that was used, whether the vitamin C content of Ribena could be regarded as ‘a vitamin in a vehicle’. Having regard to the small bulk and cost of the vitamin C content and the large bulk and cost and attractive taste and appearance of the liquid content (the syrup of blackcurrant juice and sugar), there is at least much doubt whether the liquid content can reasonably be considered a mere vehicle for carrying the vitamin C content. But as the concession was made and the appeal can be decided on another ground, I will not deal further with this point.

d The decisive question is whether Ribena is a medicine as well as a beverage. The facts have been amply, and I think very accurately, summarised by Ungood-Thomas e J⁴, and I will only state the general impression which they convey to my mind, taking into account the appearance of the bottle and its contents and the statements on the label as well as the known taste of the contents. Ribena when diluted with water provides a drink which is (a) thirst-quenching, (b) pleasant in appearance and taste and (c) rich in vitamin C. It is bought and consumed for those three reasons, and I think they are all operative and effective reasons. Though taken by adults as well as f children, Ribena is to a large extent a family drink, and I think it is reasonable to infer that in the typical case, when a child asks for and is given a drink of Ribena, he is glad to have it because he is thirsty and he likes the taste, and he is allowed and encouraged to have it because it may be good for him. It may be good for him because by virtue of its content of vitamin C it acts as a safeguard and a harmless safeguard; if there would otherwise be a deficiency of vitamin C in the diet, the regular or frequent g drinking of Ribena makes good the deficiency; if (as is usually the case) there is already enough vitamin C in the other ingredients of the diet, the surplus intake of vitamin C resulting from the inclusion of Ribena in the diet does no harm. The possible benefit to the health which may result from including Ribena in the diet is naturally stressed in the label on the bottle and in the general advertising and presumably plays an important part in inducing customers to pay the rather high price which is h charged for Ribena (now 22½p for the smaller bottle). It is significant that the sales are greater in winter than in summer; the rest of the diet is more likely to be deficient in vitamin C in the winter when fresh vegetables and fruit are less readily available. It is also significant that the makers of Ribena fortify its naturally good content of vitamin C with a synthetic addition. It is reasonable to suppose that the health element in this health drink plays a considerable part in making it attractive to i customers. But I do not think this fact makes it a medicine.

It seems to me that in deciding whether or not Ribena is a medicine as well as a beverage, the broad general question is whether it is only an article of diet, included in the diet as being conducive to general health, or a medicine taken for the cure or prevention of some particular disease. On this question Ungood-Thomas J's conclusion, with which I agree, was as follows⁵:

3 [1971] 1 All ER 701, [1971] 1 WLR 326

4 [1969] 3 All ER 135, [1969] 1 WLR 1518

'Ribena seems to me, in accordance with the refrain of those advertisements, to be on the market as a "health drink", a health drink for everyone however healthy. On the evidence, including in particular that of the advertisements and sales to which I have referred, it would seem to me to flout common sense to conclude otherwise than that it is mainly and generally at any rate on the market for, and sold to and for, normally healthy persons; sold neither therapeutically nor prophylactically but as a diet supplement to those not shown to need vitamin C in particular more than any other element of normal diet but to the ordinary reader and listener of such advertisements as I have mentioned.'

I think Ungood-Thomas J was right in directing attention mainly to the main body of consumers of Ribena. There are, however, some special cases. Expectant mothers and nursing mothers may be advised to take Ribena in order to increase their intake of vitamin C. But in such cases Ribena is not being used as a medicine. There is no disease or illness involved, but only a special dietary requirement, because in a sense the diet has to provide for two persons instead of one. Similarly, in the case of bottle-fed babies, the milk which they get may be deficient in vitamin C, and if so the addition of Ribena as an element in the diet will correct the deficiency, but there is no disease or illness involved. On the other hand there are cases in which a bachelor or an elderly person may have an unbalanced diet, deficient in vitamin C, and if continued long enough this can produce illness and even a disease—sub-clinical scurvy or in an extreme case frank scurvy. In such a case Ribena is not strong enough to be prescribed as a cure for the disease. The disease is cured by means of vitamin C tablets of the required strength. There is however the later stage when some vitamin C may be required to stabilise the cure and prevent a recurrence of the disease, and for these purposes either mild tablets or, if the expense is not a deterrent, Ribena can be used. It seems to me that in such a case the use of Ribena is on the borderline between the medicinal and the dietary. Even if the use in some of these cases can be reckoned as medicinal, it forms such a minute proportion of the total use that it should not affect the decision.

On the question whether the court's decision as to the chargeability of Ribena should be affected by the commissioners' treatment of other products, I think the view expressed by Pennycuik J in dealing with an application for interrogatories was correct. He said:

'So far as the interrogatories relating to purchase tax are concerned I feel no doubt that they should not be allowed. The liability of purchase tax in respect of any particular product must depend on the proper application of the statutory provisions to that particular product and the question whether purchase tax is or is not charged on comparable products is in its nature irrelevant to that question.'

I would allow the appeal, and I would agree that the order as to costs should be as proposed by my noble and learned friend Lord Wilberforce.

LORD DIPLOCK. I agree with those of your Lordships who consider that Ribena is a 'syrup or concentrate for the preparation of a beverage' and is not a 'drug or medicine, manufactured or prepared'.

I would allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Solicitor, Customs and Excise; Simmons & Simmons (for the respondents).

S A Hatteea Esq Barrister.

^a Texaco Ltd v Mulberry Filling Station Ltd

CHANCERY DIVISION

UNGOED-THOMAS J

16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 23rd, 24th, 25th, 26th, 30th NOVEMBER, 1ST, 14th DECEMBER 1971

- ^b Trade – Restraint of trade – Agreement – Petrol filling station – Solus agreement – Legal charge – Agreement in legal charge between owner of garage and petrol supplier to purchase, resell and advertise exclusively supplier's products – Reasonableness of restraints – Limitation of tie to five years – Loan at low rate of interest repayable during period of tie – Reasonableness in reference to interests of parties – Reasonableness in interests of public – General considerations of economic and social policy – Relevance – No evidence that restraints severely and arbitrarily restricting freedom to trade.

Injunction – Interlocutory injunction – Principle governing grant – Breach of contractual negative stipulation – Strong prima facie case of breach – Interlocutory injunction not available as matter of course – Balance of convenience – Maintenance of status quo – Protection of plaintiff's interests – Damages inadequate remedy.

- ^d The defendant, a limited company controlled by T, owned a petrol filling station at Croydon. The defendant wished to redevelop the property and, in order to obtain financial assistance for this purpose, entered into an agreement in January 1965 with the plaintiff, a petrol company, with T as surety. The agreement was in the form of a legal charge containing solus tie provisions, whereby the plaintiff
- ^e advanced £36,000 to the defendant and the defendant charged the property with repayment of the sum advanced in 40 half yearly instalments of £900 each, with interest, and not otherwise. In May 1965 the Monopolies Commission made a report^a following which undertakings were given by the major petrol companies (including the plaintiff) to the Board of Trade the effect of which was that the defendant was enabled, on 12 months' notice to the plaintiff, to determine the solus ties in the legal
- ^f charge at any time after 6th August 1971. In 1967 T contemplated selling the Croydon petrol station and buying another one at Mitcham. The plaintiff was keen that he should do so and that he should enter into a similar solus tie agreement with it in regard to the Mitcham petrol station. Accordingly the plaintiff was prepared to help T obtain the money required to buy and improve the Mitcham station. On 30th June 1967 the plaintiff wrote to the defendant a 'letter of understanding' setting out the
- ^g terms on which finance was to be provided, on a 15 year basis. Under the terms suggested H Ltd was to advance £40,000 on loan to the defendant, against a guarantee by the plaintiff secured by a first charge on the Mitcham station and a second charge on the Croydon station, the loan to be repayable over the initial five year period by half yearly instalments, with a right to apply to the plaintiff to refinance the operation, and a further refinancing to cover the last five years of the 15 year period. The proposed
- ^h terms further envisaged that during the subsistence of the charge there would be tie provisions, that the existing legal charge in respect of the Croydon station would be redeemed and the redemption money re-advanced to the defendant under a new legal charge on the same terms, except that either party would have the right to require redemption on the fifth anniversary of the date of the charge or at any time thereafter, and that the defendant would grant the plaintiff an option to
- ^j purchase the freehold of the Croydon station for £90,000 on certain terms. The purchase of the Mitcham station was completed in August 1967 by a conveyance to a company ('the Mitcham company') virtually owned and controlled by T. By a legal charge of 18th August between the Mitcham company and the plaintiff, the Mitcham company charged the property with repayment of any sums payable under the plaintiff's guarantee of repayment of a loan of £40,000 agreed to be made to the Mitcham company by H Ltd, and repayable by instalments, and entered into solus tie obligations with the plaintiff. The option agreement was never executed. The plaintiff decided against purchase of the Croydon station at £90,000 but a representative of the plaintiff told T that he would recommend purchase at £75,000. In these circumstances, the defendant entered into a legal charge dated 30th January 1968, the purpose of which was to obtain a tie that would run from January 1968, and would conform to the undertakings required by the Board of Trade in consequence of the Monopolies Commission report and would not be exposed to such objection on account of its duration as the 1965 tie might be. The defendant thereby charged the Croydon station with repayment to the plaintiff of £32,400 advanced (i.e. the amount not repaid under the 1965 charge) repayable by half yearly instalments and not otherwise of the same amounts and dates except that the final instalment was repayable on 1st August 1972. The defendant and T jointly and severally covenanted with the plaintiff that during the continuance of the security the defendant would carry on at the property the business of a petrol station and would purchase its total requirement of motor fuel from the plaintiff and would not sell or advertise any other brands at the Croydon station. By a further legal charge of 30th January 1968 the defendant charged the Croydon property with payment of the moneys secured by the Mitcham charge of August 1967. Subsequently the plaintiff decided not to proceed with the exercise of the option to purchase the Croydon station. The defendant continued to retail the plaintiff's petrol in accordance with its obligations until January 1971 when there was an unofficial strike of the plaintiff's tanker drivers. From 4th to 13th January there was no delivery of the plaintiff's petrol to the defendant's station. On 12th January the defendant took delivery of another brand of petrol, as it was entitled to do under the terms of the charge in view of the failure of delivery by the plaintiff, but continued to do so after the strike had ended and the plaintiff was able and willing to deliver its petrol. The plaintiff accordingly commenced proceedings against the defendant and sought an interlocutory injunction pending judgment at the trial to restrain the defendant from further breaches of the tie agreement. The defendant contended, inter alia, that the 1968 legal charge, on whose covenants the plaintiff relied, was no more than a notional replacement of the 1965 legal charge and that the restraints were therefore for the period from 22nd January 1965 until 1st August 1972, i.e. for seven years and seven months, and were in consequence void. The defendant further contended that the restraints contained in the tie agreement were void on considerations of general application which it was alleged affected reasonableness whether in the interests of the parties or the public, e.g. (a) whether a loan at a low rate of interest by a supplier to a retailer resulted in mis-allocation of resources, (b) whether the low interest rate induced the retailer to enter into the trade in ignorance of the real cost that he was incurring, (c) how far the tie was required to provide security for the suppliers' investment, (d) whether price stability was affected by the solus tie, (e) whether the tie secured economies in distribution, and (f) how far services provided by the supplier to the retailer were advantageous and dependent on the tie system.

^a Report on the Supply of Petrol to Retailers in the United Kingdom (Chairman R F Levy QC) HC 264

Held – (i) The plaintiff had established a strong prima facie case that the covenants were not void as being in restraint of trade because—

(a) the 1968 legal charge relied on by the plaintiff was not a notional replacement of the 1965 legal charge but was a separate new legal charge for a new consideration as part of a new transaction; and the ties relied on by the plaintiff were accordingly for the period appearing on the face of the 1968 legal charge, i.e. four years and seven months (see p 522, f and g post);

(b) the restraints were reasonable in reference to the interests of the parties since (i) it was common ground and in accordance with the authorities that the test of such a reasonableness was whether such restraints were no more than were required for the protection of the covenant; and (2) the restraints were part of a commercial contract in which there was bargaining equality between the parties; and the court would not interfere (with reference to the interests of the parties) with such contracts (see p 524 j and 525 a to d, post); speeches in Eso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd [1967] 1 All ER 699 referred to;

b (c) the restraints were reasonable in reference to the interests of the public since such interests referred to the interests of the public as recognisable and recognised by law and therefore as capable of judicial application by being recognised in a principle or proposition of law, and it did not refer to the interests of the public at large; so that the question which such reasonableness in the interests of the public raised was not whether the abolition of the restraint might lead to a different organisation of industry or society and thus, on a balance of many considerations, to the economic or social advantage of the country; but whether the restraint was, in industry and society as at present organised and with reference to which the law operated, reasonable in the interests of the public as recognised in a principle or proposition of law; and, thus considered, the restrictions were reasonable in reference to the interests of the public expressed in the proposition that the public had an interest in men being able to trade freely subject (inter alia) to reasonable limitations which conformed with the contemporary organisation of trade; speech of Lord Wilberforce in Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Dickson [1968] 2 All ER at 707, 708 considered; accordingly much of the evidence directed to general considerations of economic policy was irrelevant; but on the balance of such considerations the decision would also be that the plaintiff had established a strong prima facie case (see p 527 a to f, post).

e (ii) Having shown a strong prima facie case or probability of success at the trial, the plaintiff had sufficiently established, for the purposes of an interlocutory injunction, the contractual right on which it relied; and it was conceded that such a right, if established, had been violated; the principle of Doherty v Allman^b that the plaintiff was entitled to perpetual injunction, as of course, to restrain violation of a contractual negative stipulation established at the trial, did not extend to interlocutory injunctions pending trial; consequently on the application for such an injunction (as for interlocutory injunctions generally) the governing consideration became the maintenance of the status quo pending the trial; the maintenance of such status quo meant in general the maintenance of the contemporary situation including what had resulted from past violations of the plaintiff's prima facie right but excluding any repetition of the violations; in deciding whether such status quo should be maintained regard must be had to the balance of convenience and the extent to which any advantage to the plaintiff could be cured by the payment of damages rather than by granting an injunction; accordingly on the findings in this case the interlocutory injunctions claimed should be granted (see p 528 f and p 529 c d and j to p 530 b and c, post); Doherty v Allman (1878) 3 App Cas 709 distinguished.

h Notes

For agreements in restraint of trade, see 38 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 20, para 13; for restraint of trade being void unless reasonable in relation to the parties and the public, see ibid, 22-26, paras 21-27, and for cases on the subject, see 45 Digest (Repl) 443-449, 271-297.

For the principles governing the grant of interlocutory injunctions, see 21 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 365, 366, paras 765, 766, and for cases on the subject, see 28 (2) Digest (Reissue) 968-973, 67-103.

Cases referred to in judgment

A-G of Commonwealth of Australia v Adelaide Steamship Co Ltd [1913] AC 781, [1911-13] All ER Rep 1120, 83 LJPC 84, 109 LT 258, 45 Digest (Repl) 395, 119.

b (1878) 3 App Cas 709

- Dickson v Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain* [1967] 2 All ER 558, [1967] Ch 708, [1967] 2 WLR 718; affd HL sub nom Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Dickson [1968] 2 All ER 686, [1970] AC 403, [1968] 3 WLR 286, Digest (Cont Vol C) 994, 288a. Doherty v Allman (1878) 3 App Cas 709, 39 LT 129, 42 JP 788, 28 (2) Digest (Reissue) 958, 14.
- Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd* [1967] 1 All ER 699, [1968] AC 269, [1967] 2 WLR 871, Digest (Cont Vol C) 985, 132a.
- Hamstead and Suburban Properties Ltd v Diomedous* [1968] 3 All ER 545, [1969] 1 Ch 248, [1968] 3 WLR 990, Digest (Cont Vol C) 559, 154a.
- Jenkins v Jackson* (1888) 40 Ch D 71, 58 LJCh 124, 60 LT 105, 36 Digest (Repl) 319, 651.
- Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co Ltd* [1894] AC 535, [1891-94] All ER Rep 1, 63 LJCh 908, 71 LT 489, 45 Digest (Repl) 444, 275.
- North-Western Salt Co Ltd v Electrolytic Alkali Co Ltd* [1914] AC 461, [1914-15] All ER Rep 752, 83 LJB 530, 110 LT 852, 45 Digest (Repl) 442, 261.
- Underwood (E) & Son Ltd v Barker* [1899] 1 Ch 300, 68 LJCh 201, 80 LT 306, 45 Digest (Repl) 506, 941.

Cases also cited

- British Motor Trade Association v Gilbert* [1951] 2 All ER 641.
- Cleveland Petroleum Co Ltd v Dartstone Ltd* [1969] 1 All ER 201, [1969] 1 WLR 116.
- Donmar Productions Ltd v Bart* [1967] 2 All ER 338, [1967] 1 WLR 740.
- Harman Pictures NV v Osborne* [1967] 2 All ER 324, [1967] 1 WLR 723.
- Haynes v Doman* [1899] 2 Ch 13.
- McEllistrim v Ballymacelligott Co-operative Agricultural and Dairy Society Ltd* [1919] AC 548.
- Monkland v Jack Barclay Ltd* [1951] 1 All ER 714, [1951] 2 KB 252.
- Morris (Herbert) Ltd v Saxelby* [1916] 1 AC 688, [1916-17] All ER Rep 305.
- Petrofina (Gt Britain) Ltd v Martin* [1966] 1 All ER 126, [1966] Ch 146.
- Sefton (Earl) v Tophams Ltd* [1965] 3 All ER 1, [1965] Ch 1140.
- Vancouver Malt and Sake Brewing Co Ltd v Vancouver Breweries Ltd* [1934] AC 181, [1934] All ER Rep 38.

Motion

This was a motion, by notice dated 30th March 1971, by the plaintiff, Texaco Ltd, in an action commenced by writ issued on 16th March 1971 by the plaintiff against the defendant, Mulberry Filling Station Ltd. By this motion the plaintiff sought an order restraining the defendant from doing whether itself or by its agents or servants or otherwise howsoever the following acts or any of them until after judgment or further order: (1) purchasing otherwise than from the plaintiff any motor fuel for sale at or for use at or about the defendant's filling station, 48 Beddington Lane, Beddington, Croydon, (2) selling or advertising for sale at the filling station any brand or brands of motor fuel or fuels other than those supplied by the plaintiff. The facts are set out in the judgment.

P R Oliver QC and D J Nicholls for the plaintiff.

A J Balcombe QC and Gavin Lightman for the defendant.

Cur adv vult

14th December. UNGOED-THOMAS J read the following judgment. The plaintiff's motion is for an interlocutory injunction pending judgment at the trial to restrain the defendant from (1) purchasing otherwise than from the plaintiff any motor fuel for sale or use at the defendant's filling station at 48 Beddington Lane, Croydon, and (2) selling or advertising for sale at that station any brand of petrol not supplied by the plaintiff.

The issues

It is common ground (a) that what is sought to be restrained is what the defendant has covenanted not to do; (b) that such agreement is of a kind (i.e. a solus tie agreement) that is subject to the legal doctrine which avoids certain contracts as being

- a in restraint of trade; (c) that the plaintiff has to establish a strong prima facie case or the probability that it will succeed in establishing at the trial that the covenants will not, in accordance with that doctrine, be held void; that if such prima facie case or probability of success is established, that it will then follow that the right in respect of whose violation the plaintiff seeks relief is also thus established; (d) that if such right is so sufficiently established, then there had been a violation of the right.
- b This common ground leaves in dispute, as is rightly acknowledged by both parties, (1) whether the plaintiff has established such strong prima facie case or probability that the covenants are not void; (2) whether in the circumstances injunction by way of interlocutory relief should, in the exercise of the court's judicial discretion, be granted.

The facts

- c I will deal first with the facts leading to the action. The plaintiff's original name was Regent Oil Co Ltd, but it changed that to its present name in November 1967. The defendant was at all material times until October 1968 wholly or virtually owned and controlled by George William Tandy. The defendant has at all material times been owner of 48 Beddington Lane, Croydon, and carried on there the business of a petrol filling station.
- d By a legal charge dated 22nd January 1965, between the defendant of the first part, the plaintiff of the second part and Mr Tandy as a surety of the third part, the plaintiff advanced to the defendant £21,000 and agreed to advance to it a further £15,000 (totalling, with the £21,000, £36,000) against architect's certificates in respect of redevelopment of the defendant's garage which the defendant agreed to carry out. The sums advanced were made repayable in 40 half yearly instalments of £900
- e each, totalling £36,000, with interest, commencing on 1st February 1966, and not otherwise; and they were charged on the petrol station land. It contained ties wide enough to cover the relief sought in this action.

- In May 1965 the Monopolies Commission made a report¹ in accordance with which the defendant was enabled by 12 months' notice to the plaintiff to determine the 1965 legal charge solus ties, including covenants of the kind relied on by the
- f plaintiff, at any time after 6th August 1971. By June 1967 Mr Tandy was contemplating selling the Croydon station and buying another station at Mitcham, and the plaintiff was keen that he should do so, and that he should enter into a solus tie agreement with it with regard to the Mitcham station. The plaintiff was therefore prepared to help Mr Tandy to get the money which he required to buy and improve the Mitcham station. One obvious source contemplated for such moneys was the proceeds of sale of the Croydon station and another source was a loan. There
- g was danger, however, that the Mitcham station would be sold before the Croydon station could be sold at an acceptable price, and in the circumstances the purchase of the Croydon station by the plaintiff was discussed between representatives of the plaintiff and Mr Tandy.

- h However, by this time the plaintiff had its settled methods and procedure for providing its tied retailers with loans and for purchasing stations. The loans were no longer made by the plaintiff but by Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co Ltd at the plaintiff's request and on the plaintiff's guarantee of repayment secured by a legal charge to Hanover and to the plaintiff and containing in the legal charge to the plaintiff solus tie provisions. No difficulty arose over the loan by Hanover or over the legal charge in its favour. The plaintiff's purchase procedure was by way
- j of option to the plaintiff which might apparently be entered into by the decision of authorised officials in the plaintiff and then by the exercise of that option by the board of directors on the recommendation of higher officials in the plaintiff.

The option created difficulty and some conflict of evidence before me. I had the advantage of oral evidence from Mr Euinton and Mr Taylor, representatives of the plaintiff, and of Mr Tandy and Mr Lambert, who was the defendant's solicitor when the defendant was controlled by Mr Tandy. Mr Euinton was an impressively honest and able witness. Mr Tandy was jovial, forthright, somewhat impetuous and it is no reflection on him to say not of the same intellectual calibre as the other witnesses. But he was what is called 'a character' who had succeeded in making a success of the Croydon station despite its recognised disadvantages. Mr Lambert was rightly very much concerned to protect Mr Tandy against Mr Tandy's somewhat more care-free inclinations, but with the result that Mr Lambert and Mr Tandy were apparently inclined to pursue somewhat divergent courses. This, I am satisfied, goes far to account for the somewhat diverging attitudes and knowledge appearing in the legal correspondence on the one hand and in Mr Tandy's vivid and detailed oral evidence on the other hand.

i 1 Report on the Supply of Petrol to Retailers in the United Kingdom (Chairman R F Levy QC) HC 264

I am satisfied, however, on the evidence as a whole that the option figure of £90,000 mentioned in the legal documents arose out of what Mr Tandy had suggested had been mentioned to him by someone or other, and his evidence was that he throughout considered £75,000 as what was to be the real figure. Mr Tandy also clearly realised from what Mr Euinton and Mr Taylor had told him that although there was, as he expressed it, a 99½ per cent certainty that the option would be exercised (as indeed had such options in every similar case) and that Mr Euinton recommended its exercise, yet as the exercise was a matter for decision by higher authority in the plaintiff, there was the possibility, however faint, that it would not be exercised. It is not surprising that Mr Lambert was very worried at the prospect of Mr Tandy buying the Mitcham station without the certainty that the plaintiff was the purchaser of the Croydon station.

On 30th June 1967 what has been referred to as a letter of understanding made 'subject to contract' was written by the plaintiff to the defendant marked 'For the attention of Mr G. Tandy'. The letter opened by stating that the plaintiff set out below 'the terms agreed between us', and it said that 'These are long term proposals founded on a 15 year basis'. Then I continue the quotation in para 1 (a):

'Manufacturers Hanover Trust Company ("the Bank") will advance you on loan for an initial period of 5 years, against a Guarantee to be given to the Bank by ourselves, the sum of £40,000 which shall bear interest [I need not refer to the rate] payable half-yearly in arrears. (b) The loan will be advanced to assist you to purchase and redevelop the above mentioned premises [i.e. the Mitcham station]. Of this loan the sum of £30,000 will be paid on legal completion and the balance of £10,000 will be advanced when the redevelopment has been fully completed in accordance with the plans agreed between us.'

Paragraph 2 said that the guarantee would be secured by a first charge on the Mitcham station and a second charge on the Croydon station.

Paragraph 3 provided that the loan would be repayable over the initial five year period by half yearly instalments and that the defendant would be given the right to apply to the plaintiff at the expiration of that period to refinance the operation: and then that the refinancing would again provide for further refinancing at the end of the second five year period to cover the last five years of the total 15 year period. Paragraph 4 provided that the charge would additionally stipulate that during its subsistence there should be tied provisions, which were set out, and an obligation on the defendant to accept deliveries of motor fuel in minimum 4,000 gallon loads (which is referred to in the jargon of the industry as 'the drop') and also a rebate. Paragraph 7 provided:

'The above transaction is conditional upon:—(a) The existing Legal Charge in respect of Mulberry Filling Station, Croydon, being redeemed and the redemption money being re-advanced to you under a new Legal Charge on the a same terms, except that either party shall have the right to require redemption on the fifth anniversary of the date of the new Charge or at any time thereafter; and (b) You granting us an option, for a nominal consideration, to purchase the freehold of Mulberry Filling Station for the price of £90,000, such option to be exercisable by us on giving you written notice at any time between the date of the new Legal Charge in respect of Mulberry Filling Station and either its expiry date or a date being two months after notice to redeem the same is given to us, whichever is the later.'

b On 13th July 1967 Mr Tandy contracted to purchase the filling station at Mitcham, and that purchase was completed in August 1967 by a conveyance of the station to Mulberry Filling Station (Mitcham) Ltd, a company wholly or virtually owned and controlled by Mr Tandy. Under a legal charge dated 18th August 1967 between c the Mitcham company and the plaintiff, the Mitcham company charged its Mitcham station property with repayment to the plaintiff of any sums payable by the plaintiff under its guarantee of repayment of a loan of £40,000 agreed to be made to the Mitcham company by Hanover and repayable by instalments, and the Mitcham company entered into solus tie obligations with the plaintiff and agreed with the plaintiff to make specified improvements to the station. These sums were for the d purchase and improvement of the Mitcham station.

As appears from correspondence, by 31st October 1967 Mr Tandy had signed the option provided for in the letter of understanding. It is common ground that it was never executed and that a document produced was the unexecuted and undated option agreement engrossment. It provided that the option to purchase the Croydon station for £90,000 should be exercisable, so far as material, at any time before (1) e the repayment in full of all moneys due to the plaintiff under a legal charge dated (then there was a blank) day of (then there was a blank) 1967 between the defendant, the plaintiff and Mr Tandy (which in the event was the legal charge dated 30th January 1968, between those same parties which I mention below); or (2) the commencement of retail sale by the Mitcham company of the plaintiff's products from the Mitcham station in accordance with the above legal charge dated 18th August f 1967 between the Mitcham company and the plaintiff, whichever should first occur.

On 16th January 1968 the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant's solicitors that on completion of the first and second charges to them (being those contemplated in the letter of understanding) 'the option agreements' would be exchanged. Mr Euinton told Mr Tandy between 26th and 30th January that the plaintiff had decided against a purchase of £90,000, and Mr Euinton said that he would recommend the purchase at £75,000. It was in these circumstances that the defendant entered into g the legal charge containing the ties on which the plaintiff relies.

By this legal charge dated 30th January 1968, between the same parties as to the legal charge of 22nd January 1965, the defendant charged the Croydon station land with repayment to the plaintiff of the sum of £32,400 'now paid' to the defendant. The sum was of the amount not repaid under the 1965 legal charge and was similarly h repayable by half yearly instalments, and not otherwise, of the same amounts and on the same dates except that the final instalment of £24,300 was repayable on 1st August 1972. This was, according to Mr Euinton, the plaintiff's main representative to give evidence, 'a notional replacement'. This legal charge contained various obligations and ties on the defendant in favour of the plaintiff of which I need only refer to those which I shall now mention.

j The defendant and Mr Tandy jointly and severally covenanted with the plaintiff that during the continuance of 'this security' the defendant would carry on at the property charged the business of a petrol station, and then so covenanted in these terms under which the injunction is sought. By cl 3 (VI) (ii):

'A. will purchase his total requirements of motor fuel for sale at and for use at or about the said property from the [plaintiff] and will not have upon or sell from the said property at any time any other brand or brands of motor fuel nor advertise any other brands thereon in any way B. will purchase from the [plaintiff] on its standard terms and will at all times keep sell advertise conspicuously display and exclusively use for his own consumption on the said property the [plaintiff's] brands of petroleum products (other than motor fuel) transmission oils lubricating greases preservatives anti-freeze and speciality oils C. The products referred to in paragraphs A and B of this sub-clause are hereinafter collectively referred to as "the specified products".' a

The defendant and Mr Tandy jointly and severally further covenanted with the plaintiff that the defendant—

'(viii) will place his orders so as to enable deliveries to be made to the said property of not less than Four Thousand (4,000) gallons of motor fuel at any one time and not less than one ton lots of lubricating oils and lubricating greases.' c

The plaintiff covenanted with the defendant by cl 4:

'... that the [plaintiff] will during the continuance of this security pay to the [defendant] a rebate of three halfpence per gallon on all motor fuels purchased by the [defendant] from the [plaintiff] hereunder for resale at the said property...' d

The plaintiff further covenanted with the defendant by cl 5 (2) that during the continuance of that security it would use its best endeavours to supply the defendant with all the requirements of the specified products, and by sub-cl (A) that the plaintiff would not be responsible for any failure to make deliveries or delay in making deliveries due to any circumstance not within its immediate control; and by (B) if by any such circumstance the availability from any of the plaintiff's sources of supply was curtailed or interfered with as either to delay or hinder the plaintiff or to prevent it from supplying the full quantity of the specified products, the plaintiff should be at liberty to withhold, reduce or suspend deliveries; and by (C) that the defendant would be free to purchase from other suppliers to make good any deficiency so arising. e

By a legal charge also of 30th January 1968 between the defendant and the plaintiff it was recited that the legal charge of 18th August 1967 between the plaintiff and the Mitcham company had been entered into at the request of the defendant, and that it was agreed on the treaty for it that the moneys thereby secured should be further secured and that in pursuance of such agreement the defendant thereby charged the Croydon station property with payment of the moneys secured by the Mitcham charge of 18th August 1967. f

On 2nd February 1968 the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant's solicitors that it seemed that as the result of further discussion the option terms had been amended to make the price £75,000 and that the option would not be exercisable after 29th February 1968. In the first week of February the plaintiff told Mr Tandy that it was not going to exercise the option. It appeared from the evidence that the decision was made partly because the Croydon station was found to be not of a measurement that would enable the development of it desired by the plaintiff possible and partly because a station at Pond Street, Croydon, which the plaintiff supplied and where it wanted a five year tie became available for purchase by the plaintiff at the price of £86,000. g

The plaintiff has not disclosed documentary evidence that presumably exists and which would throw light on its decision, nor put in any evidence from the official who, I am told, made the decision. I conclude for the purposes of this motion on the evidence as it stands that the plaintiff's having obtained the five year tie from the defendant was a material consideration in its deciding not to proceed with the exercise of the Croydon station option. h a has since remained the beneficial owner of those shares and in control of the defendant. By a deed made on 21st October 1968, between the defendant of the first part, Mr Tandy of the second part, Dartstone of the third part, Norstead Investments Ltd of the fourth part and the plaintiff of the fifth part supplemental to the legal charge dated 30th January 1968 between the defendant, the plaintiff and Mr Tandy, after reciting that the whole share capital of the defendant was vested in Dartstone, b (1) the plaintiff released Mr Tandy from his covenants in the legal charge, (2) Dartstone and Norstead jointly and severally covenanted with the plaintiff to observe and perform all the covenants by the defendant or Mr Tandy and all provisions in the legal charge to the intent that all its covenants and provisions should thenceforth be read and take effect as if Dartstone and Norstead had originally been parties thereto in place of Mr Tandy.

In October 1968 all the shares in the defendant were sold to Dartstone Ltd, which i

c Clause 3 is in these terms:

‘It is hereby expressly agreed and declared by and between the parties hereto that save as hereinbefore provided all the covenants terms conditions and provisions of the Legal Charge [i.e. of 30th January 1968 which I have dealt with] shall remain in full force and effect.’

d The defendant, now under Dartstone control, continued until January 1971 to retail the plaintiff’s petrol in accordance with their obligations of the legal charge of 30th January 1968, confirmed by the deed of 21st October 1968.

e In January 1971 there was an unofficial strike of the plaintiff’s tanker drivers, and therefore from 4th to 13th January there was no delivery of the plaintiff’s petrol to the defendant’s station. On 12th January the defendant took delivery of VIP petrol, as it was entitled to do in view of such failure of delivery, in accordance with the express terms to which I have referred of the legal charge. However, it continued to do so after the strike ended and the plaintiff became able and willing to deliver its petrol. So on 16th March 1971 the plaintiff issued the writ in this action.

The restraint of trade issue

f I will come now to the restraint of trade issue. The classical statement of the modern doctrine is, of course, in the well-known speech of Lord Macnaghten in *Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co Ltd*²:

‘All interference with individual liberty of action in trading, and all restraints of trade of themselves, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and therefore void. That is the general rule. But there are exceptions . . . It is a sufficient justification, and indeed it is the only justification, if the restriction is reasonable—reasonable, that is, in reference to the interests of the parties concerned and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public, so framed and so guarded as to afford adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed, while at the same time it is in no way injurious to the public.’

h The doctrine has been much considered since, and has been the subject of observations which are by no means easy to reconcile. But we are only concerned with those aspects of the doctrine which are in issue between the parties. It is common ground between the parties that (1) the restraints in this case are of a type (i.e. petrol sales tied agreements) which, as I have already said, are within the restraint of trade doctrine and nonetheless so because it is included in a mortgage of realty; (2) under i that doctrine (a) a covenant to be reasonable in the interests of the parties must protect some legitimate trade interest of the covenantee and impose no greater restriction than is reasonable for protection of that interest; (b) the onus of proving reasonableness in the interests of the parties lies on the covenantee, and reasonableness in the interests of the public on the covenantor; but, I interject, this is hardly material once the whole case has been deployed as it was before me; (c) reasonableness has to be tested as at the time when the restraint is entered into; (d) the mere postponement of a right to redeem a mortgage is not in itself unreasonable. There was a dispute as to other aspects of the law affecting reasonableness. a

It will be convenient to deal with the matters in dispute in the following order. (1) What is the duration of the restraints in this case? (2) Certain considerations peculiar to these particular restraints which the defendant claimed affected reasonableness between the parties. (3) Certain considerations of general application which may affect reasonableness, whether in the interests of the parties or the public; and (4) some governing considerations of law. b

First, then, (1). The defendant submitted that the legal charge of 30th January 1968, on whose covenants the plaintiff relied, was no more than a notional replacement of the legal charge of 22nd January 1965, and that the restraints were therefore for the period from 22nd January 1965, until 1st August 1972, that is seven years and seven months, and consequently void. As Mr Euntion agreed, the purpose of the new charge in 1968 was to obtain a tie that would run from January 1968, would conform to the undertakings required by the Board of Trade in consequence of the Monopolies Commission report, and would not be exposed to such objection on account of its duration as the 1965 tie might be. There was no additional money passed from the plaintiff to the defendant in 1968, so that there was no new advance in this sense in 1968. The 1968 legal charge was for the amount outstanding under the 1965 legal charge. But the 1968 charge was part of the transaction under which the plaintiff lent £40,000 to the Mitcham company. The letter of understanding of 30th June 1967 made the Mitcham loan conditional on the 1965 charge being replaced by a specified new charge (which in the event was the 1968 charge), and the second legal charge of 30th January 1968 recited that the loan to Mitcham had been made at the defendant's request. c

It is clear from the evidence as a whole that the 1968 legal charge relied on by the plaintiff was entered into in consideration of the plaintiff making the Mitcham loan under the Mitcham legal charge at the defendant's request as part of the 'package' transaction outlined in the letter of understanding. The 1968 legal charge relied on by the plaintiff was therefore not 'a notional replacement' of the 1965 legal charge but in reality and in law a separate new legal charge for a new consideration as part of a new transaction. Consequently, the covenant in restraint relied on by the plaintiff was for the period appearing on the face of the 1968 legal charge, that is four years and seven months, and not for the period of seven years, seven months submitted by the defendant. d

(2) The defendant submitted that its being precluded from redeeming the legal charge before the period of nearly four years and seven months, in view of what I have just stated, was unreasonable in the interests of the parties in view of certain considerations peculiar to this case. It was rightly pointed out that if the 1965 legal charge had not been replaced by the 1968 legal charge it could have been determined by the defendant covenantor on 6th August 1971, under the undertakings to the Board of Trade, that is before the expiration of the 1968 legal charge restraint on 1st August 1972. It was suggested that this meant that the defendant suffered and the plaintiff gained by replacing the 1965 tie by the 1968 tie. True, the defendant could have refused to enter into the 1968 legal charge and thus obtained the advantage of the 1965 tie expiring on 6th August 1971; but by not doing so it obtained the 'package' deal to which I have already referred. e

It was suggested that the restraints were, however, not reasonable because in the event the plaintiff did not purchase the Croydon station as provided or contemplated by the deed. But since it is common ground that reasonableness has to be decided as at the time when the restraint is entered into its reasonableness cannot depend upon f a the event. The failure to purchase the Croydon station properly falls to be considered and will be considered on the second main issue, namely the granting of an injunction. In my view, this suggestion is ill-founded.

(3) Considerations of general application claimed to affect reasonableness, whether in the interests of the parties or of the public.

b (a) Whether a loan at low rate of interest by the supplier to the retailer, as by the plaintiff to the defendant in this case, results in mis-allocation of resources. The defendant contended that although such low rate of interest might be compensated for by a higher charge for petrol to the retailer, yet since the interest was a fixed overhead charge and the total charge for petrol varied according to the amount sold to the retailer, then there would at least be a tendency for the price to be raised to the consumer, and, if the retailer's efficiency resulted in the purchase of more petrol c by him, it would result in more being paid to the supplier and not in less being charged to the consumer.

d Although this contention may well be correct as an appraisal of a tendency, at any rate if considered theoretically and in isolation, I find difficulty in attempting to assess it, and its practical significance was not perceptible. It appeared from the evidence that some misallocation that might be more directly and readily recognised was not occurring. Thus it appeared that since the introduction of solus tie agreements there had not been any substantial increase in the number of stations, nor that the services and amenities which they provide are excessive or such as the public do not require.

e (b) Whether a low interest rate induces the retailer to enter into the trade in ignorance of the real cost which he was incurring. It is said this was apt to occur because he might not appreciate how far the low rate of interest was offset by increased cost of petrol or how much petrol he would sell. It is clear, however, on the other hand, that it is a substantial advantage to the retailer to have a low interest rate in early years when he is building the turnover which is expected to justify the loan, provided, however, that the duration of the tie is not so long as to result in the later disadvantages of the increased cost of petrol substantially exceeding the early f advantages of low interest. It seems to me that a five year tie allows of no such danger, at any rate in our case, nor indeed in any other case referred to.

g (c) Insofar as the low rate of interest is counter-balanced by higher petrol charges to retailers generally as contrasted with such charges made to retailers individually according to their purchases, then it is understandable that the inefficient retailers may be subsidised to the detriment of the efficient retailers and the public. Again, it is difficult to assess the practical significance of this, and certainly in our case it was not established. As far as I can judge there is no substantial significance in this consideration.

h (d) How far the tie is required to provide security for the suppliers' investment. (i) It was suggested that there was insufficient refining by them in this country to meet the country's demands, with the implication, so I understood, that there was no need for ties to secure outlets for the refineries. Refineries, however, produce inevitably many products, and although the plaintiff's refineries have produced less petrol than is consumed here, it produces substantially more of the other products than can be consumed here. So the plaintiff is an importer of petrol but exporter of other refinery products. (ii) The defendant contended that provided suppliers were efficient they could sell in a competitive market and therefore would not require j ties to secure their investment. This, to my mind, is at first blush an attractive proposition, but it certainly has limitations. It does not pretend to suggest that a tie is positively disadvantageous to the security of investment, nor that it does not, by producing some sense of security of outlet for the suppliers, encourage investment by them. Further, despite its theoretical attraction, I find it difficult again to conclude with any assurance what the effect or fear of the tie system being abolished would in practice be. It seems to me quite speculative.

(e) Whether price stability is affected by the solus tie. The defendant suggested that it was impossible to show whether prices would remain stable or not if solus ties were abolished. The evidence, however, shows that the wholesale prices of petrol without tax have remained remarkably stable over the years under the tie system, and that the retail prices have kept remarkably low compared with retail prices in general (and this is in line with the Monopolies Commission report that the solus tie has exerted a downward pressure on prices). Thus, so far as I can judge, I would conclude that the solus tie system has in fact worked in favour of low prices. a

(f) Whether the tie secures economies in distribution. It was submitted by the plaintiff that the tie resulted in deliveries ('the drop') being in comparatively large quantities with obvious consequential economies. It was said that it achieved not only savings in delivery but substantial savings in sales staff. It was claimed that appreciably more staff would be necessary to obtain sales in a competitive free-for-all between suppliers if retailers could switch from supplier to supplier for unassured periods or for their requirements as they arose. There was acute conflict of view whether abolition of ties would result in exclusive or multi-brand retailing; but this suggestion by the plaintiff of economies under the tie system held, so it seems to me, as against both other forms of retailing. The defendant's attack on this suggestion was principally against the significance of the tie as a means of securing the large 'drop'. It was submitted that it could be achieved without a tie by discount according to the size of the 'drop'. Again I find it difficult to assess what the result of any feasible discount would be on the size of the 'drop' in an untied retail trade. I am satisfied that in fact the tie has produced substantial economies in distribution. Whether those economies could have been obtained or preserved without the tie in January 1968, or indeed now, seems to me to be just speculative. b

(g) How far services provided by the company to the retailer are advantageous and are dependent on the tie system. It seems that the costs borne by the company for such services are of no very substantial amount. They could doubtless be provided at cost to the retailers insofar as such cost is now borne by the company, and promotion schemes like teabags given to the public might be regarded as money better spent on reducing petrol prices, a criticism, however, which in this case, as in the case of advertising generally, might or might not be well founded in any particular instance, but which again was not established in evidence and with regard to which I am not in a position to come to any satisfactory conclusion. c

There were some other considerations affecting reasonableness that were referred to, but as they were admittedly subsidiary it is not necessary to pursue them. They were not such as to have any decisive effect on this application. So far as the considerations canvassed are relevant, (d) is relevant to reasonableness in the interests of the parties and (e) and (f) to reasonableness in the interests of the public, and in each of those three cases I conclude in favour of the plaintiff. The other questions which seemed to be directed to reasonableness in the interests of the public (though some, such as (b) might perhaps apply also to reasonableness in the interests of the parties) do not provide any answer that tells substantially in favour of either party to this application. So to whatever extent it may be argued whether any other questions than (g) are directed to the interests of the parties or the public or both, my overall conclusion would in any event be in favour of the plaintiff. d

The limitation of the tie to within five years allows for roughly 20 per cent of the ties in the trade ending in each year. In particular, when coupled (as the ties generally are) in solus agreements with loans at a low rate of interest repayable during the period of the tie, the result seems to me to combine freedom of trade with freedom of contract about as satisfactorily as can be devised. It seems to me that the evidence in our case is in line with the observations in the speeches in *Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd*³. e a The ratio decidendi on the restraint of trade issue

Some of the general considerations canvassed in our case partly, and some exclusively, depend on economic or business judgment. In the authorities there are observations to the effect that the question whether or not the tie is no more than is required for the protection of the covenantee, and therefore by common consent in our case reasonable in the interests of the parties, is a matter for business decision by the parties provided that the contract is a commercial contract in which there is bargaining equality. A petrol tie agreement between supplier and retailer is a commercial contract and it has been authoritatively said (e.g. in the Esso case⁴ speeches) that in general at any rate retailers have been at no disadvantage in bargaining with the suppliers over scarce petrol station sites; and no such bargaining inequality has been suggested in our case.

It seems to me right in principle and in accordance with the habitual inclination of the court, not to interfere with business decisions made by businessmen authorised and qualified to make them. This seems to me a proper recognition of freedom of contract within the doctrine of restraint of trade. And I for my part would prefer to rest my decision, so far as it is concerned with reasonableness in the interests of the parties, on this ground.

Such a decision would, of course, still leave the restraint open to attack on the ground that it is not reasonable in the interests of the public; e.g. the duration of the tie could be so attacked. The considerations which have been canvassed not only involve business and economic judgments which, if they are the relevant considerations, may be decisive of the conclusion of the court; they are also considerations which are prevalent throughout a considerable industry, and a decision of a court affected by such business and economic judgments on the generally limited evidence which happened to be adduced before it in a particular case may have widespread effects on economic and business policy throughout the industry. Such business and economic judgments are by their nature matters for policy decisions by business administration, government or parliament. This certainly does not mean that considerations of public interest within the doctrine of restraint of trade should be so decided, but it does tend to indicate that public interests within that doctrine are not concerned with such considerations. The doctrine grew in earlier years in comparatively simple economic and social conditions. They raised no such abstruse economic considerations as have been the subject of the expert evidence and divergent forecasting deployed in our case. Such considerations are of a different order altogether from such questions as whether a prohibition on an employee or vendor being engaged in some trade within three miles of a place is unreasonable, or indeed from the considerations in the Nordenfelt case⁵ itself.

The submissions and evidence in our case invite the question: what is the doctrine's purpose and scope? It arises from the deep concern of our common law with the personal liberty of the citizen. So innate is personal liberty to us as a people and thus to our common law that our common law has identified it with public policy. The doctrine of restraint of trade deals with the relationship of two consequential liberties: to contract and to trade. Lord Macnaghten's formulation⁶ sets the bounds between these liberties. It thus contains as its general fundamental proposition 'All interference with individual liberty of action in trading and all restraints of trade . . . are contrary to public policy', subject to exception if it is reasonable both with reference to the interests of the parties and of the public. Reasonable in the interests of the parties seems to me to have been sufficiently defined for present purposes as agreed by common consent of the parties in our case in accordance with the authorities, that the restraint is reasonable if it is no more than adequate for the protection of the legitimate interests of the covenantee.

⁴ [1967] 1 All ER 699, [1968] AC 269

⁵ [1894] AC 535, [1891-94] All ER Rep 1

⁶ [1894] AC at 565, [1891-94] All ER Rep at 18

But what is meant by reasonableness with reference to the interests of the public? It is part of the doctrine of restraint of trade which is based on and directed to securing the liberty of the subject and not the utmost economic advantage. It is part of the doctrine of the common law and not of economics. So it must, of course, refer to interests as recognisable and recognised by law. But if it refers to interests of the public at large, it might not only involve balancing a mass of conflicting economic, social and other interests which a court of law might be ill-adapted to achieve; but, more important, interests of the public at large would lack sufficiently specific formulation to be capable of judicial as contrasted with unregulated personal decision and application—a decision varying, as Lord Eldon LC put it, like the length of the chancellor's foot.

This seems to me in line with Sir Nathaniel Lindley MR's indication, in *E Underwood & Son Ltd v Barker*⁷, that a contract reasonable in the interests of the public cannot be held invalid 'on grounds of public policy unless some specific ground can be clearly established'. He added that he could think of no such ground except 'some pernicious monopoly'. Lord Parker of Waddington, delivering the conclusions of the Privy Council in *A-G of Commonwealth of Australia v Adelaide Steamship Co Ltd*⁸, interpreted this in view of the history of monopolies in this country as monopoly in the popular sense of being 'calculated to enhance prices to an unreasonable extent', and thus automatically traditionally considered as against public policy.

In *North-Western Salt Co Ltd v Electrolytic Alkali Co Ltd*⁹, the possible advantages of regulating the market and of large scale organisation were recognised. Economic conditions and experience had developed. The difficulty of appraising whether a restraint was reasonable with reference to the interests of the public at large became correspondingly more difficult. It appears, in my respectful view, that the legal assumption that 'pernicious monopoly' was contrary to the public interest survived the era in which it could be taken as axiomatically true in fact, and it was thus dealt with in effect by invoking the public interest directly instead of through the 'pernicious monopoly' assumption which had been taken to express it. But this involved the danger of leaving the interests of the public at large and so subject to the objections which I have ventured to make.

In *Dickson v Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain*¹⁰ Sachs LJ, in considering reasonableness with reference to the interests of the public, weighed a number of business and economic considerations and on balance formed his conclusion, as I have also felt obliged to do in this case. Lord Wilberforce agreed with Sachs LJ's conclusion, but the passage in which he did so, if, as I trust, I do not do it injustice, seems to me to bring out clearly both the difficulties of deciding what is relevant to public interests within the doctrine and the advantage of the public interests being dealt with through propositions recognised by the law. Lord Wilberforce said¹¹:

'If, moreover, one proceeds as did SACHS, L.J.,¹² to weigh the considerations of public interest—the second limb of LORD MACNAGHTEN's formula¹³—I think that equally the restraints do not survive the test. I would so hold on the simple ground, which I think is the relevant ground in this connection, that there is nothing here to displace the normal proposition that the public has in the absence of counter-vailing considerations an interest in men being able to trade freely in the goods which they judge the public wants and that these restraints clearly, severely and arbitrarily restrict this freedom. More special arguments to the effect that the restraints might cause a reduction in the number of pharmacies I would regard as less secure. Before I could accept them I should require persuasion first that

⁷ [1899] 1 Ch 300 at 305

⁸ [1913] AC 781 at 796, [1911-13] All ER Rep 1120 at 1124

⁹ [1914] AC 461, [1914-15] All ER Rep 752

¹⁰ [1967] 2 All ER 558 at 574, [1967] Ch 708 at 759

¹¹ [1968] 2 All ER 686 at 707, 708, [1970] AC 403 at 441

¹² [1967] 2 All ER at 574, [1967] Ch at 759

¹³ [1894] AC at 565, [1891-94] All ER Rep at 18

a this type of consideration may properly be taken into account in relation to the common law doctrine of restraint of trade (as contrasted with proceedings in the Restrictive Practices Court) . . .’

If my analysis and approach are correct, unreasonableness in the interests of the public refers to the interests of the public as recognised in a principle or proposition of law and not to the interests of the public at large. The question which such b unreasonableness raises would thus not be whether the restraint might be less in a different organisation of industry or society or whether the abolition of the restraint might lead to a different organisation of industry or society, and thus, on balance of many considerations, to the economic or social advantage of the country, but whether the restraint is in fact in our industry and society as at present organised, and with reference to which our law operates, unreasonable in the public interest as recognised c and formulated in such principle or proposition of law.

For my part, I prefer to decide that the restraints relied on in this case are reasonable in the interests of the public, not on balance of existing or possible economic advantages and disadvantages to the public but because there is, in conditions as they are, no unreasonable limitation of liberty to trade. It seems to me to follow that much of the evidence in our case directed to general considerations of economic policy was d irrelevant.

Lord Wilberforce¹⁴ stated the public interest in terms relevant to the case before him in ‘the normal proposition that the public has in the absence of countervailing considerations an interest in men being able to trade freely . . .’; and I would venture to express the public interest in terms relevant to our case and which appear to me to be consonant with Lord Wilberforce’s proposition of law, i.e. that the public has e an interest in men being able to trade freely subject (inter alia) to reasonable limitations which conform with the contemporary organisation of trade. The restrictions in our case are reasonable in reference to the interests of the public as expressed in this proposition. But—although only in the interests of the parties and by way of precaution in the present state of the law—I would also decide this issue in the plaintiff’s favour on the balance of the general considerations which I have already tried f to deal with in detail. Thus I decide the restraint of trade issue in favour of the plaintiff.

Should an interlocutory injunction be granted?

I come now to the second main issue, namely whether, on the footing that the plaintiff succeeds on the restraint of trade issue, an injunction should be granted. The defendant first submitted that the injunction should not be granted in view of g delay by the plaintiff in bringing the proceedings and this motion. As I have already stated, the breach of the tie occurred in the middle of January 1971. It seems that it was on 30th January that the plaintiff knew that the breach had definitely occurred. The writ was not issued until 16th March 1971. It appears that the plaintiff had failed on some similar earlier application owing to insufficient evidence with regard to its business, and it thus naturally took care to ensure that the evidence was ample h in this case. On 30th March, the day after completion of the evidence, the plaintiff served notice of motion with the evidence. The defendant’s evidence was completed on 4th May, and it was then that the plaintiff first learned that the defendant was relying on the unreasonableness of the restraint with reference to the interests of the public. The plaintiff thus had to obtain an economic expert’s evidence to counter the defendant’s economic expert’s evidence. On 21st June the evidence was completed.

i In view of considerable conflict of evidence, cross-examination was clearly necessary. Up to this point there appears to me to be no such delay as would disentitle the plaintiff to an injunction. The defendant, however, then complains that the plaintiff proceeded by motion instead of by application for speedy trial. But proceeding to trial would almost certainly not have produced as early a hearing by any means as the hearing of this motion, and it might well have led to considerable delays over interlocutory matters. It does not seem to me that the defendant's complaint of delay is well founded. a

Insofar as it was suggested that speedy trial would have had the advantage of discovery in particular, it is not a complaint founded on delay. The absence of discovery is a common factor in interlocutory applications, and insofar as it may be considered to be relevant at all, it seemed to me to go only to the question of probability of success at the trial. In this case absence of discovery is not of decisive significance, in my view, in considering the court's discretion to grant an injunction. b

It was submitted that no injunction should be granted because the plaintiff was not coming for equitable relief with clean hands. The uncleanness suggested arose from the plaintiff's failure to proceed with the option to purchase the Croydon station. It has been convenient earlier in this judgment to review as part of the relevant history leading to the action the facts relevant to this submission. It is clear that when the defendant signed the legal charge relied on it knew through its representative, Mr Tandy, that the plaintiff would not exercise the option at £90,000, but that Mr Euntou would recommend its exercise at £75,000. c

I am also satisfied on the evidence that the defendant, through Mr Tandy, knew throughout that the plaintiff might, in its own interest, decide not to exercise the option. It was a risk which Mr Tandy took on behalf of the defendant with his eyes wide open. But, as I have said, it was a material consideration in the plaintiff's decision not to proceed with the option that the defendant had already entered into the new tie by the 1968 legal charge. This has very understandably been attacked as dirtying the plaintiff's hands. But, uncommendable though this might be, it does not appear to me to be such in the circumstances as to disentitle the plaintiff to relief by injunction, particularly as, in view of the deed of 21st October 1968, to which the plaintiff and defendant were parties, the defendant agreed that all the provisions of the legal charge, including the covenants relied on by the plaintiff, should 'remain in full force and effect'. d

To obtain an injunction the plaintiff must establish a strong prima facie case or probability that it will succeed at the trial on the restraint of trade issue. Of that probability I am satisfied. Violation of the right so established on that issue is conceded. The governing consideration then becomes the maintenance of the status quo pending the trial. In deciding on whether the status quo shall be so maintained, regard must be had to the balance of convenience and the extent to which any damage to the plaintiff can be cured by payment of damages rather than by granting an injunction. The burden of proof lies on the plaintiff throughout. e

The plaintiff, however, as an exception to this rule, submitted (on the footing that it succeeded before me on the restraint of trade issue) that as the right in respect of whose violation it claimed relief was a contractual negative obligation, an injunction should follow as a matter of course in accordance with the principle stated by Lord Cairns LC in *Doherty v Allman*¹⁵. It is in these terms: f

'If parties, for valuable consideration, with their eyes open, contract that a particular thing shall not be done, all that a Court of Equity has to do is to say, by way of injunction, that which the parties have already said by way of covenant, that the thing shall not be done; and in such case the injunction does nothing more than give the sanction of the process of the Court to that which already is the contract between the parties. It is not then a question of the balance of convenience or inconvenience, or of the amount of damage or of injury—it is the specific performance, by the Court, of that negative bargain which the parties have made, with their eyes open, between themselves.' g

Those obiter observations were made not with regard to an interlocutory injunction but a perpetual injunction; not on motion but at the trial; and on the footing that there was no dispute as to the validity of the covenant relied on. Lord Cairns LC's reference to 'balance of convenience' is readily associated in our generation with h a interlocutory injunction; yet in Lord Cairns LC's generation Kekewich J in *Jenkins v Jackson*¹⁶, referred to it as comprising considerations relevant to the granting of perpetual injunctions; and even much later Kerr on Injunctions¹⁷ also so referred to it. It seems to me unlikely that Lord Cairns LC directed his mind to interlocutory injunctions at all; but about this there can be no certainty.

b If, of course, as here, the validity of the covenant is in dispute on an interlocutory application, it might well be that the judgment at the trial, after full discovery and evidence, will not be in accord with the interlocutory conclusion on a prima facie case and probability of success. And even if validity is not disputed on the motion, it is subject to being in issue at the trial; and it does not seem to me that the possibility of its being put in issue (for example, in the light of subsequent information and advice on it) can be justly ignored.

c Of course, the required degree of judicial conviction of success at the trial can vary from near certainty to something appreciably less, and the application of the *Doherty v Allman*¹⁸ rule to applications for interlocutory injunctions would make the injunction automatic on the probability of success at the trial being established, irrespective of the degree of such probability and every matter which, in accordance with the general rule, it is right for the court to take into consideration. The result would be that a probability of success barely established, without the advantage of full evidence and opportunity for full consideration, would result in an injunction in circumstances in which, until trial, the absence of injunction would be no disadvantage of any substance to the applicant and injunction would cause most serious harm to his opponent. It is not difficult to conceive of such a situation.

d The plaintiff referred to *Hampstead and Suburban Properties Ltd v Diomedous*¹⁹.
e However, the crucial sentences there have to be read bearing well in mind the careful qualifying words and the significance of the maintenance of the status quo to which I shall come.

So my conclusion is that the principle of *Doherty v Allman*¹⁸ does not apply to interlocutory injunctions.

f The defendant submitted that the maintenance of the status quo means maintenance of the present situation as contrasted with the maintenance of the situation as it was before the defendant's breach of covenant. The maintenance of this status quo as submitted by the defendant includes the purchase and sale by the defendant of petrol other than the plaintiff's. It thus makes the court's governing consideration the maintenance of a state of affairs in which the defendant is violating the plaintiff's strong prima facie right; a quite unacceptable proposition. On the other hand, the maintenance of the situation as it was before the defendant's breach of covenant involves more than maintaining the situation. It involves the contrary, namely abandoning the situation in order to restore an earlier situation. But the choice of meaning of status is not just between these alternatives. It can, and does generally at any rate, in my view, refer to the maintenance of the contemporary situation including what has resulted from past violations of the plaintiff's prima facie right but excluding any repetition of the violations. (I am not here concerned with mandatory g injunctions.)
h

i The maintenance of the status quo would thus, in case of, say, a building involving strong prima facie trespass, mean leaving, as it is, so much as has been built but not permitting any repetition of the prima facie trespass by building more, and it would in our case mean no more repetition of the strong prima facie breach of covenant which has been established. The maintenance of such a situation recognises the limitation arising from the prima facie character of the right established on the one hand and the objections to the court countenancing future breaches of such right on the other hand.

16 (1888) 40 Ch D 71 at 77

17 A Treatise on the Law and Practice of Injunctions, 6th Edn, p 32

18 (1878) 3 App Cas 709

19 [1968] 3 All ER 545 at 550, [1969] 1 Ch 248 at 259

On matters relevant to the maintenance of the status quo the only consideration that was relied on to any substantial extent was the danger of it becoming insolvent as the result of the enforcement of the restraint. This was prayed in aid as affecting the balance of convenience in its favour: but it became clear, even on the evidence from the defendant, that this was not sustainable. Any advantage to the defendant from the defendant's present suppliers as compared with the plaintiff would clearly not be decisive on insolvency. There was a consensus that the station is not a good station site, and that its substantial success for a period was due to the character of Mr Tandy and of the competition at that time. The defendant's evidence showed that it can be sold now subject to the tie for as much as it will fetch at the end of the tie period, and that it would probably fetch more if it is sold for a purpose other than a petrol station. Otherwise the considerations (including the need for restraints to protect the plaintiff's outlets and investment and the inadequacy of damages as a remedy) told clearly in favour of an injunction being granted.

My overall conclusion is that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief which it claims.

Injunction granted.

Solicitors: Stephenson, Harwood & Tatham (for the plaintiff); Parker, Thomas & Co (for the defendant).

Jacqueline Metcalfe Barrister.

Thompson (Inspector of Taxes) v Salah

CHANCERY DIVISION

MEGARRY J

29th NOVEMBER 1971

Capital gains tax – Short-term gains – Disposal of asset – Contract to dispose of asset – Contract for sale of land – Contract not in writing and so unenforceable – Conveyance executed by separate documents – Vendor executing legal charge for full value of property in favour of purchaser – Conveyance of fee simple to purchaser on following day in consideration of release from covenant for repayment under legal charge – Contract for sale constituting disposal although unenforceable – Legal charge to be ignored for purpose of computing gain – Vendor liable for gain assessed on full value of property – Finance Act 1962, ss 12 (2), 13 (7).

On 11th July 1962 land and houses were conveyed to the taxpayer's wife for nearly £26,000. On 30th September 1963 the wife conveyed part of the property to a purchaser. For the purposes of short-term capital gains tax the cost of the property retained was just over £6,500. In 1964 the wife received from K an offer of £20,000 for the property retained and, without entering into any written contract of sale, she accepted the offer. If she had conveyed the property in the usual way, there would have been liability for tax on just under £13,500. Instead, on 18th September 1964, she executed a legal charge for £20,000 in favour of K, and the next day conveyed the fee simple in the property to K in consideration of K releasing her from her covenant for repayment under the legal charge. In those circumstances the taxpayer contended before the General Commissioners that the wife, by mortgaging her property, had relinquished her right in it but acquired the right of equity of redemption; by mortgaging the property for its full value of £20,000 she had acquired an equitable right which had no market value and which she disposed of for no value; and a mortgage did not constitute a disposal for the purposes of short-term gains tax. The General Commissioners discharged an assessment to short-term gains tax in respect of the disposal of the land retained. The Crown appealed.

Held – (i) The taxpayer's contentions were unsound because—

(a) a legal charge did no more than give the chargee the same protection, powers and remedies as if a mortgage term of 3,000 years had been created in his favour, so that when the wife executed the legal charge on her property she did not relinquish a her legal right in the property, but retained her legal fee simple quite apart from her rights in equity (see p 533 f, post);

b (b) the creation of a legal charge did not thereby reduce the value of the fee simple; a purchaser would still pay a vendor the full value of the fee simple, out of which the vendor would discharge the mortgage and so convey the unencumbered fee, or the purchaser would agree to take a transfer both of the fee simple and the mortgage debt in which case the owner would still receive the full value by being released from the debt charged on the house (see p 533 g to j, post).

c (ii) The Crown's appeal would be allowed because the contract for the sale of the retained land, although not in writing and so unenforceable by action, constituted the 'disposal' by virtue of s 12 (2)^a of the Finance Act 1962, and under s 13 (7)^b of that Act capital gains were to be computed on the basis that the property was disposed of free of any subsisting interest or right by way of security and for this purpose the legal charge accordingly fell to be ignored; the transaction was in substance a sale even though it was carried out by two separate documents (see p 534 f and g, post).

Notes

For the law relating to short-term capital gains, see Supplement to 20 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) paras 182, 542A.

d For the Finance Act 1962, ss 12, 13, see 42 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn) 345, 348.

For the year 1970-71, ss 12 (2), 13 (7) of the 1962 Act were replaced by ss 162 (2), 164 (8) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970.

For the year 1971-72 and subsequent years of assessment the charge to tax under Case VII of Sch D (short-term gains) has been abolished by s 56 (1) of the Finance Act 1971.

e Case stated

At a meeting of the General Commissioners for the division of Central Birmingham held on 13th November 1969 Mohammed Salah ('the taxpayer') appealed against an assessment to income tax for the year of assessment 1964-65, made on him under Case VII of Sch D by virtue of s 10 of the Finance Act 1962, in respect of the short-term gains of his wife, in the sum of £13,066.

f The question in issue before the commissioners was whether a transfer of property by the taxpayer's wife in September 1964 gave rise to a gain from the disposal of an asset, taxable under s 10 of the Finance Act 1962. The taxpayer's wife was resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom in the year 1964-65.

The commissioners found the following facts admitted or proved on the evidence adduced at the hearing of the appeal: (a) On 11th July 1962 the taxpayer's wife purchased property in Alcester Road South, Birmingham 14 ('the Alcester Road property') for £25,850. (b) On 30th September 1963 a portion of the Alcester Road property was sold to Shell Mex and BP Ltd for £30,000. (c) The value of the property sold was apportioned between the part sold and the part retained by the taxpayer's wife and a chargeable gain of £10,000 in respect of the part sold was agreed. (d) In 1964 the taxpayer's wife received an offer from Kenash Property Development Ltd ('Kenash') to buy the remainder of the Alcester Road property at the price of £20,000 which was the full market value of the property. The taxpayer's wife agreed to accept this offer but no written contract of sale was entered into by her. (e) For short-term gains purposes the cost to the taxpayer's wife of the remainder of the Alcester a Section 12 (2) provides: 'For purposes of Case VII, where a contract is made to acquire or dispose of an asset (including an asset not in existence or not ascertained at the time of the contract), the contract shall be deemed to be the acquisition or disposal of the asset (for the consideration provided for by the contract), and the conveyance or transfer of an asset or of an interest or right in or over an asset in pursuance of a contract previously made shall not be deemed to be an acquisition or disposal of the asset.'

j b Section 13 (7) provides: 'An asset shall be treated as having been acquired free of any interest or right by way of security subsisting at the time of any relevant acquisition of it, and as being disposed of free of any such interest or right subsisting at the time of the disposal.'

Road property was £6,551 and on a sale thereof for £20,000 she would incur a liability to short-term gains of £13,449. (f) The taxpayer's wife sought advice as to the reduction or avoidance of her prospective liability to short-term gains in respect of the proposed sale to Kenash. She was advised to complete the sale to Kenash by the two documents next referred to. (g) By a mortgage dated 18th September 1964 the taxpayer's wife mortgaged the remainder of the Alcester Road property to Kenash for £20,000. (h) By a conveyance dated 19th September 1964 the taxpayer's wife conveyed the equity of redemption in the property comprised in the said mortgage to Kenash in consideration of her release from the obligation to repay the mortgage of £20,000. (i) The taxpayer's wife then ceased to have any further interest in the property.

It was contended on behalf of the taxpayer: (a) that by mortgaging the property the taxpayer's wife had not disposed of it; (b) that under the rules of equity the taxpayer's wife, by mortgaging the property, relinquished her right in it but acquired the right of equity of redemption; (c) that by mortgaging the property for its full market value of £20,000 the taxpayer's wife acquired an equitable right which had no market value; (d) that the taxpayer's wife made a disposal of the equity of redemption at its market value, which was nil; (e) that no capital gains tax liability could arise from the disposal; (f) that no tax was payable under the short-term gains tax legislation.

It was contended by the Crown: (a) that the transaction between the taxpayer's wife and Kenash was one transaction by way of sale at a price of £20,000, which was implemented by two deeds; (b) that a conveyance of property for a consideration constituted a disposal for short-term gains unless otherwise exempted, and the conveyance was not so exempted; the taxpayer's wife received from Kenash £20,000 subject to an obligation to repay it which was immediately released and this constituted a receipt to her of that sum; (c) that, alternatively, the legal effect of the deed was to vest the unencumbered fee simple of the property thereby conveyed to Kenash. The consideration moving to the taxpayer's wife was the release of a debt of £20,000, which sum had been paid to her at or immediately before the date of the deed and which accordingly had a market value of £20,000; (d) that the assessment should be determined at £13,449.

The commissioners felt that it was never the intention of the Finance Act 1962 to permit such a transaction, but on the evidence before them they upheld the taxpayer's appeal and discharged the assessment.

The Crown appealed by way of case stated to the High Court.

P L Gibson for the Crown.

P G Whiteman for the taxpayer.

MEGARRY J. This is an appeal by way of case stated from the General Commissioners for the division of Central Birmingham. Counsel for the taxpayer has told me that he feels unable to contend in support of the decision of the commissioners, and so I can be relatively brief in my judgment. I think, however, that I ought to set out my reasons shortly, as I understand that the point has, or may have, some relevance to capital gains tax generally; and in any case I am reversing the decision of the commissioners.

The actual case concerns an assessment to short-term capital gains tax for 1964-65 under the Finance Act 1962, s 10, in a sum of rather over £13,000 made on the taxpayer in respect of a transfer of property made by his wife. The property consists of land and houses in the Birmingham area which became vested in the taxpayer's wife under a conveyance dated 11th July 1962 for nearly £26,000. By a conveyance dated 30th September 1963 the wife conveyed part of the property for £30,000, and it was agreed that after apportionment there was a chargeable gain of £10,000. No question arises about this disposition. For the purposes of short-term capital gains tax the cost of the property retained was just over £6,500.

- a* In 1964 the wife received an offer of £20,000 for the property retained from Kenash Property Development Ltd (which I shall call 'Kenash'); and without entering into any written contract of sale, she accepted the offer. If she had conveyed the property in the usual way, there would have been liability for tax on just under £13,500, and so she took advice as to how the burden could be reduced or avoided. She was given advice, and plainly acted on it. She executed a legal charge for £20,000 dated 18th September 1964 in favour of Kenash. By a conveyance the next day, 19th September, she conveyed the fee simple in the property to Kenash in consideration of Kenash releasing her from her covenant for repayment under the legal charge. In those circumstances the taxpayer contended that no short-term capital gains tax was payable and the assessment should be discharged. In reciting their decision in para 8 of the case stated the commissioners said no more than that they—
- c* 'felt that it was never the intention of the Finance Act 1962 to permit such a transaction, but on the evidence before us we upheld the [taxpayer's] appeal and discharged the assessment.'

The question of law stated for the opinion of this court is—

- d* 'whether on the facts and evidence before us our decision as set out in paragraph 8 above was erroneous in law.'

The case stated discloses no more than this of the process of reasoning whereby the commissioners reached their conclusion, nor of which of the legal arguments they accepted and which they rejected.

- e* With one exception, all the contentions advanced by the taxpayer, as recorded in the case stated, are clearly and obviously wrong. One contention was that under the rules of equity the wife, by mortgaging the property, 'relinquished her right in it but acquired the right of Equity of Redemption'. Whatever might be said about this proposition in relation to a mortgage by conveyance of the fee simple before 1926, it is plain nonsense in relation to a legal charge. Such a charge, authorised for the first time by the Law of Property Act 1925, s 87, does no more than give the chargee 'the same protection, powers and remedies' as if a mortgage term of 3,000 years had been created in his favour. When the wife had executed the legal charge on this property she had not 'relinquished her right in it'; for she retained her legal fee simple, quite apart from her rights in equity.
- f*

- g* Two other contentions were that 'by mortgaging the property for its full market value of £20,000, [the taxpayer's wife] acquired an Equitable Right which had no market value', and that '[the taxpayer's wife] had made a disposal of the Equity of Redemption at its market value, which was nil'. In my judgment these propositions betray an obvious confusion of thought. If a man owns the fee simple in a house worth £10,000 and then borrows £6,000 on the security of the house he does not thereby reduce the value of his fee simple to £4,000. He still owns a fee simple worth £10,000, but that fee simple is now encumbered by a debt of £6,000. A purchaser will still pay £10,000 for the house if he takes no more than what the owner has, namely, the fee simple. Out of that £10,000 the owner can discharge the mortgage and so convey the unencumbered fee. Alternatively, the purchaser may agree to take a transfer both of the fee simple and the mortgage debt. In that case the owner of the house still receives £10,000 for it, £4,000 in the form of cash and £6,000 by means of his being relieved of the burden of the debt for this amount. In popular parlance, I suppose one may regard the owner's interest in the house as being worth a mere £4,000; but that figure is achieved only by striking a balance between the value of his fee simple and a particular form of obligation, namely, the debt charged on the house. A man's property, retained by him unchanged, will not gradually sink in value to nil and then to a minus quantity as his debts pile up and he slides into insolvency, nor does his house or his interest in it fluctuate up and down in value with every debit and credit in his bank account merely because the house stands charged to the bank to secure his overdraft.
- j*

I do not know which of these propositions the General Commissioners accepted: they are all insupportable. The only other contention for the taxpayer that is recorded, other than general assertions that no tax was payable and that the assessment should be discharged, was that 'by mortgaging the property, [the taxpayer's wife] had not disposed of it'; and that by itself, saying nothing of the conveyance, plainly does not carry the taxpayer to victory. In fact, that is the only argument of the taxpayer that counsel for the Crown was able to accept; for under the Finance Act 1962, s 12 (9), a mortgage does not constitute a disposal. a
b

With the taxpayer's unarguable arguments out of the way, I may turn to the true position. I am primarily concerned with the question of what amounts to an acquisition and disposal of an interest or right in or over assets (Finance Act 1962, ss 10 (1), 12 (1)); and for this purpose the Act makes special provision. Counsel for the Crown put his submissions under three heads. First, where a contract is made to acquire or dispose of an asset, and that contract is duly carried out, it is the contract and not the conveyance that constitutes the acquisition or disposal: s 12 (2); and see Sch 9, para 1 (1). Here, there are clear findings by the General Commissioners that there was a contract. Among the facts admitted or proved there appear the following statements: c 'In 1964, [the taxpayer's wife] received an offer from Kenash to buy the remainder of the Alcester Road property at the price of £20,000, which was the full market value of the property. [The taxpayer's wife] agreed to accept this offer but no written contract of sale was entered into by her [Then, a little further on:] ... [the taxpayer's wife] sought advice as to the reduction or avoidance of her prospective liability to Short Term Gains in respect of the proposed sale to Kenash. She was advised to complete the sale to Kenash by the two documents next referred to'; d and, of course, those two documents are the mortgage and the conveyance. It is true that there was no written contract, but, of course, that does not mean that there was no contract; even if a contract is supported by neither writing nor part performance, it remains a contract despite being unenforceable by action. Secondly, by s 13 (7) (and see s 12 (9)), any capital gains are to be computed on the basis that the property was acquired and disposed of free of any subsisting interest or right by way of security. For this purpose, the legal charge accordingly fell to be ignored. Thirdly, the transaction was in substance a sale even though it was carried out by two separate documents. The legal charge provided for repayment in six months' time; but there was obviously no reality in that provision. In my view, the two deeds taken together constitute a conveyance just as much as did the old device of lease and release. In my judgment all three submissions are sound. f

e

g

It follows that I consider that the General Commissioners were wrong in law in the conclusion that they reached. One may indeed sympathise with them in being asked to apply the complexities of the ten pages of the statute book occupied by ss 10 to 13 of the Act in relation to the law of mortgages; and, not for the first time, the expression 'equity of redemption' may have proved to be a will-o'-the-wisp in the morass. But wrong they were; and this simple device for escaping the consequences of short-term capital gains tax, a device which would no doubt have attracted to itself many eager customers, has proved a device which escapes nothing. On the face of the case stated there is a small discrepancy in the amounts, for the assessment is said to be on £13,066 and the argument was for £13,449; but it is accepted that the latter is the correct figure and that the taxpayer should be assessed on that. Accordingly, I hold that the decision of the commissioners was erroneous in law, that the appeal should be allowed, that the taxpayer should be assessed on £13,449, and that any necessary directions should be given for this purpose. h
j

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Solicitor of the Inland Revenue; Alan Lorenz & Co (for the taxpayer).

K Buckley Edwards Esq Barrister.

Crawford v Houghton

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND GRIFFITHS JJ

14th DECEMBER 1971

Road traffic – Construction, weight, equipment and use of vehicles – Regulations – Using vehicle on road which fails to comply with regulations – Using – Owner of vehicle – Liability – Vehicle being driven on road by third party at owner's request – Whether owner using vehicle – Road Traffic Act 1960, s 64 (2), as substituted by the Road Traffic (Amendment) Act 1967, s 6 (1).

Although the owner of a vehicle may be 'using' the vehicle for the purposes of s 64 (2)^a of the Road Traffic Act 1960, as amended, when it is being driven by his servant, he is not using it when it is being driven by a person other than his servant even though it is being driven at the owner's specific request and with his full knowledge (see p 538 g and h and p 539 a, post).

Dictum of Lord Parker CJ in Windle v Dunning and Son Ltd [1968] 2 All ER at 48 applied.

Notes

For using a vehicle on a road which fails to comply with the regulations governing the construction and use of vehicles, see 33 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 634, para 1069, and for a case on the subject, see 45 Digest (Repl) 70, 205.

For the Road Traffic Act 1960, s 64, see 28 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 241.

Cases referred to in judgment

Carmichael & Sons Ltd v Cottle [1971] RTR 11.

Macleod v Penman, Hamilton v Blair and Meechan, Hawthorn v Knight 1962 JC 31, 1962 SLT 69, 45 Digest 135, *1178.

Windle v Dunning and Son Ltd [1968] 2 All ER 46, [1968] 1 WLR 552, 132 JP 284, Digest (Cont Vol C) 921, 205a.

Cases also cited

Griffiths v Studebakers Ltd [1924] 1 KB 102.

James & Son Ltd v Smea [1954] 3 All ER 273, [1955] 1 QB 78.

Mousell Brothers Ltd v London & North Western Railway Co [1917] 2 KB 836, [1916-17] All ER Rep 1101.

Case stated

This was an appeal by way of case stated by the justices for the city of Liverpool in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Dale Street, Liverpool, on 19th April 1971. The respondent, James Houghton, chief constable of Liverpool and Bootle, preferred an information against the appellant, Carl Crawford, charging that he on 17th May 1970 did use a motor vehicle on the road without a valid licence or insurance and in contravention of several of the regulations of the Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1969^b made under s 64 of the Road Traffic Act 1960.

The following facts were found. At 1.20 pm on 17th May 1970 Inspector Menzies of the Liverpool and Bootle Constabulary saw a man called Mr Gaule driving the vehicle referred to in the information along West Derby Road, Liverpool, away from the city. It was bearing trade plates of which the licensee was a firm called Barrow Engineering Autos of Seel Street which has no connection with either the appellant or Mr Gaule. The vehicle bore no licence, no wings, no mirrors inside or out, no horn, no lights or reflectors. The speedometer had no cable. The vehicle had an angle-iron frame and crash-bar with sharp corners. There were sharp edges on the scuttle, and the rear valance was hanging down. It had no hand brake. At 1.55 p.m. Inspector Menzies saw the appellant who had arrived at the scene and asked him if he were the owner. He replied 'Yes, we bought it as a write-off'. The inspector asked him if it was being used on account of his business and he replied 'Yes, it is being taken to Kirkby'. The vehicle was adapted for racing on a track in stock car races and there was a meeting of that nature taking place at Kirkby Stadium that afternoon.

^a Section 64, so far as material, is set out at p 536 j, post

^b SI 1969 No 321

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the evidence showed that the appellant was not present when the vehicle was being used by Mr Gaule and that the prosecution had failed to prove that the appellant knew that Mr Gaule was using the vehicle on a road or intended so to do. Further, there was no evidence that Mr Gaule was the appellant's servant and so the appellant could not be guilty of the offences, which were offences of strict liability, without it being proved that he knew the essential facts which constituted the offences.

The justices convicted the appellant and he was later fined £10 on each count and his licence endorsed where appropriate.

J Briggs for the appellant.

E Somerset Jones for the respondent.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated from justices for the city of Liverpool sitting as a magistrates' court at Liverpool on 19th April 1971. In the course of their adjudication they convicted the appellant of ten offences all concerned with the condition and use of a particular motor vehicle on a particular occasion. The motor vehicle is described as a stock car, but all that the case stated tells us by way of amplification of that information is that it seemed to have failed to comply with practically every known regulation affecting motor cars; there was an unauthorised use of trade plates, the vehicle had not got an excise licence, it had not got any wings, it had not got a mirror, it had not got an instrument capable of giving audible and sufficient warning of approach, it had not got lights, and so the catalogue goes on, ten offences altogether. At 1.20 p.m. on 17th May 1970 a somewhat astonished police officer saw this vehicle being driven on the highway by a Mr Gaule. The vehicle was stopped, and after a short interval the appellant arrived on the scene, obviously having come there because of some association with the vehicle. The police officer asked the appellant if he was the owner, and he replied, 'Yes, we have bought it as a write-off'. The inspector then asked if it was being used on account of his, the appellant's, business, and the appellant replied 'Yes, it is being taken to Kirkby', and the reference to its being taken to Kirkby was that there was a stock car racing meeting at Kirkby Stadium that afternoon and the vehicle was going to Kirkby on the appellant's behalf for the purposes of that meeting.

The justices gave the following opinion in the course of their case. They said that they were of opinion that in view of the evidence of the police officer, there was evidence that Mr Gaule had been using the vehicle with the authority of the appellant and with his knowledge and that therefore the appellant was using the vehicle.

The only argument before us, and it has been an interesting and valuable argument, is whether it was correct to convict the appellant in these circumstances of the offence of using the defective vehicle. The regulations which were breached are regulations made under the Road Traffic Act 1960, and the section, which is s 64 (2)¹, provides as follows:

'Subject to the provisions of this section, a person—(a) who contravenes or fails to comply with any such regulations as aforesaid; or (b) who uses on a road a motor vehicle or trailer which does not comply with any such regulations or causes or permits the vehicle to be used; shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £50.'

¹ As substituted by s 6 (1) of the Road Traffic (Amendment) Act 1967

a The argument which is put before us today by counsel for the appellant is that on the facts found by the justices it may well have been open to them to convict the appellant of causing or permitting the vehicle to be used in this defective condition, but, says counsel for the appellant, it was not open to the justices to convict him of using the vehicle.

b There is a great deal of authority in recent years on points similar to the one with which we are now concerned; the offence of using is an absolute offence, whereas the offence of causing or permitting requires knowledge on the part of the accused. It is often more difficult to convict, therefore, of causing and permitting than it is of using, but it is quite clear that the prosecution must lay their information under the correct constituent of the section, and if in fact this was only causing or permitting and not using, the correct answer is that the information should be dismissed.

c I feel it possible to start in regard to authority on this point with *Windle v Dunning and Son Ltd*². This was a case in which quarry owners had entered into a contract with haulage contractors to supply vehicles and drivers for the purpose of hauling the stone from the quarry and on an occasion three of these vehicles were found on the road with excessive loads, and the quarry owners were charged with using these vehicles in contravention of the appropriate regulations. Lord Parker CJ, having read s 64 (2), went on in these terms³:

d 'In my judgment, as was said by the Lord Justice-General (LORD CLYDE) in giving judgment in MacLeod v. Penman, Hamilton v. Blair and Meechan, *Hawthorn v. Knight*⁴, "The presence in the section of the alternatives of causing or permitting the use must limit the scope of what is 'using'. Normally 'using' is applicable to the actual driver." [Then Lord Parker goes on:] I entirely agree with that, and in my judgment, "using" when used in connexion with causing and e permitting has a restricted meaning. It certainly covers the driver; it may also cover the driver's employer if he, the driver, is about his master's business, but beyond that I find it very difficult to conceive that any other person could be said to be using the vehicle as opposed to causing it to be used.'

f Applying that judgment to the present circumstances would lead to the conclusion that the appellant had been wrongly charged, because there is no suggestion that Mr Gaule, who was driving the vehicle, was his servant, and Lord Parker CJ's classification of those who are to be treated as using would exclude, it seems, the appellant.

g The other more recent authority which I find helpful, which is again a decision of this court, is the case of *Carmichael & Sons Ltd v Cottle*⁵. This was a case in which a vehicle had been let out on hire for self-drive hire, and the vehicle was found after a period of the hiring to be defective in regard to its tyres. The question arose whether the owners of the vehicle who let it out on hire could be described as using it in that condition, when in fact the driver of the vehicle was of course the hirer. Lord Parker CJ said this⁶:

h 'It has long been held that, when the offence is not merely an offence of user but can be an offence of causing or permitting the user, a restricted meaning should be given to "use".'

He refers then to *Windle v Dunning and Son Ltd*², and repeats what he said in the earlier case by way of reference to the Lord Justice-General's judgment in *MacLeod v Penman*⁷. He deals with an argument not previously raised, namely that even if the

j 2 [1968] 2 All ER 46, [1968] 1 WLR 552

3 [1968] 2 All ER at 48, [1968] 1 WLR at 556

4 1962 JC 31 at 46, 1962 SLT 69 at 75

5 [1971] RTR 11

6 [1971] RTR at 14

7 1962 JC 31

owners of the vehicle in that case could not be regarded as its users, they could nevertheless be convicted of aiding and abetting the user. He says⁸:

'Mr Barnes for the prosecution fully recognises that; but he says that, in this case, unlike *MacLeod v Penman*⁹ and *Windle v Dunning and Son Ltd*¹⁰, there is room as it were for the application of the general principle in relation to aiders and abettors. He says here that, on the facts found by the justices, it is permissible to treat the defendants as accessories before the fact. It may be, and I find it unnecessary to decide it, that the answer to that is that, when the words used are "using or causing or permitting", there is no room for the application of the principle in regard to aiders and abettors. The statute in other words itself provides the alternatives, and, if a person is to be charged as an aider and abettor or an accessory, he should be so charged, and under these provisions should be specifically charged with causing or permitting the user.'

Then he goes on to deal with the necessity for the prosecution making it clear in the information what is the case they propose to make against the defendant.

Ashworth J, agreeing with the judgment¹¹, said that he would like for his part—

'to express my own agreement with what had fallen from Lord Parker CJ about the nature of the charge which should be brought when the prosecution seek to render someone liable not as himself being the user of the vehicle but as someone who is an aider and abettor and, to use a familiar phrase, has counselled and procured the misuse of the vehicle, but I agree entirely with what Lord Parker CJ has said.'

I have not found this a particularly easy case because I find it difficult to accept that if a man can use a vehicle through the hands of his servant, he cannot be said to use it at the hands of someone who at his specific request drives it on a journey at the express orders and with the full knowledge of the owner. No doubt the line must be drawn somewhere, and Lord Parker CJ's judgments to which I have referred show a tendency to restrict the capacity of persons using in cases where the alternatives of permitting or causing to be used are provided.

I have thought for some time that it might be right for us to say in the present case that there is yet another category of user for present purposes, not merely the actual driver or his employer, but someone who by specific and immediate direction causes a vehicle to be driven in the manner in which it was driven in this case. But in the end I have come to the conclusion that it would not be right in view of the authorities to strive to extend the meaning of 'use' for the present purposes, and that only confusion may follow in subsequent cases if we endeavour so to do.

I have therefore come to the conclusion that this is a case on the wrong side of the line as far as the prosecution are concerned, and that although the appellant would clearly have been guilty of a charge of permitting the use, he was not a user within the authorities and therefore his conviction of using the vehicle on charges 3 to 10 inclusive is one which ought to be set aside. It may be that different considerations would apply to the first two charges if considered in isolation because there the section creating the offence does not contain the alternative of 'causing or permitting' but this was not explored in the court below and I would not feel it right to make a distinction in this court, in view of the fact that the possibility of distinction was not canvassed by the fact-finding tribunal. I think that the only right way of disposing of this matter is to allow the appeal and quash all convictions.

8 [1971] RTR 11 at 14

9 1962 JC 31

10 [1968] 2 All ER 46, [1968] 1 WLR 552

11 [1971] RTR 11 at 15

a ASHWORTH J. I agree.

g GRIFFITHS J. I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

b Solicitors: Jeffrey Gordon & Co agents for Silverbeck & Co, Liverpool (for the appellant); Cree, Godfrey & Wood, agents for R H Nicholson, Liverpool (for the respondent).

Jacqueline Charles Barrister.

Jemmison v Priddle

c QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND GRIFFITHS JJ

8th DECEMBER 1971

d Game – Licence – Exceptions and exemptions from need to hold licence – Deer – Taking or killing deer on enclosed lands by direction or permission of owner or occupier – Enclosed lands – Farmland – Accused shooting deer on farm with owner's permission – Deer shot on owner's land crossing boundary and dying on neighbouring land where accused had no permission to shoot – Whether farmland 'enclosed lands' – Whether killing of deer on owner's land – Game Licences Act 1860, ss 4, 5.

e Magistrates – Information – Duplicity – Taking or killing game without a licence – Information alleging killing of two deer in one charge – Shots fired within seconds from same geographical location – Shots separate acts – Whether shots constituting single activity – Whether information bad for duplicity – Game Licences Act 1860, s 4.

f The appellant, who did not hold a game licence, was shooting deer on B's farm with B's permission. A friend who was with him put up two deer from a covert, and the appellant fired three shots. One shot missed. The second hit and killed one of the deer when it had already left B's land and was on the neighbouring land of P, where the appellant had no permission to shoot. The third shot hit the other deer on B's land. The deer then ran on to P's land where it died. An information was preferred against the appellant charging that he 'unlawfully did take and kill and pursue certain Game, to wit, two red deer' without a licence contrary to s 4^a of the Game Licences Act 1860. He was duly convicted, the justices holding that he had no defence under s 5^b of the 1860 Act since B's farm was not 'enclosed lands' within the meaning of that section. They took the view that 'enclosed lands' meant land in the nature of a deer park, where deer were kept and where the landowner from time to time might require deer to be killed. On appeal the appellant contended (a) that the information was bad for duplicity in that it alleged two offences, i.e. the killing of each of the two deer; alternatively, (b) that the justices were wrong in holding that B's farm was not enclosed land, and (c) that even if the appellant was guilty of killing the first deer on P's land, he was not guilty in respect of the other which was shot on B's land.

g Held – (i) The information was not bad for duplicity; a charge was only bad for duplicity when it alleged facts constituting two different activities; it was legitimate to charge in a single charge one activity even though that activity might involve j a Section 4, so far as material, provides: 'Every person, before he shall in Great Britain take, kill, or pursue, . . . any game . . . or any deer, shall take out a proper licence to kill game under this Act . . . and if any person shall do any such act as herein-before mentioned in Great Britain without having duly taken out and having in force such licence as aforesaid, he shall forfeit the sum of twenty pounds.'

b Section 5, so far as material, is set out at p 542 b, post more than one act; although the firing of each shot could be regarded as a separate act, they had occurred within a very few seconds and all in the same geographical location and therefore could be fairly described as components of a single activity, i.e. shooting red deer without a game licence; accordingly it was proper to join them in a single charge (see p 544 d and e, post); dictum of Lord Parker CJ in Ware v Fox [1967] 1 All ER at 102 applied.

(ii) B's farmland was 'enclosed lands' within the meaning of s 5 of the 1860 Act; the contrast was between enclosed lands, such as land used for farming and enclosed by normal agricultural hedges, and moorland where there were no enclosures and where the deer could run free (see p 543 a and b, post).

(iii) As the appellant had no permission to kill the deer shot on P's land, he was guilty of the offence charged in respect of that killing; as, however, the second deer had been shot on B's land, the killing had taken place on land where the appellant had the permission of the owner or occupier to hunt even though the deer only dropped when it had passed on to P's land; accordingly, by virtue of s 5 of the 1860 Act, no offence had been committed in respect of that killing (see p 543 c and d, post).

(iv) As the justices had treated the matter as a single offence, the conviction was justified and the appeal would be dismissed (see p 544 f, post).

Notes

For offences in connection with game licences, see 18 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 123, 124, 152-155, paras 255, 311-313, and for cases on the subject, see 25 Digest (Repl) 409, 410, 393-397.

For informations charging more than one offence, see 25 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 187, 188, para 339, and for cases on the subject, see 25 Digest (Repl) 410, 397, and 33 ibid 199-201, 407-423.

For the Game Licences Act 1860, ss 4 and 5, see 14 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 476.

Cases referred to in judgment

R v Ballysingh (1953) 37 Cr App Rep 28, 14 Digest (Repl) 249, 2153.

Ware v Fox [1967] 1 All ER 100, [1967] 1 WLR 379, 131 JP 113, Digest (Cont Vol C) 670, 243bd.

Cases and authority also cited

Blade v Higgs (1863) 9 HL 633.

Dolby v Halmshaw [1936] 3 All ER 229, [1937] 1 KB 196.

Sherras v De Rutzen [1895] 1 QB 918.

Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice, 37th Edn, para 122.

Case stated

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the county of Devon, acting in and for the petty sessional division of South Molton in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at South Molton on 12th May 1971.

On 28th April 1971 an information was preferred by the respondent, Gordon William Priddle, against the appellant, Raymond Ronald Jemmison, charging that he, on 6th February 1971 at Lower Sheepsbyre Farm, Chulmleigh, in the county of Devon unlawfully did take and kill and pursue certain game, to wit two red deer without having duly taken out and having in force such a licence as was and is required by s 4 of the Game Licences Act 1860.

The justices heard the information on 12th May 1971 when the appellant was represented by a solicitor and pleaded not guilty. The respondent was represented by a solicitor, who called witnesses to give evidence and read, in accordance with s 9 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, the statement of a veterinary surgeon. The appellant then gave evidence. The justices convicted and fined him.

The justices found as a fact that the appellant with a friend, Mr Clements, asked permission to shoot deer on the farm of Mr Burke. The appellant waited with a a 12-bore shotgun while the other two drove deer out of a wood past him. He shot at two of the running deer. One hind crossed the stream boundary on to the farm of Mr Pincombe, where it turned and looked back. The appellant claimed to recognise this as the sign of a wounded deer and fired a further ball across Mr Pincombe's land. The veterinary surgeon's evidence showed that this hind was shot in the neck and would have died instantly. He described no other wounds.

b The appellant stated that another hind crossed the stream and dropped in its tracks on Mr Pincombe's land. The veterinary surgeon described severe shoulder injuries compatible with this animal having been shot with a single ball cartridge on Mr Burke's land. Both animals fell many yards inside Mr Pincombe's boundaries and the justices were satisfied that one of them was shot on Mr Pincombe's land. Mr Pincombe had given no one permission to shoot on his land and would not allow the appellant and his friends to remove the two deer carcasses. The appellant claimed c that he and his friend, Mr Clements, had permission from farmers to shoot over upwards of a thousand acres of Exmoor, but he realised that he was a trespasser when he entered Mr Pincombe's farm.

The justices' conclusions took account of the fact that the shooting of deer basically requires a game licence and that deer are mentioned in the Game Licences Act 1860 d in a separate exception from snipe and other game. They considered that the phrase 'deer in enclosed lands' in s 5 of the Game Licences Act 1860 must relate to deer in a special category and that the exception permitting an owner of such lands to shoot deer without a licence applied to specially kept and bred herds; it contemplated special methods of enclosure adopted for the containment of animals on private land, so that the landowner was empowered by the Act to control the population of deer e within the enclosed lands. The justices felt that the exception could not be widened to cover an owner of enclosed farmland. Fences were for the enclosure of domestic cattle and do not establish boundaries conferring ownership of wild deer on those who merely enclosed land to fence in their own cattle. For these reasons the justices concluded that wild deer did not belong to the landowner as did those which were reared and cared for in semi-domesticated deer herds. The justices further con- f sidered the question of permission that was given by Mr Burke to the appellant so that the latter could claim the benefit of the exception in s 5 of the 1860 Act and s 98 of the Agriculture Act 1947, as amended, and s 10 of the Deer Act 1963 concerning depredation of crops by deer. The evidence that they accepted led them to believe that one deer was certainly killed instantly on another farmer's land where the appellant could not claim 'permission' to shoot. The justices concluded that, even g if their view that 'enclosed lands' in the exception related to deer parks of reared animals, was erroneous, nevertheless the owner of one farm (if that was 'enclosed lands') could not confer shooting rights by reason of 'enclosure' on the appellant enabling him to fire over the boundaries so as to kill deer on another farm, nor could he confer any right he claimed under the Agriculture Act 1947^c, as amended, to shoot depredating deer without a game licence to another person who was shooting deer h for sport. Further no evidence was led by the appellant that Mr Burke had suffered any depredation by deer. The fact that the later Agriculture Act^c gave special exemption to farmers to shoot depredating deer would seem to lend support to the justices' conclusion that such permission is not conferred under the Game Licences Act 1860. These being their conclusions, they convicted the appellant.

Nigel Inglis-Jones for the appellant.

j I B S Edwards for the respondent.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated from justices for the county of Devon sitting at South Molton who on 12th May 1971 convicted the appellant, Raymond Ronald Jemmison, on an information alleging the following offence:

c I.e., ss 98 and 100; see 1 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 211-214

'That he on the 6th February, 1971, at Lower Sheepsbyre Farm, Chulmleigh in the County of Devon unlawfully did take and kill and pursue certain Game, to wit, two red deer without having duly taken out and having in force such a Licence as was and is required by the Game Licences Act, 1860.'

To look at the legislation to begin with, the Game Licences Act 1860 requires the taking out of a licence for anyone who seeks to take and kill game in Great Britain and prescribes a penalty for neglect. But s 5 of the same Act contains a number of exceptions and exemptions, the exceptions dealing with the circumstances of the activity and the exemptions dealing with certain personalities who are exempted from the operation of the Act. Under the exceptions one finds in exception 5: 'The taking and killing of deer in any enclosed lands by the owner or occupier of such lands, or by his direction or permission.' For the present purpose the offence charged was committed by the appellant unless, in the circumstances of the offence or the alleged offence, s 5 applied to exempt him. The case stated is not, I am bound to say, quite as clear as it might be. It is not the first time today that this court has been faced with a case stated which does not clearly set out the facts proved. One cannot overstress the importance of clear findings of fact as the basis of an appeal by case stated. However, it seems to me that one can take as the basic circumstances which the justices must have found in this case the following. On the day in question the appellant with a friend was shooting deer; he had obtained permission to shoot on the farm of a Mr Burke, and to the farm of Mr Burke he and his friend repaired. The friend put up two deer from a covert and the appellant waited with his 12-bore shotgun, as it is described in the case, to shoot them when they appeared. Two running deer appeared and the appellant fired three shots; one shot missed and is wholly unaccounted for, one shot hit a hind when it had left the land of Mr Burke and was already on the neighbouring land of a Mr Pincombe. This first hind was hit and killed when it was on Mr Pincombe's land, it having run there from the land of Mr Burke. In regard to the second hind, this was killed by the third shot fired by the appellant. This fell on Mr Pincombe's land having run there from the land of Mr Burke, but there was apparently, according to the justices, some evidence of a veterinary surgeon to the effect that this second hind was hit when it was on Mr Burke's land and nevertheless ran on in a wounded state until it fell on Mr Pincombe's land. It is unsatisfactory that the justices do not say whether they accepted that veterinary evidence or not. I think in the circumstances that this court ought to assume that the justices found that as a fact, and thus produced a picture in which both animals fell on Mr Pincombe's land, whereas one was hit on Mr Burke's land and subsequently moved on to Mr Pincombe's land.

The relevance, of course, of the difference between the one land ownership and the other is that the appellant had permission to shoot on Mr Burke's land, he had no permission to shoot on Mr Pincombe's land, and as I have already pointed out in exception 5, one of the requirements of the exception is that the killing of deer should be by the owner or occupier of such land or by his direction or permission.

I should proceed to say something of the justices' own view. They had to consider whether the land on which all this happened consisted of enclosed lands within the meaning of exception 5. If the land did not consist of enclosed land, then the exception could not apply, and the offence was undoubtedly committed. Having given the matter careful attention, the justices took the view that enclosed lands in this context were lands in the nature of a deer park, lands in the nature of an enclosure where deer were kept and where the landowner might require power to kill deer from time to time in order to maintain the herd and to cull out those animals which were weakly or sick. The justices, as I read their case, eventually came to the conclusion that these lands were not enclosed lands because they were perfectly ordinary Devonshire farmland and were not in any sense a deer park or place where deer were artificially accumulated and kept.

a The first point taken by counsel for the appellant today is that the justices were wrong in the meaning they gave to the phrase 'enclosed land'. All I can say on this point is that I agree with counsel for the appellant's argument, an argument which is not seriously disputed by counsel for the respondent. I think in this context the contrast is between enclosed lands, such as lands used for farming and enclosed by normal agricultural hedges, and moorland where there are no enclosures and where the deer can run free. In my judgment all land with which we are concerned here, b whether it be the land of Mr Burke or of Mr Pincombe, being ordinary Devonshire farmland was enclosed land for present purposes. Thus counsel for the appellant makes his first point.

c The second question of course is to decide whether these two deer were killed on land where the appellant had the permission of the owner to kill them. So far as the deer which was shot on Mr Pincombe's land was concerned, the appellant clearly had no permission from the owner of that land to kill the deer; in fact Mr Pincombe was extremely angry about it one gathers, and refused to allow the carcase to be removed. On the other hand, if it be right that the second deer was hit on Mr Burke's land and moved on to Mr Pincombe's land before it dropped, then in my judgment the shooting of the second deer would have been a killing within the meaning of the exception on land where the appellant had the permission of the d owner or occupier to hunt. Accordingly, taking the matters raised so far, the position would be that the appellant would be guilty in respect of the first deer but not guilty in respect of the second; in respect of the second the killing would have been within his legal rights, although he had no game licence under the Act.

e That brings us, however, to the third and last point taken by counsel for the appellant, and indeed perhaps the point which has given the court the most trouble, because now at the eleventh hour counsel for the appellant submits that the information was in any event bad for duplicity. He maintains that although no word of this was said in the court below, and therefore no opportunity was given to the prosecution to amend this information if it wished, he submits nevertheless that in this court, it being a matter going to jurisdiction, he is entitled to raise it, and that it is conclusive f of the appeal in his favour. With some reluctance on my part I feel bound to accept that it is open to counsel for the appellant to raise this matter in this court notwithstanding the history of the case. One therefore has to consider the correctness of the submission which he seeks to make. His argument briefly is that the information relates to two red deer, that the killing of each of those deer was a potential offence in the absence of the appellant having a game licence, so he says you have an information bad for duplicity because it contains within itself an allegation of two separate g offences. The principles which determine the circumstances in which an information will or will not be bad for duplicity are not clearly laid down. There are various landmarks, as it were, in the subject for guidance, but there is a substantial area in between where the court must in my judgment retain a measure of discretion. I take as one landmark *R v Ballysingh*¹, and it suffices to read the headnote:

h 'Where, in a case of shoplifting, the evidence for the prosecution shows that a number of articles have been taken from different parts of a large stores, the proper course is to make each taking the subject of a separate count for larceny.'

i Thus if the accused is alleged to have gone to one department and picked up a handful of tomatoes, or whatever it may be, it is perfectly legitimate to charge that as a single offence. If the accused spends a substantial time going round the floors picking up a separate article here and another article there, on the authority of *R v Ballysingh*¹ those individual articles ought to be charged separately. One asks oneself why? What is the principle which distinguishes between these two cases, and one finds that the explanation is given in somewhat inappropriate language, namely that the test is whether the acts were all one transaction. That is a phrase hallowed by time but not, in my judgment, of particular assistance in dealing with a particular problem. I find some more assistance from somewhat different language used by Lord Parker CJ in *Ware v Fox*². It is not necessary to deal with the facts of the case; it suffices to say that there, there was a charge under s 5 of the Dangerous Drugs Act 1965 in which an allegation was made that premises were being used for the purpose of smoking cannabis resin or for the purpose of dealing in cannabis resin, and a considerable argument developed whether that count was bad for duplicity or not. In dealing with this Lord Parker CJ said³:

'I find it easiest to approach the matter by considering what would have been the position if this information had been laid under para. (a) [of s 5 of the Dangerous Drugs Act 1965]. If laid under para. (a), it would, as it seems to me, allege a user for two completely different activities, one for the purpose of smoking and the other for the purpose of dealing. Prima facie, therefore, it is alleging two separate offences. It is quite different from the sort of case which alleges one activity achieved in one of two different respects.'

I think perhaps that phraseology from Lord Parker CJ is more helpful to me than the phraseology often found in the textbooks, and I think that what it means is this, that it is legitimate to charge in a single charge one activity even though that activity may involve more than one act. One looks at this case and asks oneself what was the activity with which this man was being charged? It was the activity of shooting red deer without a game licence, and although as a nice debating point it might well be contended that each shot was a separate act, indeed each killing was a separate offence, I find that all these matters, occurring as they must have done within a very few seconds of time and all in the same geographical location, are fairly to be described as components of a single activity, and that made it proper for the prosecution in this instance to join them in a single charge. I would find, therefore, that the information was not bad for duplicity, and I would find that the conviction was justified, at all events in regard to the deer which on any view of the matter was hit after it had reached Mr Pincombe's land.

ASHWORTH J. I agree.

GRIFFITHS J. I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Field, Fisher & Co, agents for J Furse, Sanders & Frith, South Molton (for the appellant); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co, agents for N B Jennings, Exeter (for the respondent).

N P Metcalfe Esq Barrister.

² [1967] 1 All ER 100, [1967] 1 WLR 379

³ [1967] 1 All ER at 102, [1967] 1 WLR at 381

R v HM Inspector of Taxes, ex parte Clarke

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SALMON, BUCKLEY AND ORR LJJ

25th, 26th, 27th OCTOBER 1971

Income tax – Appeal – Case stated – Determination of appeal by commissioners – Declaration of dissatisfaction immediately after determination – Immediately – Crown declaring dissatisfaction and requiring case to be stated for opinion of the High Court – Commissioners' determination communicated by post – Delay of 13 days before Crown declaring dissatisfaction – Alternative assessments – Commissioners upholding one assessment and discharging alternative assessment at Crown's invitation – Taxpayer expressing dissatisfaction and requiring case to be stated in respect of first assessment – Whether Crown precluded by reason of invitation from expressing dissatisfaction with discharge of alternative assessment – Whether dissatisfaction declared immediately – Whether failure to declare dissatisfaction immediately precluding commissioners from stating case – Income Tax Act 1952, s 64 (1), (2).

At the conclusion of the hearing of an appeal against alternative assessments to income tax under Case I of Sch D and to short-term capital gains tax under Case VII on a profit made by the taxpayer, the General Commissioners indicated (with the concurrence of both parties) that they would consider the matter and put their decision into writing. As the decision would deal with several complex points of law the Crown's representative at the hearing, M, asked the commissioners to send the written decision to him at Somerset House in London and reminded the clerk to the commissioners by telephone during the following month. On 9th March 1970 the commissioners made their decision, by which they affirmed the assessment to income tax under Case I and, as they had been invited by M to do in such an eventuality, discharged the Case VII assessment. The commissioners stated however that, if not assessable under Case I, the profit would have been properly chargeable to capital gains tax under Case VII. Owing to an oversight in the office of the clerk to the commissioners the decision was sent, not to M, but to the office of the inspector of taxes at Sudbury, arriving on the following day. A newly appointed inspector, who had had nothing to do with the case and did not appreciate that it might be necessary to take urgent action on an appeal which the Crown had won, did not forward the decision to Somerset House until 20th March. M received it on 23rd March. Realising the importance of keeping open the decision on the Case VII assessment in the event of an appeal by the taxpayer against the Case I assessment, M wrote to the clerk to the commissioners on the same day stating that, although the commissioners' discharge of the Case VII assessment was inevitable in view of the confirmation of the Case I assessment and it might therefore seem illogical at first sight for the Crown to express dissatisfaction, he was doing so as a precaution solely to safeguard the Crown's position in the High Court in the event of the taxpayer asking the commissioners to state a case. He pointed out that it did not mean that the Crown necessarily contemplated asking the commissioners to state a case. The taxpayer had in fact already expressed dissatisfaction with the decision under s 64 (1)^a of the Income Tax Act 1952 and had requested the commissioners to state a case under s 64 (2)^a. On 2nd April M asked the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court on the Case VII assessment. The taxpayer applied for an order directed to the commissioners prohibiting them from stating a case on the ground that they had no power to do so since the Crown had failed to give notice of dissatisfaction 'immediately' as required by s 64 (1) of the 1952 Act. It was further contended by the taxpayer that the Crown was in any event precluded from expressing dissatisfaction with the commissioners' discharge of the Case VII assessment since they had acquiesced in its discharge.

^a Section 64, so far as material, is set out at p 549 e, post

Held – An order prohibiting the commissioners from stating a case for the opinion of the High Court on the Case VII assessment would not be granted for the following reasons—

(i) the Crown had expressed their dissatisfaction with the determination of the commissioners as being erroneous in point of law ‘immediately after the determination’ of the appeal in accordance with s 64 (1); the requirement that dissatisfaction should be expressed ‘immediately’ meant that it should be expressed with all reasonable speed according to the circumstances of the case; the Crown had, in the circumstances, expressed dissatisfaction with all reasonable speed in view of the fact (a) that where a decision was given through the post there was no obligation to communicate the dissatisfaction to the other party who could not, therefore, be affected by any delay, (b) that the only reason for the delay in informing the commissioners was the oversight on the part of their office in failing to send the decision to M at Somerset House as requested, and (c) that M had written to the clerk to the commissioners expressing the Crown’s dissatisfaction on the day that the commissioners’ decision reached him (see p 550 g and j, p 551 b to d and h, p 554 j and p 555 g and h, post); dictum of Fletcher Moulton LJ in Re Coleman’s Depositories Ltd and Life and Health Assurance Association [1904-07] All ER Rep at 387 applied.

(ii) even if the Crown’s dissatisfaction could not be said to have been expressed immediately, the requirement of immediacy was directory and not mandatory since it was of no discernible material importance to the subject-matter with which s 64 of the 1952 Act was concerned; the fact that the notice of dissatisfaction had not been served immediately did not therefore deprive a party of his right to have a case stated for the High Court, nor did it put the party at the mercy of the commissioners so that it was in their discretion whether to state a case or not (see p 553 d and h, p 554 a and j and p 556 b, post); dictum of Lord Penzance in Howard v Bodington (1877) 2 PD at 210, 211 applied;

(iii) the Crown were not precluded from challenging the commissioners’ decision on the Case VII assessment by reason of the fact that, in the light of the confirmation of the Case I assessment, they had acquiesced in its discharge; the two assessments were alternative to each other and it would be absurd if the Crown had to go before the court to hear an appeal by way of case stated against the Case I assessment without being able to appeal against the discharge of the alternative assessment under Case VII (see p 554 e f and j and p 555 c to e, post).

Decision of the Queen’s Bench Divisional Court [1971] 3 All ER 394 affirmed on other grounds.

Notes

For appeals by way of case stated against determinations of the General or Special Commissioners of Income Tax, see 20 Halsbury’s Laws (3rd Edn) 44, 690, 691, paras 61, 1362.

For the Income Tax Act 1952, s 64, see 31 Halsbury’s Statutes (2nd Edn) 66.

As from 6th April 1970, s 64 of the Income Tax Act 1952 has been replaced by s 56 of the Taxes Management Act 1970.

Cases referred to in judgments

Andrew v Taylor (1965) 42 Tax Cas 557, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 117, 341.

Barker v Palmer (1881) 8 QBD 9, 51 LJQB 110, 45 LT 480, 13 Digest (Repl) 425, 508.

Coleman’s Depositories Ltd and Life and Health Assurance Association, Re [1907] 2 KB 798, [1904-07] All ER Rep 383, 76 LJKB 865, 97 LT 420, 30 Digest (Repl) 213, 555.

Grainger v Singer [1927] 2 KB 505, 96 LJKB 917, 137 LT 629, 11 Tax Cas 704, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 569, 2102.

Howard v Bodington (1877) 2 PD 203, 42 JP 6, 44 Digest (Repl) 304, 1340.

Inland Revenue Comrs v Park Investments Ltd [1966] 2 All ER 785, [1966] Ch 701, [1966] 3 WLR 65, 43 Tax Cas 215, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 399, 1463.

- a Liverpool Borough Bank v Turner (1860) 1 John & H 159, 29 LJCh 827, 3 LT 84; affd 2 De GF & J 502, 30 LJCh 379, 5 Digest (Repl) 832, 7023.
R v Edmonton Income Tax Comrs, ex parte Thompson [1929] 1 KB 220, 98 LJKB 201, 140 LT 380, 14 Tax Cas 313, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 569, 2100.
R v Pontypool Gaming Licensing Committee, ex parte Risca Cinemas Ltd [1970] 3 All ER 241, [1970] 1 WLR 1299, Digest (Cont Vol C) 397, 352Ab.
- b Taylor v Taylor (1875) 1 Ch 426, 45 LJCh 373; affd (1876) 3 Ch 145, 44 Digest (Repl) 317, 1484.

Appeal

The taxpayer, Horace Linsell Clarke, appealed against an order of the Queen's Bench Divisional Court (Lord Widgery CJ, Ashworth and Willis JJ) made on 11th May 1971 and reported at [1971] 3 All ER 394, dismissing the taxpayer's motion for an order of prohibition directed to the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the Division of Freshwell prohibiting them from stating and signing a case under s 64 (2) of the Income Tax Act 1952 at the request of the inspector of taxes for the district of Sudbury on 2nd April 1970. The request followed the commissioners' decision on 9th March 1970 to discharge an assessment on the taxpayer under Case VII of Sch D of the 1952 Act for 1964-65. The facts are set out in the judgment of Salmon LJ.

- d M D Jones for the taxpayer.
P W Medd for the Crown.

SALMON LJ. In January 1967 an assessment was made on the present appellant, Mr Clarke ('the taxpayer'), in the sum of some £23,000, under Case VII of Sch D in respect of a short-term capital gain arising as a result of the acquisition and subsequent disposal of Muchmore's Farm, Great Saling, in Essex. Between January 1967 and January 1969 it appeared that the taxpayer might be going to say that the profit or gain (if any) was not a short-term capital profit or gain, but was a gain attributable to his trade. It is quite plain from s 10 (1) of the Finance Act 1962 that short-term gains can be chargeable under Case VII only if they are not gains which accrue as profits of a trade. Accordingly in January 1969 another assessment (which in effect was an alternative assessment) was made for a similar sum in respect of the same transaction, but it was made under Case I of Sch D as being a profit or gain in respect of a transaction which was an adventure in the nature of trade.

The taxpayer appealed against both these assessments. The appeals came on for hearing before the General Commissioners of Income Tax for Freshwell in January 1970 and the hearing appears to have occupied six whole days. At that hearing the inspector who had made the assessments was represented by Mr MacKeith, a member of the Bar who is employed in the office of the Solicitor of Inland Revenue. He made it plain to the commissioners that they could not affirm both assessments; that if they affirmed the assessment under Case I they would have to discharge the assessment under Case VII. At the hearing the taxpayer had the advantage of being represented by Mr Marcus Jones and the points taken on his behalf were these: first of all, it was said that he was not engaged in trading in land; then that in any event he had not made a short-term capital gain and indeed that there was no gain of any kind to be taxed; and a number of complex points of law were argued in support of those latter contentions. At the conclusion of the hearing the General Commissioners indicated that they would consider the matter and put their decision into writing and this, according to the affidavit of the taxpayer's solicitor, was done with the concurrence of both parties to the appeal.

Mr MacKeith at the conclusion of the hearing asked the clerk to the commissioners to send the written decision to him at Somerset House in London. It must have been apparent to Mr MacKeith that the decision would deal with a number of complex points of law and that it was important that he should see it at the earliest opportunity so as to be able to advise his client what to do and to take the necessary steps on behalf of his client. When he made that request to the clerk to the General Commissioners he obviously had the ostensible authority of his client to ask that the decision of the commissioners should be sent to him (Mr MacKeith) who would receive it on behalf of his client and deal with it for him. Moreover, in the following month of February he telephoned Mr Jenkins, the clerk to the commissioners, and asked him when the decision might be expected and at the same time reminded him that the decision was to be sent to him (Mr MacKeith) at Somerset House. There is no suggestion at all that Mr Jenkins demurred to that request and, of course, there was no reason why he should have done so. a

b

The General Commissioners reached their decision on 9th March, and a copy was duly sent to the taxpayer, but unfortunately, through some slip or oversight in the office of the clerk to the General Commissioners, the decision was not sent to Mr MacKeith at Somerset House, but was sent direct to the inspector of taxes' office at Sudbury. As chance would have it, on that very day, so we are told, Mr Rivett, who had been attending to this matter as inspector and who had given evidence at the hearing before the commissioners, having previously handed all the papers in the appeal over to Mr MacKeith to deal with, ceased to operate at the office in Sudbury. His place was taken by Mr Follett, an inspector of taxes, who is the nominal respondent, but he in fact, according to the uncontradicted evidence, had had nothing to do with the appeal. When the decision reached him on 10th March, not being a lawyer, he did not appreciate that there was any urgent action to be taken, so he did not send off the decision to Mr MacKeith at the office of the Solicitor of Inland Revenue until 20th March. It reached Mr MacKeith on 23rd March. c
d

Pausing there, the decision (which I do not propose to read) was to the effect that the taxpayer's repurchase and subsequent sale in 1964 of Muchmore's Farm was an adventure in the nature of trade. I should say the fiscal year in question, in respect of which the assessments were made, was 1964-65. The decision also stated that the profits of the adventure amounting to some £23,000 were properly chargeable to tax under Case I of Sch D, and therefore the assessment under that case was affirmed. It followed that the assessment under Case VII of Sch D was discharged. Then the decision goes on to state: 'If the said repurchase and sale of Muchmore's Farm had not been an adventure in the nature of trade the profit would have been properly chargeable to tax under Case VII of Schedule "D" ' in the sum of some £23,000—the exact figure is stated. The decision then goes on to deal with a number of points which had been raised by counsel for the taxpayer at the appeal; the decision bristles with determinations in respect of points of law. e
f

As soon as this decision reached Mr MacKeith on 23rd March, he reacted with exemplary promptitude, because it occurred to him as a lawyer—and I do not believe it would occur to anyone except a lawyer—that, if by any chance the taxpayer asked for a case stated in respect of the decision on the assessment under Case I and succeeded in persuading the High Court that there was no material on which the commissioners could have come to the conclusion that he had been trading in land, then it would have followed that the Case I assessment would have been discharged, and unless he (Mr MacKeith) took prompt steps, the decision which had been reached in respect of the Case VII assessment would stand and the taxpayer, who might owe very large sums by way of tax and surtax in respect of the adventure, would be in the clear. It was obvious to Mr MacKeith that it was necessary to preserve the position of the inspector so that when the matter came before the High Court it might be argued on behalf of the inspector—and I cannot for the moment see very much answer to the argument—that if the taxpayer was not trading in land and therefore could not be assessed to a profit under Case I and had in fact made a profit or gain out of the transaction in question, he had properly been assessed in respect of that profit or gain under Case VII. g
h
i

On 23rd March Mr MacKeith wrote a letter to the clerk to the General Commissioners and the penultimate paragraph of that letter reads:

a 'Although the Commissioners' discharge of the 1967 Case VII assessment was inevitable in view of the confirmation of the 1969 Case I assessment and it may therefore seem illogical at first sight for the Crown to express dissatisfaction I am doing so as a precaution solely to safeguard the Crown's position in the High Court in the event of [the taxpayer] asking your Commissioners to state a case. It does not mean that, as at present advised, we contemplate asking the Commissioners to state a case.'

b He feared that the taxpayer might ask for a case to be stated in respect of the assessment under Case I, and his fears were justified, because the taxpayer, having on 13th March expressed dissatisfaction with the findings of the commissioners in respect of the assessment under Case I, a few days later requested the commissioners to state a case. I think that it is a fair inference that this came to the notice of Mr MacKeith and, accordingly, on 2nd April 1970, he asked the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court in respect of the assessment under Case VII which they had discharged. That was done obviously to protect the position of the Crown should the taxpayer succeed by way of his case stated on the assessment under Case I.

c The taxpayer then applied, by leave, to the Divisional Court to prohibit the commissioners from stating and signing a case in respect of the decision of the commissioners relating to the Case VII assessment. The Divisional Court¹ refused the application for prohibition and from that refusal the taxpayer now appeals to this court.

d In order to understand the points at issue, it is necessary to refer to s 64 of the Income Tax Act 1952, which makes provision for an appeal, either by the Crown or by the taxpayer, to the High Court by way of case stated from any decision of the commissioners. Section 64 reads:

e '(1) Immediately after the determination of an appeal by the General Commissioners, or by the Special Commissioners, the appellant or the surveyor, if dissatisfied with the determination as being erroneous in point of law, may declare his dissatisfaction to the Commissioners who heard the appeal.

f '(2) The appellant or surveyor, as the case may be, having declared his dissatisfaction, may, within twenty-one days after the determination, by notice in writing addressed to the clerk to the Commissioners, require the Commissioners to state and sign a case for the opinion of the High Court thereon . . .'

g It is to be observed that the 21 days in sub-s (2) has been enlarged to 30 days by s 23 of the Finance Act 1958 and para 5 of Sch 6 to that Act. Therefore, the request for a case stated made by Mr MacKeith on behalf of the inspector on 2nd April was well within the 30 days from the date of the determination which was 9th March.

h The main points taken on behalf of the taxpayer are, first of all, that the expression of dissatisfaction contained in Mr MacKeith's letter of 23rd March was not made 'immediately' after the determination; and, secondly, that since it was not made immediately after the determination, there was no power in the commissioners to state a case inasmuch as the requirement in s 64 that the expression of dissatisfaction should be made immediately after the determination was a mandatory provision and that the right of the taxpayer or of the Crown, as the case may be, to appeal to the High Court by way of case stated depended on their having expressed dissatisfaction with the determination immediately after the determination had been made.

i So two points arise for decision, the first being this: was the expression of dissatisfaction made 'immediately' after the determination within the meaning of that word in s 64 (1)? The second point is: if it was not made immediately, does that take away the right to appeal by way of case stated, which is the only method of appealing against the decision of the commissioners?

Dealing with the first point, there is no direct authority as to the meaning of the word 'immediately' in s 64 (1). There is one case, *Re Coleman's Depositories Ltd and Life and Health Assurance Association*², in which Fletcher Moulton LJ laid down the principles to be applied in considering the word 'immediately'. It is true that the case he was considering concerned an obligation under a contract of insurance to give 'immediate notice' of a happening, but the Divisional Court³ took the view that the passage in the judgment of Fletcher Moulton LJ which I am about to read stated a principle which was entirely applicable in construing the meaning of the word 'immediately' in s 64 (1). Moreover, counsel for the taxpayer, during the course of this appeal, in the plainest terms conceded (and in my view rightly conceded) that this was the correct principle to apply. What Fletcher Moulton LJ said was this⁴:

'The Courts have not always considered that they are bound to interpret provisions of this kind with unreasonable strictness, and although the word "immediate" is no doubt a strong epithet, I think that it might be fairly construed as meaning with all reasonable speed considering the circumstances of the case.'

The Divisional Court³ came to the conclusion, applying that principle, that nevertheless, since there had been a delay of 13 days between the time when the decision of the commissioners reached the office of the inspector of taxes and the time when notice of dissatisfaction was given, that notice had not been given with all reasonable speed considering the circumstances of the case. The Divisional Court³ does not, however, state any reasons for reaching that conclusion. I am afraid that, for my part, I cannot accept the view of the Divisional Court³ on this point. I should perhaps add that by a counter-notice counsel for the Crown has sought to uphold the refusal of prohibition by the Divisional Court³ on the ground that they should have come to the conclusion that, in the circumstances of the case, the notice of dissatisfaction was given with all reasonable speed.

The circumstances of the case, which I think are crucial on this point, are as follows. The first one I am mentioning is also germane to the second point that arises in the case, namely, whether the provision that the notice shall be given immediately is mandatory or directory only. It is very difficult to see why Parliament provided that there should be an immediate expression of dissatisfaction after the date of the determination by the commissioners. This is a provision that has been re-enacted in Income Tax Act after Income Tax Act and its origins go back beyond 90 years. We do not know what conditions were prevailing then which may have made that provision appear desirable. One thing, however, is quite plain, that, particularly when the decision is communicated through the post, the requirement that a party considering an appeal should immediately express his dissatisfaction by letter to the commissioners cannot be of the slightest help to the other party. It is not suggested that there is any obligation on the party considering an appeal to communicate his dissatisfaction with the decision to the other party. The only possible reason for this provision in the statute must, I think, be out of consideration for the commissioners. How it helps them I am not quite clear. It is suggested that if they get this notice of dissatisfaction they will not destroy papers which they might otherwise have destroyed; and it may be so, I know not. I should have thought that in this day and age, at any rate, it is extremely unlikely that the commissioners would destroy any papers or assume that there is going to be no appeal until the expiration of the 30 days during which time the party who is dissatisfied has an opportunity of requiring a case to be stated. However that may be, whether the dissatisfaction is expressed to the commissioners immediately, or indeed at all, does not seem to me to affect the other party in any way.

Bearing that in mind, I attach very considerable importance to what occurred

² [1907] 2 KB 798, [1904-07] All ER Rep 383

³ [1971] 3 All ER 394, [1971] 3 WLR 425

⁴ [1907] 2 KB at 807, [1904-07] All ER Rep at 387

a immediately after the conclusion of the hearing. Here was the solicitor to the inspector asking the clerk to the commissioners to send the decision to him, because he no doubt anticipated that it would be bristling with legal points, and reminding the clerk to the commissioners on the telephone a month later that the decision was to be sent to him. If that decision had been sent by the clerk to the commissioners to the solicitor on 9th March the irresistible inference is that he would have been just as alive on 10th March as he was on 23rd March to the desirability of writing back by return of post and expressing dissatisfaction. Accordingly, but for the slip made in the office of the clerk—and it is easy to understand how such a slip can be made—the decision would have reached the Solicitor of Inland Revenue on 10th March and there would have been an expression of dissatisfaction by return of post. As it was, he did express his dissatisfaction by return of post, as I have said, on 23rd March when the decision reached him. The only reason why the inspector, Mr Follett, took no immediate action when the decision reached him on 10th March was because he, not being a lawyer, quite naturally thought ‘Well, we have won, there is nothing to do, I will send it on to the solicitor in due course’. It is certainly provided in the statute that the commissioners shall be informed of dissatisfaction with their decision immediately after it is made. In the present case the only reason why they were not informed until 23rd March was because they had forgotten to send the decision on to the solicitor as they had been requested to do. In my judgment the fair conclusion in all the circumstances is that the communication made on 23rd March by the Solicitor of Inland Revenue was made with all reasonable speed. I therefore come to the conclusion on this part of the case that the point taken in the cross-notice succeeds.

I ought perhaps in this connection to have mentioned that at one stage it was suggested that *Grainger v Singer*⁵ was an authority the other way. Rightly understood, I do not think it is anything of the kind, because in that case an inspector had asked for a case to be stated, the case was signed by the commissioners and sent by them to the tax office from which the demand for a case had been made; the case reached the tax office on a certain date and there was a statutory requirement that the inspector should transmit the case to the High Court within seven days after it had been received. The only point decided in that case, as I understand it, was that the sending of the case to the tax office was a good service on the inspector, because the tax office was the proper place to which to address it; the tax office was his agent to receive it. That case was different from the present in that the only point that arose there was: ‘Did the case reach the inspector or his agent on such-and-such a date and did the inspector transmit it within seven days of receipt to the High Court?’ If the case was not transmitted to the High Court within seven days then the statutory provision was not complied with. If in the present case the law was that dissatisfaction must be expressed by the inspector within x days of the determination of the commissioners reaching him and he did not express dissatisfaction within that time there would be a breach of the statute; but in this case the statutory requirement, applying Fletcher Moulton LJ’s principle, was not that the dissatisfaction should be expressed within any specified time but with all reasonable speed considering the circumstances of the case. For the reasons I have given it seems to me that the very special circumstances here lead to the conclusion that the notice of dissatisfaction was despatched with all reasonable speed.

It follows that, taking that view, it may not be strictly necessary to decide the point whether the provision that the notice shall be given immediately is directory or mandatory. But in case I am wrong in the view I take about the notice of dissatisfaction having been despatched with all reasonable speed and since the point whether the provision is mandatory or directory could be of considerable general importance, I think it right that I should as briefly as I can express my view about it.

The question whether a statutory provision is imperative and mandatory in the modern sense of that word or merely directory has arisen again and again in the courts. The principles on which that question should be decided are well established. The difficulty arises, as always, in applying them to the particular statutory provision under consideration. The principle is laid down—and it has been stated and re-stated in many other cases—very happily by Lord Penzance in *Howard v Bodington*⁶:

‘There may be many provisions in Acts of Parliament which, although they are not strictly obeyed, yet do not appear to the Court to be of that material importance to the subject-matter to which they refer, as that the legislature could have intended that the non-observance of them should be followed by a total failure of the whole proceedings. On the other hand, there are some provisions in respect of which the Court would take an opposite view, and would feel that they are matters which must be strictly obeyed, otherwise the whole proceedings that subsequently follow must come to an end. Now the question is, to which category does the provision in question in this case belong?’

Then Lord Penzance goes on to quote⁷ an extract from the speech of Lord Campbell LC in *Liverpool Borough Bank v Turner*⁸, in which Lord Campbell says:

‘No universal rule can be laid down for the construction of statutes, as to whether mandatory enactments shall be considered directory only or obligatory, with an implied nullification for disobedience. It is the duty of courts of justice to try to get at the real intention of the legislature by carefully attending to the whole scope of the statute to be construed.’

Counsel for the taxpayer has called our attention to a number of cases, e.g. *R v Pontypool Gaming Licensing Committee*⁹, *Barker v Palmer*¹⁰ and *R v Edmonton Income Tax Comrs*¹¹. These are all cases in which a statutory provision was held by the courts to be mandatory. With no disrespect to counsel’s arguments, I do not propose to review those cases, because the statutory provisions there being considered were not the same as the statutory provisions now before us, and in each of those cases there were excellent reasons for the court coming to the conclusion that the provision in question was mandatory. Indeed, in *Howard v Bodington*¹² the court came to the conclusion that in the circumstances of that case the statutory provision was mandatory. There are a number of cases, however, that could have been cited the other way, in which statutory provisions have been held to be directory, but they would be of equally little help. We have to consider the statutory provisions contained in s 64 (1).

The Divisional Court¹³ came to the clear and unanimous conclusion that the provision that the expression of dissatisfaction should be made immediately after the determination was directory only. I entirely agree, if I may respectfully say so, with the decision of the Divisional Court¹³ on that point. The first matter which appeals to me as far as this point is concerned is the first circumstance which I mentioned (and which I will not repeat) when I was dealing with the construction of the word ‘immediately’. If one must, as Lord Penzance said¹², consider the material importance of this provision to the subject-matter to which it refers as one of the tests whether the legislature could have intended its non-observance to be followed by a total failure of the whole proceedings, I would say that this provision as to the requirement of

⁶ (1877) 2 PD 203 at 210, 211

⁷ (1877) 2 PD at 211

⁸ (1860) 30 LJ Ch 379 at 380, 381

⁹ [1970] 3 All ER 241, [1970] 1 WLR 1299

¹⁰ (1881) 8 QBD 9

¹¹ [1929] 1 KB 220, 14 Tax Cas 313

¹² (1877) 2 PD at 210, 211

¹³ [1971] 3 All ER 394, [1971] 3 WLR 425

a immediacy is of no discernible material importance to the subject-matter with which s 64 is concerned. No one has been able to advance any reason for thinking that any importance could attach to it from the point of view of the proposed respondent to the anticipated appeal and it is unnecessary to speculate about any possible importance this provision could have so far as the General Commissioners are concerned. I would add this: it is perhaps difficult to think why it should be necessary to express b dissatisfaction at all before giving notice requiring a case to be stated. As I have already indicated, I find it insuperably difficult to think of any valid reason why this should be done immediately. I do not, however, intend to cast any doubt on the necessity to give a notice in writing and to give it within 30 days after the determination requiring the commissioners to state and sign a case for the opinion of the High Court. That I think is a mandatory provision and I am prepared to assume that it c is also necessary for a declaration of dissatisfaction to have been made before that notice asking for a case to be stated is served, but I am not deciding the point. Subsection (1) of s 64 requires (a) a notice of dissatisfaction to be served and (b) that it shall be served immediately after the determination. I cannot think that what I have classified as (b), i.e. the requirement that it should be served immediately, is other than directory.

d Now if that provision is directory only, the fact that the notice of dissatisfaction is not served immediately cannot take away the right of appeal by way of case stated. This decision is equally important for the subject as it is for the Crown. The subject, by failing to comply with a directory provision in the statute cannot be deprived of his right to come to the High Court by way of case stated; nor can the Crown. This, I think, is of very great importance, because, as I have always understood the law, and indeed as it has been stated in *Howard v Bodington*¹⁴ and many other cases, although e non-compliance with a provision which is merely directory may make the party in default liable to a penalty, if the statute says so, it cannot vitiate anything that follows. Compliance with a directory provision cannot be a condition precedent to a party's rights. If non-compliance with a provision were to take away rights, the provision would necessarily be mandatory. So even if I am wrong in the view I have expressed, f namely, that in the very special circumstances of this case the notice of dissatisfaction was immediate, the result of this appeal would still be the same.

I must, however, deal with another point which may be of considerable public importance. In the Divisional Court Ashworth J, dealing with the requirement to give immediate notice of dissatisfaction, said¹⁵:

g 'Accordingly from that point of view it seems to me that this is a matter which is essentially a matter as between the dissatisfied party and the commissioners; it is not mandatory in the sense that it is a requirement such as was visualised in the passage quoted from *Howard v Bodington*¹⁶. This is a matter which affects the two parties to whom I have referred, and approaching the matter in that way I can see no difficulty in saying that the commissioners are at least entitled to say, so long as they get their application for the case stated within 30 days, h they can dispense with the notice of dissatisfaction being immediate.'

If Ashworth J intended (which I very much doubt) to lay down in that passage that a failure by either party, the taxpayer or the Crown, to comply with a merely directory provision of s 64 put the Crown or the taxpayer (as the case may be) at the mercy of the commissioners so that it was in their discretion whether they would state a case, I entirely disagree with that view. I very much doubt, however, whether Ashworth J meant to express it and I have even more doubt whether Lord Widgery CJ meant to express it in the last few words of his judgment¹⁷ which counsel for

14 (1877) 2 PD 203

15 [1971] 3 All ER at 400, [1971] 3 WLR at 433

16 (1877) 2 PD at 210, 211

17 [1971] 3 All ER at 399, [1971] 3 WLR at 432

the taxpayer seeks to read in that way. Section 64 confers a right on the subject and on the Crown to appeal and failure to comply with a merely directory provision in s 64 cannot in my judgment take that right away. It is not a matter for the discretion of the commissioners. If the appeal to the commissioners raises any point of law—and it is very difficult to think of an appeal to the commissioners which would not do so—providing that the taxpayer or the Crown (as the case may be) complies with the mandatory provisions of s 64, the commissioners are bound to state a case.

Another matter with which I shall have to deal very shortly is the subsidiary point of counsel for the taxpayer that the letter of 23rd March did not express dissatisfaction with the commissioners' decision as being erroneous in point of law, because the letter does not use the specific phrase 'erroneous in point of law'. There is not a word in the judgments in the Divisional Court¹⁸ to suggest that that point was taken there. The recollection of counsel for the Crown is that it was not; the recollection of counsel for the taxpayer is that it was taken but faintly taken. If the recollection of counsel for the taxpayer is correct, I can only account for the absence of any mention of this point in the judgments in the Divisional Court¹⁸ as being due to the fact that the point was such an obviously bad one that it was not worth mentioning. It is an obviously bad point, because if a solicitor for the Inland Revenue writes to another solicitor who is clerk to the commissioners a letter in the terms that I have read it is quite obvious that the letter means, and was intended to mean and understood as meaning, that dissatisfaction was being expressed on the ground that the decision was erroneous in point of law.

The only other point which counsel for the taxpayer took, if I understood him properly, came to this, that the Crown were now precluded from challenging the decision of the commissioners on the assessment under Case VII in any circumstances. It is quite obvious, as I have already said, that the two assessments were alternative to each other. It would be absurd if the Crown were put into the position of having to go before the court to hear an appeal by way of case stated against allowing the assessment under Case I and were unable, if that appeal succeeded, to say 'Now we are appealing against the commissioners' decision discharging the assessment under Case VII'. No sort of authority has been referred to which supports this contention of counsel for the taxpayer. We were referred to *Andrew v Taylor*¹⁹, which seems to me to have absolutely nothing to do with the present point. That was a case in which a dispute had arisen between the Crown and the taxpayer whether a business had ceased in 1957 or 1961. Before the commissioners, the Crown's case was that the business had ceased in 1961 and the taxpayer said it had ceased in 1957. When the matter came before the judge by way of case stated the Crown was seeking to say that the business had not only run on from 1957 to 1961 but it had continued thereafter. This court decided that, as the Crown before the commissioners had pinned their flag to the mast that the business had concluded in 1961, they were precluded thereafter from contending against the taxpayer in the High Court that the business had continued after 1961. But here there are two alternative assessments and two appeals. I cannot for my part understand how *Andrew v Taylor*¹⁹ is relevant to the present case.

For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

BUCKLEY LJ. I agree and I do not wish to add anything except this, that, if I remember correctly, Salmon LJ used language apt to suggest that Mr Follett replaced Mr Rivett as inspector of taxes at Sudbury on or about 9th March 1971. As I understand the facts as they were explained to us by counsel, in fact that replacement took place on or about the date when the hearing began before the commissioners. I a only mention it, first in the interests of complete accuracy (assuming that I am accurate) and, secondly, to say that I think it makes no difference at all to the case, for the evidence makes clear that, although Mr Follett was the nominal respondent to the proceedings before the commissioners, which indicates that he must have become the inspector by the time the hearing began, in fact he had nothing to do with the appeals and the conduct of the matter was entirely in the hands of Mr MacKeith, and no doubt that was the reason, or one of the reasons, why Mr MacKeith asked that the determination should be sent to him and not to the inspector's office. As b I say, I think that the point does not at all affect the decision of this case and I agree with the judgment which Salmon LJ has given.

¹⁸ [1971] 3 All ER 394, [1971] 3 WLR 425

¹⁹ (1965) 42 Tax Cas 557

ORR LJ. I agree. Logically the first argument for the taxpayer in this appeal has been one which was not pursued to any extent, if indeed it was developed at all, c before the Divisional Court²⁰, namely, that it was not open to the Crown to declare dissatisfaction as to the discharge of the Case VII assessment because (so it is said) they had themselves solicited that discharge. The argument is that they solicited it inferentially by inviting the commissioners to confirm the Case I assessment, of which it would be a necessary consequence that the Case VII assessment should be discharged. d This argument, if it is right, would be highly advantageous to taxpayers in that, if two assessments A and B are raised which are alternative in the sense that if the one is right the other must be wrong, and the commissioners uphold A and discharge B, the Crown would not be able to appeal against the discharge of B and therefore, if on appeal it were held A was wrong, there would be no means of restoring B, with the result that where, as the commissioners have found rightly or wrongly in this very case, tax is due under one or the other, it would be lost to the Revenue. I was e unable to find in either of the authorities cited by counsel for the taxpayer with reference to this argument anything that could support it. *Inland Revenue Comrs v Park Investments Ltd*¹ was a case where the taxpayer could lawfully be charged on either of two bases and it was held that the Crown were entitled to choose on what basis they would assess, but that has nothing whatever, in my judgment, to do with a case such as the present in which, if one assessment has been rightly made, it must f necessarily follow that the other is wrong. Equally I can find in *Andrew v Taylor*² nothing which would support the proposition which counsel for the taxpayer advanced. That was a case in which in truth a party to litigation had sought to blow hot and cold.

With regard to the two matters which were determined by the Divisional Court²⁰, there is little that I would add to the judgments of Salmon and Buckley LJJ. As g regards the first question, whether the expression of dissatisfaction was made immediately after the determination of the appeal, I entirely agree with the view taken by the Divisional Court²⁰ that they should approach this matter on the basis of the test applied by Fletcher Moulton LJ in *Coleman's case*³, namely, that the word 'immediate' might be fairly construed as meaning with all reasonable speed considering the circumstances of the case. But in my judgment, in the circumstances of this case, which h were in the respects referred to by Salmon LJ very unusual, the right conclusion, applying that test, is that the expression of dissatisfaction was made 'immediately' for the purposes of s 64 (1).

i With regard to the second matter, whether the requirement that dissatisfaction should be expressed immediately is directory or mandatory, I am fully satisfied, for the reasons given in the Divisional Court²⁰ and by Salmon and Buckley LJJ in this court, that it falls to be construed as a directory provision. I would add that on this point I have derived some assistance from the argument advanced by counsel for the

²⁰ [1971] 3 All ER 394, [1971] 3 WLR 425

¹ [1966] 2 All ER 785, [1966] Ch 701

² (1965) 42 Tax Cas 557

³ [1907] 2 KB 798 at 807, [1904-07] All ER Rep 383 at 387

Crown as to the change in wording between s 59 of the Tax Management Act 1880 and the consolidating Income Tax Act 1918. The wording in the latter Act is the same as that now contained in s 64 of the Income Tax Act 1952 and I think that this is a case in which it is permissible to treat the wording adopted in 1918 as being an interpretation with reference to an ambiguity contained in the Act of 1880. I agree therefore with the Divisional Court⁴ that this was a directory and not an imperative provision, but I would add that, if it was intended (and I too am not sure that it was) by Ashworth J to suggest that where a notice of dissatisfaction has not been expressed immediately it would be open to the commissioners to refuse to state a case, I should find myself unable to agree with that view because it appears to me to be inconsistent with the preservation of the right of appeal, which seems to me to follow necessarily from the requirement to which I have referred being directory and not imperative. As to that I agree fully with the reasoning of Salmon LJ.

I also would dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Solicitors: Eland Hare Patersons, agents for Holmes & Hills, Braintree (for the taxpayer); Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

F A Amies Esq Barrister.

Race Relations Board v Charter and others

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, MEGAW AND STEPHENSON LJJ

30th NOVEMBER, 1st, 14th DECEMBER 1971

Race relations – Discrimination – Unlawful discrimination – Provision of goods, facilities and services – Discrimination by person concerned with provision of goods etc to a section of the public – Club – Members' club – Club providing facilities for refreshment and recreation to members and visitors – Club rejecting application for membership on ground of applicant's colour, race etc – Conservative club – Quality distinguishing members from public at large essentially impersonal one of being Conservatives – Members of club constituting 'a section of the public' – Refusal of application for membership on ground of colour, race etc constituting unlawful discrimination against person seeking to use club's facilities – Race Relations Act 1968, s 2.

C was the chairman of a members' club known as the East Ham South Conservative Club. The objects of the club were to maintain and advance Conservative principles. The club was affiliated to similar Conservative clubs all over the country. In accordance with the club's rules any male Conservative not being under the age of 18 years was eligible for admission to membership. The members of the club consisted wholly or mainly of members of the East Ham Conservative Association and any member of that association who applied for membership of the club and was otherwise eligible under the club's rules was admitted. The club provided facilities and services, including facilities for entertainment, recreation or refreshment to members and visitors at the club's premises. In April 1969 S, an Indian, applied for membership of the club. S had been an active member of the East Ham Conservative Association since 1966 and was eligible for membership in accordance with the club's rules. His application was proposed and seconded. After some delay the club's selection committee met to consider S's application. At the meeting C indicated in reply to a question from a member of the committee that he regarded

- a S's colour as relevant. When the application was put to the vote, it was rejected by C's casting vote as chairman. Following this S, made a complaint to the Race Relations Board alleging that the club had discriminated against him by reason of his colour. The board used their best endeavours to secure a settlement. Not succeeding, they commenced proceedings against the club. The question arose whether refusal of an application for election to membership of the club on the ground of colour, race or ethnic or national origins would be unlawful by virtue of s 2^a of the Race Relations Act 1968.
- b

Held – An application for election to membership of the club was a situation to which s 2 of the 1968 Act applied and accordingly a refusal to elect on the ground of colour etc would be unlawful for the following reasons—

- c (i) although the facilities provided by the club were confined to members and their visitors, the club was nonetheless concerned with the provision of facilities to a section of the public within s 2 (1) of the 1968 Act since the members of the club themselves constituted 'a section of the public' in that they were not numerically negligible and the quality which distinguished them from the public at large, i.e. that they were Conservatives, was one which was essentially impersonal; since being a Conservative was a sine qua non of membership it was immaterial that
- d members also had in common a personal quality, i.e. that of having been proposed, seconded and elected to the club (see p 560 h, p 561 d and e, p 562 h, p 564 j and p 565 b and d, post); dicta of Lord Greene MR in Re Compton [1945] 1 All ER at 201 and of Lord Simonds in Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd [1951] 1 All ER at 33-35 applied;

- e (ii) since the members of the club were 'a section of the public' it followed that it would be unlawful for the club to discriminate on the ground of colour etc against 'any person seeking to obtain or use' the facilities of the club; this included any person outside the club who applied for membership, for such a person was seeking to use the facilities of the club (see p 562 b c and h and p 563 j, post).

- f Per Curiam. A club which by its constitution openly restricts membership to persons of one particular race or one particular ethnic or national origin cannot lawfully refuse an application for membership solely on the ground that the applicant is not of that race or ethnic or national origin (see p 561 j, p 563 a to c and p 566 c and d, post).

Notes

For discrimination on racial grounds, see Supplement to 7 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) para 1280.

- g For the Race Relations Act 1968, s 2, see Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 1968 vol, p 1541.

Cases referred to in judgments

Compton, Re, Powell v Compton [1945] 1 All ER 198, [1945] Ch 123, 114 LJCh 99, 172 LT 158, 8 Digest (Repl) 330, 123.

- h Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd [1951] 1 All ER 31, [1951] AC 297, 8 Digest (Repl) 321, 55.

R v Britton [1967] 1 All ER 486, [1967] 2 QB 51, [1967] 2 WLR 537, 131 JP 235, 51 Cr App Rep 107, Digest (Cont Vol C) 242, 7272b.

Race Relations Board v Bradmore Working Men's Social Club and Institute (March 1970) unreported.

i Interlocutory appeal

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, the Race Relations Board ('the board'), against the judgment of his Honour Judge Herbert QC given on 6th April 1971 in the Westminster County Court in favour of the defendants, Edward Reginald Marden Charter, Horace A Parker, William Albert English (sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members of the East Ham South Conservative Club between 27th

- a Section 2, so far as material, is set out at p 559 f, post

April 1969 and 5th November 1969) whereby it was adjudged on preliminary issues (i) that consideration by the committee of the East Ham South Conservative Club under the rules of the club of an application for election to membership of the club was not a situation to which ss 2, 3, 4 or 5 of the Race Relations Act 1968 applied, and (ii) that a refusal on the ground of colour, race or ethnic or national origin by the committee to elect to membership of the club an applicant eligible under the rules would not be unlawful by virtue of s 2 of the 1968 Act. By their particulars of claim the board had alleged that, by reason of the committee's rejection of his application for membership of the club, Mr Amarjit Singh Shah had been wrongfully deprived of the club's facilities and services and had suffered considerable humiliation and distress, and claimed (i) damages for loss of opportunity, and (ii) a declaration that the exclusion of Mr Shah from membership was unlawful by virtue of the provisions of s 2 of the 1968 Act. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

J P Comyn QC, Anthony Lester and M H Mendelson for the board.
A P Leggatt and N Thomas for the defendants.

Cur adv vult

14th December. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING MR.

1 The club

In East Ham there is a members' club called the East Ham South Conservative Club. Its premises are at 1 Vicarage Lane, East Ham. It is a political club. Its object is to maintain and advance Conservative principles. It is closely associated with similar Conservative clubs all over the country. Any man of 18 or over is eligible for membership, provided that he is a Conservative. He has to be proposed and seconded by two members able to vouch for his respectability and fitness; and then elected by the committee. The subscription is 10s a year. Any woman of 21 or over who is a Conservative is eligible for association membership. Her subscription is 5s a year. Youngsters of 16 or 17 can be admitted to junior association membership, also at 5s. Members of other Conservative clubs are admitted as temporary honorary members, provided they produce the appropriate ticket. Members can bring visitors with them to the club.

The club is directly connected with a local political association, called the East Ham Conservative Association. Most, if not all, the members of the club are members of the East Ham Conservative Association. Any member of the Conservative Association who applies for membership of the club is admitted to membership of the club, provided that he complies with the procedure for election. The club provides the usual amenities of a club. It provides facilities and services (including facilities for entertainment, recreation and refreshment) to members and visitors at the club's premises.

2 The application of Mr Shah

Mr Amarjit Singh Shah was born in India. He came to this country about nine years ago. He is employed in the post office as a postal and telegraph officer. He is a Conservative and joined the East Ham Conservative Association five years ago, in 1966.

On 27th April 1969 Mr Shah applied to join the club. He was proposed by Mr Charles Morley and seconded by Mr Gilbert Crocker. On 5th November 1969 the committee of the club considered Mr Shah's application. Ten members were present. One of the members of the committee asked the chairman: 'Is colour relevant?' The chairman said: 'I regard it as relevant.' Mr Shah's application was put to the vote. The votes were equal—five for and five against. The chairman gave his casting vote against the application. So, Mr Shah was rejected. The club say emphatically that this was not because of his colour.

a On 7th November 1969 the chairman wrote to Mr Shah, telling him that he would not be eligible for election to membership during the next 12 months, but he would be admitted as a visitor. On 16th December 1969 Mr Shah made a complaint to the Race Relations Board. He said that he had been discriminated against by reason of his colour. The board used their best endeavours to secure a settlement. Not succeeding, they determined to bring proceedings against the club. They issued a plaint in the Westminster County Court, in which they sought: (i) damages for loss of opportunity; (ii) a declaration that the rejection of Mr Shah was unlawful.

b On 24th March 1971 an order was made for the trial of a preliminary issue of law. The club said firmly that they had not discriminated against Mr Shah; but nevertheless they were desirous of having this point of law determined. Assuming that the committee rejected Mr Shah's application because of his colour, was their action unlawful? The judge sat with two assessors. He gave judgment for the club. He held that a refusal on the ground of colour was not unlawful. The Race Relations Board appeal to this court.

c 3 The statutory provisions

The Race Relations Act 1968 makes it unlawful to discriminate against a person. The material sections for present purposes are these. Section 1 (1) defines 'discriminate'. It says:

'... a person discriminates against another if on the ground of colour, race or ethnic or national origins he treats that other ... less favourably than he treats or would treat other persons ...'

e Section 2 (1) is the clause which prohibits discrimination in general. It says:

f 'It shall be unlawful for any person concerned with the provision to the public or a section of the public (whether on payment or otherwise) of any goods, facilities or services to discriminate against any person seeking to obtain or use those goods, facilities or services by refusing or deliberately omitting to provide him with any of them or to provide him with goods, services or facilities of the like quality, in the like manner and on the like terms in and on which the former normally makes them available to other members of the public.'

Section 2 (2) gives some examples of the facilities and services mentioned in s 2 (1). To some of these I will later refer. But, I must say at once that they include 'facilities for entertainment, recreation or refreshment', and 'facilities for education, instruction or training'.

g 4 The interpretation of the statute

h Each side says that the statute should be interpreted on the side of freedom. But we are faced here with two conflicting freedoms. The club contend for freedom for the members to elect whom they please to their own club. Mr Shah contends for freedom to join the club without being turned down by reason of the colour of his skin. Between these two freedoms, the court has to decide. It must take as its guide, and its only guide, the words of the statute, without leaning to one side or to the other.

5 Facilities

j One thing is quite clear. The committee of the club provide 'facilities'. They provide facilities for entertainment, recreation or refreshment. They provide these facilities inside the club. It was suggested before us that 'facilities' might include the opportunity of becoming a member. I do not accept this. It is too far-fetched.

6 Provision to the public

The next question is: do the committee provide those facilities 'to the public'? Clearly not. An hotel, restaurant, or a theatre provide facilities 'to the public'; because they provide them to anyone who comes in and is ready to pay the price. But this committee does not do so. They only provide them for a particular category of persons, namely, members of the club and visitors brought in by members. It was suggested that they also provided them for 'would-be' members, that is, for persons who wish to apply for membership. But, this again is too far-fetched. They only provide them for members and their visitors.

7 A section of the public

Take next 'a section of the public'. Are the members and their visitors 'a section of the public'? This is the crucial question in the case. Parliament has given us no guide, except indirectly in s 6 (2) of the Race Relations Act 1965 which shows that 'members of an association' may be a 'section of the public' and the word 'association' seems to me appropriate to include some clubs, at any rate, just as it did to Lord Parker CJ in *R v Britton*¹.

I have looked for help from other branches of the law. The nearest I can find is from the law of charities. In order for a trust to be charitable, the purpose of it must be directed to the benefit 'of the public or a section of the public'. Such is the way the test is always formulated. It is a useful analogy, because in charities you have to distinguish between a 'section of the public' and a private group; and you have also to do so in race relations. But, as with the legislature in the Race Relations Act, so also with the courts in charity cases. Everyone has fought shy of defining a 'section of the public'. In Re Compton Lord Greene MR said²:

'No definition of what is meant by a section of the public has, so far as I am aware, been laid down and I certainly do not propose to be the first to make the attempt to define it.'

In Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd Lord MacDermott said³ that the usual way of approaching the issue was—

'to regard the facts of each case and to treat the matter very much as one of degree. No definition of what constituted a sufficient section of the public for the purpose was applied, for none existed, and the process seems to have been one of reaching a conclusion on a general survey of the circumstances and considerations regarded as relevant rather than of making a single, conclusive test.'

Nevertheless, over the years the courts have evolved a test for determining what is a 'section of the public' as distinct from a private group. It is set out, with illustrations, by Lord Greene MR in *Re Compton*⁴ and by Lord Simonds in *Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd*⁵. If I may put the test in my own words, it is this. Look at the group of persons concerned. Make sure that there are quite a number of them (they must not be numerically negligible). See what is the quality which they have in common—the quality which distinguishes them as a group from the public at large. Then ask whether the quality is essentially impersonal or essentially personal. If it is impersonal, the group will rank as a 'section of the public'. If it is personal, it will rank as a private group, and not as a 'section of the public'.

Let me apply this test by taking illustrations in race relations. First, the illustration given by counsel for the board of a Roman Catholic school. It takes boys who are Roman Catholics and have passed the entrance examination and are accepted by the headmaster. Patrick Murphy is a Roman Catholic, and has passed the entrance

¹ [1967] 1 All ER 486 at 488, [1967] 2 QB 51 at 55

² [1945] 1 All ER 198 at 201, [1945] Ch 123 at 129

³ [1951] 1 All ER 31 at 39, [1951] AC 297 at 314

⁴ [1945] 1 All ER at 201, [1945] Ch at 129, 130

⁵ [1951] 1 All ER at 33-35, [1951] AC at 306-308

a examination; on paper, he is a first-rate candidate. When he comes up, the headmaster has a surprise. Patrick Murphy, despite his name, is found to have a black skin. Everyone would agree at once that it is unlawful for the headmaster to reject Patrick on the ground that he is black. The reason is because boys at the school are a 'section of the public'. The quality which they have in common—the thing which forms them into a group—is essentially impersonal. Their one common quality is that they are Roman Catholics who have passed the entrance examination. The additional quality—that they should be acceptable to the headmaster—is no doubt personal, but it does not alter the fact that all the boys have in common an impersonal quality which makes them a 'section of the public'.

c On the other side there is the illustration given by Stephenson LJ of a wedding reception. The bride's parents issue invitations to the friends of both sides. They invite all the staff in the bridegroom's firm; but being prejudiced, they omit one of the staff because he is black. Everyone would agree that that is not unlawful. The reason is because the wedding guests are not a 'section of the public'. The one quality which the guests have in common is essentially personal. It is their personal acceptability to the hosts. Even the staff of the firm are grouped together by a personal relationship to the employer. They are not a 'section of the public'.

d On which side of the line does the present case fall? To my mind the members of the Conservative club are a 'section of the public'. They are Conservative. That is the one quality which is common to them all. It is the sine qua non. It is essentially an impersonal quality. It is true that, in order to become a member of the club, a person has to be proposed and seconded, and has to be elected. That is, in a sense, a personal quality attaching to each one; but it does not alter the fact that they all have in common an impersonal quality which makes them a 'section of the public'. I see no logical distinction between the members of this club and the boys at Patrick Murphy's school, or the students of a college or university, or the members of a church. In each case the applicant has to be acceptable to an admissions committee or the like. Yet beyond doubt the members are a 'section of the public'.

f Counsel for the defendants urged that this Conservative club was a members' club as distinct from a proprietary club. But that is a distinction without a difference for this purpose. A proprietary club is usually under the control of a committee, and members are proposed and seconded and elected, just as in a members' club. The difference between them lies in the legal title to the club premises and the food and drink. In the one case it is in the proprietor. In the other case it is in the members. But that cannot make all the difference as to whether they are a 'section of the public' or not.

g I realise that this means that the members of some famous clubs in Pall Mall are also a 'section of the public'. Some of them have in common the quality of political allegiance, just as this Conservative club does. Others have in common the quality of having been to a particular university or belonging to a particular service. If an applicant with those qualifications is elected almost automatically as of course, it being an impersonal quality, I would not feel able to distinguish such a club from the present, at any rate when the members are so numerous that they cannot properly be described as a private group. They are a 'section of the public'. Such clubs cannot, as I see it, reject a man solely because of his colour or race. Nor, I trust, would they wish to do so.

j It also means that clubs which require their members to be of a particular race, or to come from a particular country—and admit them virtually automatically, if they have that qualification—are also a 'section of the public'. I do not expect that anyone not of that race, or not from that country, would wish to join them, but, if he did, they could not lawfully refuse him on the ground that he was not of that race or from that country. Such is the result of this statute.

But there are many other clubs in which an applicant is not elected automatically by any means, but is elected on his personal qualifications—his personal acceptability to the others. The members of these other clubs would not be a 'section of the public' and would, I think, be able to reject a man for any reason or for none.

8 Any person seeking to obtain or use

Once the members of the club are seen to be a 'section of the public', it follows that the committee must not discriminate against 'any person seeking to obtain or use' the facilities of the club. Who is such a person? It is, I think, any person outside the club who applies for membership. He is seeking to obtain or use the facilities of the club for entertainment, recreation or refreshment. Just as when a student from outside applies for admission to a college. He is seeking to obtain the facilities of the college for education, instruction or training. It is impossible to suppose that the 'person seeking' must be already a member of the club or college—in other words, that he must be already one of the 'section of the public'—for that would nullify the Act altogether. It is passed so as to prevent those inside from excluding those outside on the forbidden grounds.

9 The other sections

Apart from s 2, the 1968 Act contains ss 3, 4 and 5, which deal with other situations. These are, I think, inserted to make sure that there is no discrimination in the important fields of employment, trade unions and housing. Section 4 deals expressly with certain organisations (like trade unions and professional bodies, and so forth) who admit persons to membership. It was suggested that this section was inserted because otherwise such an organisation would not be a 'section of the public' within s 2. I cannot accept this submission. It is obvious that many organisations within s 4 are also a 'section of the public' within s 2. I think s 4 was inserted simply to make sure that those particular organisations do not discriminate, whether their members were a 'section of the public' or not. It also serves as an introduction to s 16 of and Sch 2 to the Act. It is right to say that this point was hardly mentioned by counsel for the defendants. So I do not stay longer on it.

10 Conclusion

I cannot agree with the judge. In my opinion the answers to the preliminary issues are these: (i) an application for election to membership of the club is a situation to which s 2 of the Act applies; (ii) a refusal to elect on the ground of colour, race or ethnic or national origin would be unlawful by virtue of s 2 of the Act.

I do not expect that this ruling will give rise to difficulties. After all, every candidate will still have to be proposed and seconded, and be found generally acceptable to the committee. The only thing is that, if he is otherwise acceptable, they must not reject him simply because of his race or colour or ethnic or national origin. I would allow the appeal accordingly; but I would reiterate that the club deny that they refused to elect Mr Shah on the ground of his colour. That is a matter which must go for trial.

MEGAW LJ. I agree with the judgment delivered by Lord Denning MR except that I fear I do not share his optimism when he says that he does not expect this ruling will give rise to difficulties.

I have, from the outset of the argument, been unable to see what distinction could validly be drawn, for the purposes of s 2 (1) of the Race Relations Act 1968, between the East Ham South Conservative Club on the one hand, and clubs such as Lord Denning MR has referred to as 'famous clubs in Pall Mall' on the other hand. For the purposes of s 2 (1) no distinction can be drawn on the basis that one club has as its object the maintenance of political principles of one sort or another, while another club is concerned with social or sporting or cultural activities.

It is not because of any implication in respect of such clubs that I have hesitated before deciding that s 2 (1) of the Act has the meaning and effect which Lord Denning MR has expressed. However, for a different reason, I have hesitated long before a reaching the conclusion that Parliament intended by s 2 (1) to provide that members of a club or society or voluntary association should be treated, at least in many cases, as being 'a section of the public' for the purposes of this subsection. For once that is accepted, I can see no valid ground for saying that s 2 (1) does not apply to a club or society in England, Wales or Scotland, whether its object is to provide sporting or social or cultural or any other kind of facilities for its members, if the club or society by its constitution seeks to confine its membership to persons of one particular race or of one particular ethnic or national origin. I believe that many such clubs and societies exist in England, Wales and Scotland; I believe that many of them, at least, would be generally regarded as serving a useful and desirable purpose in the community and that their enforced disappearance would be regarded in many quarters, rightly or wrongly, as being in itself a matter of racial discrimination. Yet s 2 (1) of the Act, if the interpretation which I believe has to be given to it is correct, appears to lead inevitably to the perhaps startling, and it may be unintended, result that the committees of these clubs would be acting unlawfully if they gave effect to the club's constitution in its provision for confining membership to a particular race or nationality or 'ethnic origin'.

d If that was not, indeed, the intention of Parliament, it is to be hoped that urgent consideration may be given to amending the Act so as to avoid that unintended result and so as to limit the subsection to those types of case to which it was truly intended to apply.

STEPHENSON LJ. The preliminary issues ordered to be tried in this case are issues of importance not only to Mr Shah, the Race Relations Board and the East Ham South Conservative Club.

e If consideration by the committee of this club under its rules of an application for election to membership of it is a situation to which ss 2, 3, 4 or 5 of the Race Relations Act 1968 applies, the Act applies to applications for membership of many other clubs. If a refusal on the ground of colour, race or ethnic or national origins by the committee of this club to elect to membership of it an applicant eligible under f r 4 of its rules would be unlawful by virtue of s 2 of the Act, so would be a refusal on those grounds to elect applicants eligible under the rules of many other clubs. Hard as counsel, particularly junior counsel for the board, tried to confine this case to a small field, it was always breaking out, and once over the boundaries of the area defined by the facts which we have to assume there was no stopping it or at least no certain stopping place short of far wider limits.

g It was rightly not contended by counsel for the board that ss 3, 4 or 5 of the Act applied to the situation. It is not disputed by counsel for the club (as I will call the defendants who are the chairman, honorary secretary and honorary treasurer of the club and are sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members of the club between 27th April 1969 and 5th November 1969), that the applicant Mr Shah was eligible under r 4 of its rules, as a male conservative not being under the age of 18 years. The questions we have to decide are therefore these: (1) Were the members of the East Ham South Conservative Club persons concerned with the provision of goods, facilities and services to the public or a section of the public? (2) Was Mr Shah h a person seeking to obtain or use those goods, facilities or services?

i If the answer to the first question is 'Yes', the answer to the second must likewise be 'Yes'. Both issues would therefore receive affirmative answers because (i) s 2 would apply to the committee's consideration of Mr Shah's application, and (ii) its refusal to elect him on one of the forbidden grounds would be unlawful by virtue of s 2. If the answer to the first question is, on the contrary 'No', both issues would receive negative answers. The first question is therefore all important and the true answer to it decisive.

This club is a bona fide members' club and there can be no doubt that it in fact provides to its members and their guests the ordinary 'amenities' of a club. I take that word from r 21 of the club's rules to include such 'goods' as food and drink, which its rules and byelaws call refreshments (r 70, byelaw 2), the 'services' of what its rules call employees of the club (rr 5, 59 and 70) and its byelaws 'servants' (byelaw 5), and such 'facilities' (if I can use the term without begging any relevant question) as premises furnished with chairs and tables and supplied with books, pamphlets and newspapers (byelaws 7 and 8). Some of these things may come under more than one head, but they are all included in the trinity of 'goods, facilities and services', which, to my thinking, are comprehended in what r 21 calls 'the amenities of the club'.

I do not think it natural to regard the opportunity to be considered for membership of the club or to be elected a member of it as one of those 'facilities' which s 2 interposes between 'goods' and 'services'. Counsel for the board argued that it obviously was one of those facilities. I agree with Lord Denning MR that he is wrong. I note that such an allegation found no place in the particulars of the board's claim as originally pleaded, para 5 of which alleged:

'At all material times the Club provided and provides facilities and services (including facilities for entertainment, recreation or refreshment) to members and visitors at the Club's premises . . .'

Paragraph 6 went on to allege:

' . . . members of the Club . . . and/or visitors to the Club were a section of the public to whom the Defendants were persons concerned with the provision of facilities or services within the meaning of Section 2 of the Race Relations Act 1968 . . .'

It was only in response to a request under para 6 for further and better particulars of those facilities and services that the board introduced 'the facility of being considered and/or accepted for membership of the club'. It was the facilities and services provided for club members and visitors, not for candidates, which Mr Shah was alleged to be seeking (para 12) and of which he claimed to have been wrongfully deprived (para 14). And when the board claimed 'damages for loss of opportunity' it was doing what the Act itself required (see ss 19 (1) (b) and 22 (1) (b)) and rightly recognising, as the Act did, a distinction between the facilities provided and the opportunity to obtain and use them. Section 2 has, in my judgment, nothing to do with facilities to obtain facilities. First thoughts were best, and I agree with the county court judge that this point fails.

It is a point which admits of little argument but it is of considerable importance, because if it were right and the club was providing a facility within the section in giving candidates for membership the opportunity of becoming members, the board's argument that the club was providing it for the public or a section of the public would be, in my view, irrefutable. Whereas the strength of the club's case is that it was concerned only with providing facilities to members of the club and their guests and not to the public or any section of it; elected members of the club privately providing facilities for each other and for no one else except visitors admitted to the club on the introduction of members under r 23. Mr Shah is undoubtedly a member of the public. I should have thought it equally beyond doubt that adult male Conservatives eligible to membership under r 4 are a section of the public. But if the only facilities which the club is concerned with providing are not provided to anyone outside the charmed circle of members (and their visitors) but only to those within it, are the club's members, committee or officers persons concerned with providing for the public or a section of the public at all?

On this more difficult point I have come to the conclusion, in agreement with Lord Denning MR and Megaw LJ, that the club's argument, which could claim the support of common sense and accordingly prevailed with the judge and his assessors, is wrong and our judgment must be for the board in allowing this appeal.

a It is true that this club is private in the sense that all members' clubs are private (see 5 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) p 252, para 586). The public has no right to enter its premises and obtain or use its facilities. Only its elected members and those they introduce can do that. In this a club resembles a private householder who provides refreshment and recreation for his family and guests and differs from a shop or a hotel which caters for the public at large or at least for that section of the public which seeks to enter it. But the 1968 Act is not confined, as was the Race Relations Act 1965, to places of public resort. The question is not whether the club premises are a public place or whether the club committee is concerned with some form of public or quasi-public activity in providing facilities, but whether the members and visitors to whom they provide them are a section of the public.

b To this question the agreed facts about this particular club and its membership give an affirmative answer. The persons for whom this club caters (if that word can be used without misleading) are, it is agreed, accurately set out in para 3 of the particulars of claim. Lord Denning MR has set them out at the beginning of his judgment. I respectfully agree with him, using such help as can be got from the law of charities (and s 9 of the 1968 Act allowing charitable instruments to discriminate shows that Parliament did consider that law in this connection) that these persons do constitute a section of the public, although they may enjoy the club's facilities in private. I do not think it possible to draw any distinction between sections and subsections which consist of a considerable number of persons, and I would regard the members of this club as no less a section, although a smaller section, than members of the Conservative Party.

c That is not to say that, on the one hand, every club, however restricted its membership or its activities, is concerned with providing for a section of the public. Nor does it mean that, on the other hand—

'in the conduct of their private affairs a genuine club is in the position of a private householder who may ban from his house any person for any reason that he likes, and the Act does not dictate how we shall conduct our private lives', d as Judge Nicklin said obiter in *Race Relations Board v Bradmore Working Men's Social Club and Institute*⁶, decided in the Birmingham county court.

e I agree that the Act does not dictate how we shall conduct our private lives. But the Act does dictate how we shall conduct our lives insofar as we are concerned with the provision of goods, facilities and services to the public or a section of it and make them available to members of the public. If that is our concern, we must not discriminate and cannot turn from our houses any person on any one of the forbidden grounds if he seeks to obtain or use what we are concerned with providing. But the householder who provides his guests with a meal, or the parent who invites family and friends to a reception, is not, in my judgment, dictated to by the Act, for the simple reason, additional to that given by Lord Denning MR, that those whom he asks are not seeking to obtain or use what he provides. The guests bidden to supper in the parable did not seek to obtain or use their host's food and drink, still less did those who on his instructions were compelled to come in from the highways and hedges. Even if those who came at his first invitation or later under that compulsion were the public or a section of the public (and it would be difficult to argue that the latter had any essentially personal quality in common) they were not seeking but sought. That is one reason why a private householder may still lawfully turn a person from his house on grounds of race or colour or national or ethnic origins. And that may be a reason for holding some clubs able to do the same, but not this club. Some clubs may be so constituted that admission is by invitation only; a would-be member cannot apply without being asked. Counsel for the club sought to extend this escape route to this club—and other clubs—whose constitution required a proposer and seconder for the election of a member by the committee with or without a ballot (rr 3 and 6). That, said counsel for the club, as I understood his argument, means that it is the proposer and seconder who offer the candidate the club's facilities and by accepting them he is not seeking to obtain those facilities. a

6 (March 1970) unreported

But this is too artificial an understanding of such elective machinery. The test of the first move must not be pressed too hard. A club like this may encourage persons to apply for membership or be considered as inviting applications simply by putting its name up outside its premises, but in the ordinary way and not merely as a matter of form, the application comes first before the proposing and seconding, as the wording of r 6 shows ('an applicant for membership must be proposed and seconded'), and the whole process really starts with a person seeking to obtain or use the club's facilities by the machinery laid down in the club rules. I cannot see any escape from the Act either for this club or for 'Pall Mall clubs' by this route. b

I also agree with Lord Denning MR and Megaw LJ that a club or society or association does not escape from the Act's ban on discrimination by openly limiting its membership to persons of a particular race or colour or national or ethnic origin. Discrimination, which would be unlawful if carried out secretly and without express authority conferred by the rules or constitution of a club or association, cannot be lawful if openly required by its rules or constitution. Authorised or irregular, it is equally obnoxious to the statute. It makes no difference to the application of the Act whether a particular race qualifies or disqualifies the would-be member. Whether or not Parliament intended to take integration so far as to make it illegal for a Pakistani club to refuse membership to an Indian or an Englishman, that must, in my view, be the effect of s 2. As Lord Simonds said, the courts are not so much concerned with what the legislature aims at as with what it fairly and squarely hits. If the plain words of s 2 require most, if not all, clubs to write into their rules a rule prohibiting discrimination as defined by s 1, we may be startled but I agree with counsel for the board that we must not shrink from giving these words that effect. c

On the other arguments addressed to us, I agree with what Lord Denning MR has said about s 6 (2) of the 1965 Act and the gloss put on it by Lord Parker CJ in *R v Britton*⁷. The additional ground raised in the club's cross-notice, that s 4 of the 1968 Act would be otiose if s 2 applied to clubs, was not much relied on in argument and has not convinced me. It would have simplified our task if members' clubs had found a place in an express provision like s 4 (2), but I agree that one reason for s 4 (and s 3 too) may be found in the special provisions of s 16 of and Sch 2 and Part II of Sch 3 to the Act. d

I agree for these reasons, which are with one addition substantially those given by Lord Denning MR, that on the facts which we have to assume this appeal succeeds. e

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords granted. f

Solicitors: Lawford & Co (for the board); Vizard's (for the defendants). g

L J Kovats Esq Barrister. h

⁷ [1967] 1 All ER 486, [1967] 2 QB 51

Caldwell v Sumpters (a firm) and another

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SALMON AND STAMP LJJ

17th, 20th DECEMBER 1971

Solicitor – Lien – Title deeds – Preservation of lien after voluntary parting with possession of deeds – Deeds originally deposited with solicitors instructed by vendor to act in sale of property – Vendor changing solicitors – New solicitors asking original solicitors for deeds – Original solicitors' charges unpaid – Original solicitors handing over deeds subject to reservation that deeds held to their order pending payment of the outstanding charges – New solicitors refusing to accept reservation – Whether unilateral reservation sufficient to preserve original solicitors' lien.

The plaintiff instructed the defendants, a firm of solicitors, to act for her in respect of the sale of a house which she owned in Brighton. She deposited the title deeds with the defendants for that purpose. The sale was delayed owing to difficulties in obtaining vacant possession due to the refusal of the tenants occupying the house to move out. After the defendants had, on the plaintiff's instructions, given undertakings (i) to a firm of solicitors in Brighton that the costs which they incurred in taking proceedings to evict the tenants would be paid and (ii) to the plaintiff's bank that her indebtedness to them would be discharged out of the proceeds of sale, the plaintiff instructed M & Co, another firm of solicitors, to conduct the sale of the house in place of the defendants. M & Co pressed the defendants on the plaintiff's behalf for the title deeds but the defendants claimed a solicitor's lien on them. Eventually, after the plaintiff had issued a writ claiming, inter alia, the deeds, the deeds were sent to the plaintiff's solicitors with a covering note stating that the deeds were being sent 'on the understanding that you will hold them to our order, pending the payment of our fees and your Undertaking to honour those Undertakings which we have given on behalf of [the plaintiff], on her instructions, and the payment of fees, etc., of other professional firms who have acted on [the plaintiff's] instructions and have not yet been paid by her.' M & Co replied promptly saying that they were unable in the circumstances to accede to the defendants' request. The defendants threatened to bring proceedings against them to obtain the return of the deeds, but agreed to desist from such action on condition that the plaintiff's solicitors agreed to retain £1,250 out of the proceeds of sale and not part with it without notice to the defendants. When, after the sale had been completed, the defendants learned from M & Co that they were proposing to release the £1,250 to the plaintiff, they moved for an order restraining (i) M & Co from releasing the £1,250 and (ii) the plaintiff from causing or allowing that sum to be released. The question arose whether the words of reservation in the defendants' letter to M & Co were sufficient to preserve the defendants' lien, so as to prevent M & Co releasing the £1,250 until the trial of the action.

Held – (i) A solicitors' lien on documents of title was not lost by the parting with physical possession of those documents if the circumstances showed that the lien was being expressly or impliedly reserved; the defendants' letter and the surrounding circumstances showed that they were not intending to abandon their lien nor part with legal possession of the documents when they forwarded the title deeds to M & Co; they were offering them to their fellow solicitors to hold as the defendants' agents while they prepared the draft contract of sale; the documents could be retained by M & Co on the terms stipulated in the defendants' letter or returned or made available to the defendants to come and take them back. It followed that, since M & Co held the title deeds as the defendants' agents, their possession was the possession of the defendants and the lien was not defeated; M & Co were accordingly required to retain the £1,250 pending the outcome of the trial (see p 570 d and g to j, p 571 c d and g and p 572 a and f, post).

Watson v Lyon (1855) 7 De GM & G 288 applied.

Decision of Megarry J [1971] 3 All ER 892 reversed.

Case referred to in judgments

Watson v Lyon (1855) 7 De GM & G 288, 24 LJCh 754, 25 LTOS 230, 44 ER 113, 43 Digest (Repl) 299, 3139.

Notes

For the discharge of a solicitor's lien, see 36 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 179, 180, para 246, and for cases on the subject, see 43 Digest (Repl) 298, 3121-3141.

Interlocutory appeal

This was an appeal by the defendants, Sumpters, a firm of solicitors, and Albert Alfred George Randall, who was at the material time employed by that firm as a legal executive, from the decision of Megarry J dated 2nd July 1971 and reported at [1971] 3 All ER 892, that no order should be made on the defendants' motion for an order restraining (i) Margolis & Co, the firm of solicitors acting for the plaintiff, Doris Mabel Caldwell, until after the trial of the plaintiff's action against the defendants in respect of the sale of her house, 7 St Mary's Place, Brighton, or further order from paying to the plaintiff or any third party on her behalf the sum of £1,250 which was held by them and represented part of the proceeds of the sale of the house; (ii) the plaintiff until after the trial of the action or further order from causing or allowing Margolis & Co to pay the £1,250 to her or to any other person or otherwise dealing with that sum. The facts are set out in the judgment of Salmon LJ.

F M Ferris for the defendants.

A J D McCowan for the plaintiff.

SALMON LJ. Sumpters, the first defendants, were formerly the plaintiff's solicitors and were instructed by her to act, amongst other things, in connection with the proposed sale to the Brighton Corpn of her house in St Mary's Place at Brighton. For this purpose the plaintiff's title deeds to the house were deposited with Sumpters. The corporation had not entered into any binding agreement to buy the house but had indicated their willingness to buy it for £3,450, a price agreeable to the plaintiff, providing the plaintiff could give vacant possession. The difficulty was that the tenants occupying the house refused to move out of it. Accordingly Sumpters, with the plaintiff's authority, instructed Bosley & Co, a firm of solicitors practising in Brighton, to take the necessary proceedings to evict the tenants. Sumpters, on the plaintiff's instructions, gave Bosley & Co their undertaking that the costs incurred in connection with these proceedings would be paid. Sumpters, also by a letter written on 6th January 1969, on the plaintiff's instructions, gave their undertaking to her bank that on the completion of the sale of 7 St Mary's Place they would discharge the plaintiff's indebtedness to her bank out of the proceeds of the sale. On 6th January 1969 the indebtedness was some £532.

Then in the summer of 1969 the plaintiff changed her solicitors, transferring her legal business to Margolis & Co. At that time, according to Sumpters, the plaintiff owed them some £322 for costs. In October 1969 Margolis & Co had for some time been pressing Sumpters for the title deeds of 7 St Mary's Place. These were required in the first place to prepare a contract of sale to the corporation and would be required subsequently to hand over to the corporation on completion. Sumpters, however, claimed the solicitor's lien over these documents for just over £920 in respect of a their costs and their personal liability on the undertakings to which I have referred. According to Megarry J's judgment¹ neither the lien nor its amount was disputed at the hearing before him. Sumpters expressed their willingness to hand over the title deeds to Margolis & Co providing that Margolis & Co would undertake to honour the undertakings which Sumpters had given on the plaintiff's instructions to Bosley & Co and the bank and also undertake to pay the costs due by the plaintiff to Sumpters. Margolis & Co asked Sumpters for details of these undertakings. This information does not appear to have been forthcoming. The undertakings were never given.

b On 15th January 1970 Sumpters sent the deeds to Margolis & Co under cover of a letter, the material part of which reads as follows:

c 'These deeds and documents are being sent to you on the understanding that you will hold them to our order, pending the payment of our fees and your Undertaking to honour those Undertakings which we have given on behalf of [the plaintiff], on her instructions, and the payment of fees, etc., of other professional firms who have acted on [the plaintiff's] instructions and have not yet been paid by her.'

d When those documents were sent forward by that letter it was clear that Sumpters had been and were still claiming a lien on those documents and they were sending them forward to Margolis & Co on the condition that Margolis & Co would hold the documents to their order. In the meantime, on 6th January 1970, the plaintiff had issued a specially endorsed writ claiming, amongst other things, the return of the title deeds. The date of the service of the writ is obscure. It appears, however, to have been served after 15th January although by that date Sumpters may well e have been informed that the writ had been issued.

On 20th January 1970 Margolis & Co replied to Sumpters's letter of 15th January as follows:

f 'We thank you for your letter of the 15th January and are pleased to have at last received the Deeds which you enclosed. You are no doubt aware that proceedings have been issued against you and Mr. Randall and these proceedings include matters other than delivery up of the Deeds. In the circumstances we are unable to accede to your request either to hold the Deeds to your Order or to give you our undertakings as mentioned by you . . .'

Sumpters then threatened to bring proceedings against Margolis & Co for the return of the deeds. Thereupon it was very sensibly arranged between these two firms of solicitors that in consideration of Sumpters's abandoning the proposed g proceedings Margolis & Co would retain in their hands £1,250 out of the proceeds of sale and would not part with that sum save on notice to Sumpters.

The sale was duly completed and the proceeds of the sale were received by Margolis & Co. Notice having been given by them that they proposed to release the £1,250 to the plaintiff, the present motion came on for hearing. The motion asked in these h terms for:

'An order restraining . . . Messrs. Margolis & Co. until after the trial of this action or further order from paying to the Plaintiff or any third party on her behalf the sum of £1250 now held by [Margolis & Co] and representing part of the proceeds of sale of 7 St. Mary's Place Brighton Sussex';

i and then, against the plaintiff, an order restraining her until after the trial of the action or further order from causing or allowing Margolis & Co to pay the sum of £1,250 to her or any other person or otherwise dealing with that sum. The outcome of the motion depends on whether or not Sumpters had lost their lien by sending the title deeds to Margolis & Co under cover of the letter of 15th January. If the motion fails, Sumpters in effect lose their lien and Margolis & Co are free to pay the £1,250 to their client, the plaintiff, resident outside the jurisdiction of our courts in Minorca. If the motion succeeds, Margolis & Co must retain the £1,250 pending the trial of the action. The learned judge² held that Sumpters had lost their lien and therefore made no order on the motion. From that decision Sumpters now appeal.

This appeal turns entirely on the true meaning and legal effect of the letter of 15th January 1970 in the circumstances in which it was written. Approaching the problem even without the assistance of authority, I would find insuperable difficulty in agreeing with the decision of the learned judge² notwithstanding his elaborate and lucid judgment. Since it was not disputed below, it must be assumed for present purposes that Sumpters had a lien on the documents of title. It follows that they had the legal right to possession of these documents as against the plaintiff, in spite of the fact that the documents belonged to her. Even if Sumpters had sent the documents to the plaintiff direct under cover of a letter written in terms similar to those of 15th January, and in similar circumstances, I am by no means convinced that they would have lost their lien by parting with the physical possession of the documents. It seems to me that they retained legal possession. The letter made it plain that the documents were being sent to be held by the addressee as agents for Sumpters and to their order. The documents could be retained on the terms stipulated in the letter or returned or made available to Sumpters to come and take them back.

Although I express no concluded view on the point, I doubt whether, even if the addressee had been the plaintiff herself she could have kept the documents and repudiated the obligation to comply with the terms on which they had been offered to her. The documents, however, were not sent to the plaintiff, they were sent by Sumpters, officers of the court, to Margolis & Co, who are also officers of the court as well as the solicitors for the plaintiff. It must have been clear to Margolis & Co that Sumpters were not intending to part with their lien but were only forwarding the documents out of courtesy to enable Margolis & Co to enter into a contract with a corporation. Without having the sight of the documents, clearly it would have been impossible for any contract of sale to have been prepared. I make no criticism of Margolis & Co. I am sure that they genuinely believed that their duty to their client required them to take advantage of the mistake which they thought that Sumpters had made in parting with physical possession of the documents of title.

In my judgment, however, Sumpters had made no mistake. The letter and all the surrounding circumstances show that they did not intend to abandon their lien nor to part with legal possession of the documents. They offered them to their brother solicitors to hold as their agents on their behalf so that they might be enabled to prepare a draft contract of sale. To my mind it is plain that Margolis & Co were under a legal obligation to return the documents to Sumpters or make them available to Sumpters on Sumpters's request.

The crucial factor in this case is that Sumpters, because of their lien, had the legal right to possession of the documents. The documents were being offered on the terms of the letter of 15th January. The law does not in my view allow retention of the documents and repudiation of the terms on which they are offered. This seems to me to be clear on principle. There is little authority on the point, possibly because it is so plain. What authority there is tends to support the view I have formed. There is certainly no authority the other way. The textbooks all proclaim that a lien is not lost by parting with physical possession if the circumstances show, as in the present case, that the lien is being expressly or impliedly reserved (see Bowstead on Agency³, Halsbury's Laws of England⁴, Powell's Law of Agency⁵, Stoljar's Law of Agency⁶, Fridman's Law of Agency⁷ and Cordery on Solicitors⁸).

2 [1971] 3 All ER 892, [1971] 3 WLR 748

3 13th Edn, 1968, p 232

4 Volume 36, 3rd Edn, p 180

5 2nd Edn, 1961, p 372

6 Page 309

7 3rd Edn, 1971, p 154

8 6th Edn, 1968, p 432

a The only authority which directly bears on this point is of respectable antiquity, *Watson v Lyon*⁹. In that case the mortgagor instructed his solicitors to whom he was indebted in a bill of costs to prepare a reconveyance of part of the mortgaged property. They did so and sent the engrossment together with other engrossments to the mortgagees' solicitors for execution by the mortgagees under cover of a letter stating that they had a lien on the documents and concluding 'you will be good enough to hold them to our account'.
b The mortgagees executed the relevant engrossment and thereby it became a deed of reconveyance. Thereafter the mortgagees' solicitors agreed with the mortgagor's solicitors that the mortgagees would not part with the deed of reconveyance except in accordance with a letter to which I have referred. The question then arose whether the mortgagor's solicitors had lost their lien or whether they were entitled to an injunction to restrain the mortgagees and their solicitors from dealing with the reconveyance without their consent.
c The court decided this question in favour of the mortgagor's solicitors. Knight Bruce LJ considered it irrelevant that the engrossment had been turned by execution into a deed and thereby changed its character. He based his judgment solely on the effect of the letter and the circumstances under which the parchment had been forwarded to the mortgagees' solicitors, namely that the mortgagor's solicitors retained their lien on it and were parting with it only on the condition that the mortgagees' solicitors would hold it on their account. He did not even refer to the subsequent agreement, for which d in any event there was probably no consideration.

Turner LJ¹⁰ dealt with two questions: (1) had the lien been lost by forwarding the parchment under the terms of the letter, and (2) had the lien been lost by the parchment having changed its character in being turned into a deed. He said¹¹:

e '... these questions depend, as it seems to me, upon the character in which this deed was held by the mortgagees and their solicitors. If a solicitor, having a lien upon a document, places it in the hands of an agent or trustee, it cannot, I think, be said that his lien is defeated, [in this he was agreeing with what had been said by Knight Bruce LJ] nor can any change in the character of the document, as I think, destroy the lien, if the agent or trustee has agreed to hold the altered document subject to the lien. In either case the document cannot rightfully pass
f into the hands of any third person. In each case the possession of the agent or trustee is the possession of the solicitor. Suppose a country solicitor to send up documents to his London agent, with directions to hold them on his account, the lien of the country solicitor must surely remain.'

g Now, the London agent would be the solicitors for the client against whom the country solicitor had a lien, yet nevertheless according to the view expressed by Turner LJ he would not be justified in handing over the document to the client but would be holding them as agent for the country solicitor whose lien would be preserved.

I therefore come to the conclusion both on principle and authority that in the present case Sumpters have not lost their lien and that Margolis & Co must retain h the sum of £1,250 pending the outcome of this action. I would accordingly allow the appeal.

STAMP LJ. I agree. It is plain, as the learned judge¹² in the court below remarked, that a solicitor's possessory lien is lost if the solicitors part with the possession of the deeds without making any reservation. It is also plain that if the solicitor obtains the agreement of the recipient to do so he will hold the deeds on the solicitor's behalf and
i

9 (1855) 7 De GM & G 288

10 (1855) 7 De GM & G at 297, 298

11 (1855) 7 De GM & G at 298

12 [1971] 3 All ER 892 at 895, [1971] 3 WLR 748 at 752

the lien will not be lost. In my judgment it is also the law that where a solicitor having a possessory lien on his former client's papers puts them in the hands of a third party to hold them to the order of the solicitor or for the account of the solicitor, the lien is not destroyed because the possession of the transferee becomes the possession of the solicitor. In my judgment it makes no difference that the transferee is the solicitor of the owner of the papers. If this were not the law, powerful considerations of convenience and indeed, in some cases but not in this, of honest dealing, would be frustrated.

It is submitted here that the plaintiff's solicitors, receiving the documents of title as they did, were placed in an embarrassing position, having a duty to the plaintiff who denied the existence of the lien and who was or may have been unwilling that the undertakings which had been required as a condition of giving up the lien should be given. This embarrassment could however only arise if the defendant solicitors had delivered unqualified possession to the plaintiff's solicitors and this they did not do. Having received the documents 'to hold them to our order', their possession became that of the solicitors who sent them and they could either hold them to the order of the solicitors who sent them or, if the plaintiff would not have it so, send them back or say, 'Come and fetch them'.

In my judgment *Watson v Lyon*¹³ is an authority for the proposition which I have stated. The decision in that case rested, as I read it, on two propositions. The first proposition was that if a solicitor having a lien on a document places it in the hands of an agent (and it was necessarily conceded in this case that the solicitor to the other party can be an agent) instructing him to hold the document to the account or order of the former solicitor, the possessory lien is not defeated because the possession of the transferee is the possession of the transferor. The second proposition established by the case as I read it is that if the document changes its character thereafter, the lien is not defeated if the agent promises to hold the altered document subject to the lien. The question of whether, in the absence of such a promise, the lien would have attached to the altered document was not decided.

The case supposed by Turner LJ of the country solicitor sending documents to his London agent appears to me not merely to be part of the ratio decidendi of Turner LJ in the case but also to be remarkably like the present case.

I, too, would allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Shelton, Cobb & Sumpters (for the defendants); Margolis & Co (for the plaintiff).

Harold J Hughes Esq Barrister.

R v Southampton City Justices, ex parte Briggs

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND GRIFFITHS JJ

17th DECEMBER 1971

Magistrates – Procedure – Summary trial for indictable offence – Consent of accused to summary trial – Withdrawal of consent – Plea of guilty – Committal to quarter sessions for sentence – Change of plea after committal – Case remitted to magistrates for disposal – Claim by accused to withdraw consent to summary trial and to elect trial by jury – Discretion of justices to grant request.

The applicant appeared before the respondent justices on three charges. Being unrepresented, he purported to elect summary trial. He pleaded guilty and was convicted on his pleas. He was then committed to quarter sessions for sentence. At quarter sessions the recorder determined that in respect of the third charge, one of theft, a plea of 'not guilty' should be entered, and that the matter should be sent back to the justices with a direction to set aside their conviction of the applicant on the third charge. On appearing again before the justices, the applicant sought to elect trial by jury on the third charge. The justices, on the advice of their clerk, decided that they had no power to consent to the applicant's election for summary trial being withdrawn. On an application for mandamus directing the justices to permit the applicant to elect to go for trial by jury on the third charge,

Held – The justices had the power to allow the applicant to withdraw his consent to summary trial; accordingly, mandamus would be granted directing them to hear the applicant's request to withdraw his plea on the third charge and to determine his request to trial by jury on that charge in their discretion (see p 575 e to g, post).

R v Craske, ex parte Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1957] 2 All ER 772 applied.

Notes

For consent to summary trial of indictable offences, see 25 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 177, para 326, and for cases on the subject, see 33 Digest (Repl) 186, 187, 347-352.

Cases referred to in judgment

R v Craske, ex parte Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1957] 2 All ER 772, [1957] 2 QB 591, [1957] 3 WLR 308, 121 JP 502, 33 Digest (Repl) 186, 350.

R v Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex parte Zardin (14th May 1971) unreported.

R v Muford and Lothingland Justices, ex parte Harber [1971] 1 All ER 81, [1971] 2 QB 291, [1971] 2 WLR 460, 55 Cr App Rep 57.

Cases also cited

R v Marlborough Street Magistrates, ex parte Van Telford (7th December 1971) unreported.

R v Metropolitan Magistrate, ex parte Elimelech (14th May 1971) unreported.

Motions for mandamus and prohibition

This was an application by way of motion by Jeffrey Briggs (a) for an order of mandamus directed to the respondents, the Southampton City Justices, to consider and deal in accordance with the provisions of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952 with an application by the applicant to be put to his election whether to consent or not to consent to be tried by the respondent justices on a charge of theft remitted to them on 29th October 1971 by Southampton City Quarter Sessions; and (b) for an order of prohibition restraining the respondent justices from trying the applicant summarily on the aforesaid charge of theft. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Widgery CJ. a JJ Smyth for the applicant.

The respondent justices did not appear and were not represented. b

LORD WIDGERY CJ. In these proceedings counsel moves on behalf of the applicant, Jeffrey Briggs, seeking orders of mandamus and prohibition to issue against the justices for the county of Southampton requiring them to conduct certain proceedings before them in such a manner as to permit the applicant to elect to go for trial by jury on a charge of theft, contrary to s 1 (1) of the Theft Act 1968, (or to make such election as he may be advised) and, in the event of his electing to go for trial as aforesaid, to take all proper steps for the institution of committal proceedings in consequence of such election. c

The way in which this request arises is as follows. On 11th October 1971 the applicant appeared before Southampton justices, the respondents to this motion, on three charges. He purported to plead guilty to all three charges and he was convicted on his pleas. The respondent justices then committed the applicant to the city quarter sessions for sentence. He had of course elected summary trial in respect of the charge of theft as a preliminary to his plea and conviction by the justices. On 11th November the applicant appeared before the recorder at the Southampton City Quarter Sessions pursuant to the committal for sentence which the justices had ordered. For reasons which are not entirely clear from the material before us, the recorder determined that a plea of not guilty should be entered in the case of the charge of theft with which we are concerned. d

That he had authority to do so has recently been made clear in this court in the case of *R v Mutford and Lothingland Justices, ex parte Harber*¹. In recognising the power of the recorder to direct that the matter be sent back to the justices as on a plea of not guilty Lord Parker CJ gave certain warnings as to the dangers which might follow if recorders and others sitting at quarter sessions exercised this power too liberally, but that the power exists is determined by that last mentioned case, and it was exercised by the recorder in this instance. He made an order in the matter, a copy of which we have before us, and his order was that a not guilty plea should be entered and the matter should be sent back to the justices for disposal. e

On the matter coming back before the justices some misunderstanding arose whether the future proceedings were to be proceedings on indictment or summary. In the end it was made clear on behalf of the applicant that he desired to go for trial before a jury in regard to this offence. In other words he desired to withdraw his consent to summary trial which he had given at the very beginning of these proceedings, and desired that the justices' interest in the matter should be confined to the conduct of committal proceedings. f

I say there was some misunderstanding in the matter because the solicitor appearing for the applicant had certain discussions with the clerk to the justices, and the latter took the view that there was no outstanding power of the justices to allow the applicant to alter his election in this regard. I would pay tribute to the obvious care which the clerk and his assistant took on this question, but they seemed to have been misled, in a way which I do not fully follow, by the form of the recorder's order into thinking that the recorder had ordered that this matter should be dealt with not only on a plea of not guilty but as on a consent to summary trial as well. I can see nothing in the recorder's order which dealt with the second point at all. g a by the recorder's order, advised the justices that they had no power to allow this applicant to withdraw his consent to summary trial. We are in the position in this case of being able to say with certainty that that is what happened, because we have an affidavit from the justices' clerk making it perfectly clear that he thought that it was his duty to tender this advice, and advised the justices that they had no power to consent to the election being withdrawn.

However, the clerk to the justices, taking the view that the issue was determined h

b They had that power; nothing in the recorder's order that I can see ordered to the contrary, and independently of any special order of that kind the power of justices to allow an accused person to withdraw his consent to summary trial was recognised as long ago as 1957 in *R v Craske, ex parte Comr of Police of the Metropolis*². That decision seems to have received comparatively little publicity until earlier this year, when in an unreported case which came before this court on 14th May, R v Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex parte Zardin, this court referred to the decision in *R v Craske*². In my judgment appears this phrase:

c 'It is clear from the case of *R v Craske*² . . . that in circumstances such as the present the magistrate has a discretion to allow the accused person to change his or her election if he wishes. If there was doubt, as there may have been before, about the existence of that right at all, it is resolved by *R v Craske*².'

d So the true position when the matter eventually came back to the justices was that they did have power to allow the applicant to withdraw his consent to summary trial, and if he asked, as he did, to withdraw his consent, then the justices were required to exercise their discretion whether they would allow him to do so or not. The mischief in the present case is that they did not exercise a discretion at all because they believed e that they had no discretion to exercise.

f For my part I am satisfied they were wrong in adopting the view that they had no discretion to exercise, and I would myself order mandamus to go directing them to hear the applicant's request to withdraw his consent to summary trial, and to determine that request in their discretion. We have been pressed by counsel for the applicant to give some kind of indication or guidelines as to how such a discretion should be exercised. For my part I think it would be dangerous, and I decline to give any such direction. I think it suffices to tell the justices that, as in all their undertakings, they must endeavour to do justice, and whether or not they exercise their discretion in favour of the applicant's request will depend on how they see the broad justice of the whole situation. I would allow mandamus to go in the terms to which I have referred.

g ASHWORTH J. I agree.

GRIFFITHS J. I also agree.

h LORD WIDGERY CJ. I should add that prohibition is not really necessary in the circumstances.

Mandamus granted.

Solicitors: Robbins, Olivey & Lake, agents for Robinson, Jarvis & Rolf, Cowes (for the applicant).

j N P Metcalfe Esq Barrister.

2 [1957] 2 All ER 772, [1957] 2 QB 591

Practice Direction

CHANCERY DIVISION

Execution – Leave to issue execution – Application – Suspended order for possession – Circumstances in which application to be made by summons – Service – Proof of service – Administration of Justice Act 1970, s 36 – RSC Ord 46, rr 2, 4.

1. Fleet Mortgage & Investment Co Ltd v Lower Maisonette 46 Eaton Place Ltd^a makes it clear that leave to issue execution on a suspended order for possession because of a breach of the suspensory terms must not be given without allowing the defendant an opportunity of being heard.

2. It is apprehended that a suspended possession order is an order under which a person is entitled to relief subject to the fulfilment of a condition for the purposes of RSC Ord 46, r 2 (1) (d), and that Ord 46, r 4, accordingly applies. As the judgment referred to in para 1 above shows that leave to issue execution should not be given ex parte it follows that the court must direct an application for such leave to be made by summons (r 4 (1)).

3. Suspended orders are now made not infrequently in mortgagees' possession actions by virtue of s 36 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970^b and in such actions the defendant is often in default of appearance.

4. Where a defendant has appeared no special directions as to service are needed but in future a plaintiff desiring leave to issue execution on a suspended possession order when there has been a default of appearance will send a copy of the summons and of the affidavit in support of the application to each defendant in default of appearance at his last known address, so as to reach him not less than two clear days before the hearing, and will lodge with the master's clerk, at least one clear day before the hearing, the affidavit in support of the summons endorsed with a certificate by the plaintiff's solicitor in the form following or as near thereto as may be appropriate:

I certify that on the day of 19 a copy of the summons herein dated 19 together with a true copy of the within affidavit was sent by prepaid letter post addressed to the Defendant at his last known address being [insert address].

Plaintiff's solicitor.'

No further proof of service should normally be required in default cases.

5. The same principles apply and the same practice will be followed where leave to issue execution is required because six years or more have elapsed since the date of an unsuspended possession order or because there has been a change in the party liable to execution. (See RSC Ord 46, r 2.)

6. Applications for leave to issue execution because of a change of the party entitled to execution or to issue a writ of restitution may be dealt with ex parte as hitherto.

By the direction of the Vice-Chancellor.

27th January 1972

R E BALL
Chief Master

^a (1972) The Times, 18th January

^b Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 1970 vol, p 274

a Script & Play Productions Ltd v Comrs for the General Purposes of the Income Tax for the Division of St George's, Hanover b Square, London, and another

Sarne Ltd v Comrs for the General Purposes of the Income Tax for the Division of c St George's, Hanover Square, London, and another

CHANCERY DIVISION

MEGARRY J

23rd NOVEMBER 1971

d Income tax – Penalty – Failure to furnish information to commissioners – Summary award of penalty – Award of daily penalty for continuing failure thereafter – Validity – Appeals against assessments to corporation tax – Adjournment of hearing and subsequent hearings – Precept issued requiring delivery of accounts within 90 days – Penalty summarily awarded for non-compliance with precept – Further meeting of commissioners – Non-compliance with precept continuing – Imposition of penalty calculated on daily rate since date of original

e penalty – Whether failure to comply with precept declared by commissioners before whom 'proceedings' had been commenced so as to justify further daily penalty – Taxes Management Act 1970, ss 51 (1), 53 (1), 98 (1), 100 (1).

The taxpayer company was assessed to corporation tax for the year from May 1967 to April 1968 in the sum of £100. It appealed against the assessment and the appeal f was listed for hearing by the General Commissioners on 5th June 1969. At that hearing and subsequently there were a number of adjournments. The taxpayer company's accountants were unable to obtain instructions from a director and principal shareholder who was abroad. Later the taxpayer company was assessed to corporation tax for the year from May 1968 to April 1969 and it appealed against that assessment also. On 8th October 1970 both appeals were listed for hearing g but no representative of the taxpayer company or the accountants attended. At this meeting the commissioners ordered a precept to be issued under s 51 (1)^a of the Taxes Management Act 1970 for certified accounts comprising the balance sheet, profit and loss account and tax computations for the years in question to be sent to the commissioners within 90 days of the date of the precept which was 13th October 1970. At a meeting on 1st April 1971 a clerk from the accountants attended, the h accountants themselves having written a letter seeking an adjournment of the hearing. At that meeting the commissioners imposed a penalty of £25 on the taxpayer company under ss 53 (1)^b and 98 (1) (i)^c of the 1970 Act for failure to comply with the precept. On 10th June 1971 the cases were again listed for hearing but on that occasion also there was no appearance on behalf of the taxpayer company or the accountants. The commissioners thereupon imposed on the taxpayer company j a penalty of £350 under s 98 (1) (ii)^c of the 1970 Act, calculated at the rate of £5 a day since 1st April 1971. The taxpayer company appealed against the imposition of the £350 penalty.

a Section 51 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 580 b, post

b Section 53 (1) is set out at p 580 d, post

c Section 98 (1) is set out at p 580 f and g, post

Held – Since by virtue of s 98 (1) (ii) a daily penalty could only be imposed if the failure to furnish information continued after the declaration by the court or commissioners before whom ‘proceedings’ had been commenced, it followed that no daily penalty could be imposed where there had been no proceedings for a prior penalty, for it was not then possible to point to any court or commissioners who could declare the failure for the purposes of the daily penalty and thus start the necessary period running. The provisions of s 53 (1) that a penalty might be awarded summarily ‘notwithstanding that no proceedings for its recovery have been commenced’ and of s 100 (1)^d that ‘no proceedings shall be commenced . . . for the recovery of any penalty . . . except by order of the Board’, showed that the summary award of a penalty under s 53 (1) did not itself constitute ‘proceedings’ for the purposes of s 98 (1) (ii). Accordingly the commissioners had no power to impose the daily penalty totalling £350 and the appeal would be allowed (see p 581 j to p 582 b, post).

Notes

For the law relating to penalties, see 20 Halsbury’s Laws (3rd Edn) 715-720, paras 1435-1447, and for cases on the subject, see 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 578-580, 2146-2162.

For the Taxes Management Act 1970, ss 51, 53, 98, 100, see 34 Halsbury’s Statutes (3rd Edn) 1297, 1299, 1335, 1336.

Appeals

By notice of motion dated 2nd July 1971 the taxpayer companies, Script & Play Productions Ltd and Sarne Ltd, applied for an order pursuant to ss 53 (2) and 100 (6) of the Taxes Management Act 1970 that awards dated 10th June 1971 of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax for the division of St George’s, Hanover Square, London, imposing penalties of £350 on each of the taxpayer companies be wholly reversed or alternatively be reduced in amount. The facts are set out in the judgment.

J E F Lindsay for the taxpayer companies.

P W Medd for the Crown.

MEGARRY J. These are two appeals by originating motion against penalties imposed under the income tax legislation. One appeal is by a company called Script & Play Productions Ltd, and the other by a company called Sarne Ltd. Counsel for the taxpayer companies and counsel for the Crown agreed that the two cases were in substance indistinguishable, and that the second case stood or fell by the first. I shall accordingly deal only with the first case. I shall refer to Script & Play Productions Ltd as ‘the company’.

The matter arises out of two assessments for corporation tax, one for £100 for the year from May 1967 to April 1968 and the second for £1,000 for the year from May 1968 to April 1969. The company appealed against the first assessment, and the appeal was listed by the General Commissioners for the St George’s, Hanover Square, Division. The hearing was for 5th June 1969, and at that hearing and subsequently there were a number of adjournments. The company’s then accountants were unable to obtain instructions from a Mr Sarne, who is the principal shareholder and a director. Mr Sarne, it seems, was abroad. Due written notice of the meeting and of all subsequent meetings was given to the company at its registered office, with a copy to the company’s accountants. Although on the first few occasions the inspector of taxes accepted the reasons given for the inability of the company to proceed with the appeals, this attitude, not surprisingly, did not continue indefinitely. On 8th October 1970 appeals against both the assessments were listed for hearing; by then the company had also appealed against the second assessment. No representative of the company or the accountants attended. At this hearing, the General Commissioners ordered a a precept to be issued for certified accounts comprising the balance sheet and profit and loss accounts for the two years in question. These were to be sent, according to the precept, to the General Commissioners within 90 days from 13th October 1970.

^d Section 100 (1) is set out at p 580 j, post

A meeting of the General Commissioners had been arranged for 18th February 1971, which was after the 90 days had expired, but this was cancelled, due to a postal strike. At the next meeting, on 1st April 1971, a clerk from the accountants attended, b the accountants having written a letter seeking an adjournment. At that meeting the General Commissioners imposed a penalty of £25 for the failure to comply with the precept. On 10th June 1971 the cases were again listed for hearing, and this time there was no attendance on behalf of the company or the accountants. The General Commissioners thereupon imposed a penalty on the company of £350, being £5 a day from 1st April 1971.

c On 2nd July the company served an originating notice of motion seeking the reversal or reduction of the £350 penalty, the £25 penalty not being directly involved in the motion. The grounds of appeal were stated in very general terms as being—

d ‘that the said award is meet to be reversed alternatively is excessive by reason of the said Commissioners for the General Purposes having misdirected themselves as to law further or alternatively as to fact and by reason of their having exercised wrongly such discretions as were vested in them’.

Today, when the appeal came on for hearing before me, counsel on behalf of the company applied for an adjournment for 14 days. New accountants had been instructed on behalf of the company, he told me, and accounts had now been prepared for both the years in question. In the other appeal, by Sarne Ltd, I understand that e accounts for one of the two years were now ready. The same difficulty in obtaining instructions from Mr Sarne was put forward as the ground for seeking this adjournment. However, counsel for the Crown told me, on instructions, that Mr Sarne had in fact been in London on 2nd September 1971 at a meeting of the General Commissioners. Counsel for the company did not dispute that Mr Sarne had been in London then, but said that his present accountants had not been able to obtain f any instructions from Mr Sarne. The case displays a long history of repeated adjournments, and I have considerable sympathy with the present accountants, instructing solicitors and counsel for the company. But it seemed to me quite wrong to allow matters to drag on in this way, and I accordingly refused counsel for the company’s application for an adjournment.

g There was then a brief adjournment while counsel for the company ascertained whether he had any instructions to argue the substantive appeal. On it appearing that he had these instructions, he then took a point on the construction of the Taxes Management Act 1970 which is not altogether easy. It is common ground between counsel on both sides that although the Taxes Management Act 1970 has now replaced earlier legislation that was in force for at any rate part of the time in question, nothing turns on the transition from the former Acts to the present Act. Further— h more, although the Taxes Management Act 1970 is, according to the long title:

‘An Act to consolidate certain of the enactments relating to income tax, capital gains tax and corporation tax, including certain enactments relating also to other taxes’,

j it was agreed that the presumption that a mere consolidation Act does not affect the construction of the earlier Acts which it consolidates gave rise to no argument which would assist either side. Accordingly, the matter has been dealt with on the basis of the language of the Taxes Management Act 1970. The basic point taken by counsel for the company depends on the fact that no prior notice in writing or summons or other document was given to the company to warn it of any intention to consider imposing the penalty of £25. There was therefore nothing that could be called 'proceedings' before the commissioners which entitled them to declare a failure by the company for the purpose of starting time running for the daily penalty which constituted the £350. The penalty of £25 was simply imposed by the commissioners at their meeting on 1st April, and although valid in itself, it could provide no foundation for the daily penalty. a

The relevant statutory provisions are as follows. By s 48 (1) of the Taxes Management Act 1970 "the Commissioners" means the General Commissioners or the Special Commissioners, as the case may be'. Under s 51 (1): b

'The Commissioners may at any time before the determination of an appeal give notice to the appellant or other party to the proceedings (not being an inspector or the Board) requiring him within the time specified in the notice—
(a) to deliver to them such particulars as they may require for the purpose of determining the appeal . . .'
c

There are then certain other provisions that I need not mention, because it is under this paragraph that the commissioners caused the precept to be issued. Section 53 (1) provides:

'Any penalty incurred by any person for a failure to comply with a notice under section 51 above, or incurred by any person under section 52 above, may be awarded summarily by the Commissioners notwithstanding that no proceedings for its recovery have been commenced, and accordingly section 98 (3) of this Act shall not apply to any penalty so awarded.'
d

One must turn from that section to s 98 to discover what penalties may be awarded. I may preface my quotation from s 98 by saying that in the Table to that section, s 51 of the Act appears in col 1. Section 98 provides: e

'(1) Where any person—(a) has been required, by a notice served under or for the purposes of any of the provisions specified in the first column of the Table below, to deliver any return or other document, to furnish any particulars, to produce any document, or to make anything available for inspection, and he fails to comply with the notice, or (b) fails to furnish any information, give any certificate or produce any document or record in accordance with any of the provisions specified in the second column of the Table below, he shall be liable, subject to subsection (3) below—(i) to a penalty not exceeding £50, and (ii) if the failure continues after it has been declared by the court or Commissioners before whom proceedings for the penalty have been commenced, to a further penalty not exceeding £10 for each day on which the failure so continues . . .
(3) A person shall not be liable to any penalty incurred under this section for a failure to comply with any notice, if the failure is remedied before proceedings for the recovery of the penalty are commenced.'
f
g

Counsel for the company's point turns in the main on the words in s 98 (1) (ii) which run: 'declared by the court or Commissioners before whom proceedings for the penalty have been commenced'. He says that in this case no 'proceedings' for the penalty of £25 were commenced before the General Commissioners. Accordingly, there cannot be any failure which continued after it had been declared by the General Commissioners before whom 'proceedings' were commenced, as there were in fact no such General Commissioners. He reinforces his argument by referring to s 100 of the Act. By subsection (1): h
j

'Except as otherwise provided in this section, no proceedings shall be commenced against any person for the recovery of any penalty under the Taxes Acts except by order of the Board.'

- a Subsection (4) deals with the commencement of certain proceedings for a penalty by an inspector, and then by sub-s (7):

'Proceedings under this section before any Commissioners shall be by way of information in writing, made to them, and upon summons issued by them to the defendant (or defender) to appear before them at a time and place stated in the summons, and they shall hear and determine each case in a summary way; and any penalty awarded by them in such proceedings shall for all purposes be treated as if it were tax charged in an assessment and due and payable.'

- b Section 53 (1) provides for a penalty to be awarded summarily by the commissioners 'notwithstanding that no proceedings for its recovery have been commenced'. Section 98 (1) uses the phrase:

- c 'after it has been declared by the court or Commissioners before whom proceedings for the penalty have been commenced'.

The language of each of these two provisions relating to 'proceedings' substantially matches the other. This accordingly provides some support for the argument that if there is a summary award by the commissioners of a penalty under s 53 (1), without

- d any 'proceedings' for the recovery of the penalty having been commenced, the period of the daily penalty cannot commence to run under s 98 (1), because there has been no declaration by any court or commissioners before whom anything that the Act regards as 'proceedings' for the penalty have been commenced.

- e Counsel for the Crown sought to avoid this difficulty by pointing to the fact that ss 51 to 53 formed something of a little code of their own, and that under the pattern which the legislature had adopted it was appropriate to read s 53 (1) on the footing that if the commissioners commenced to consider whether they should award any penalty summarily, then that amounted to the commencement of proceedings for the recovery of a penalty, even though it might only be a matter of a few moments before they reached their conclusion that a penalty should be imposed. On this footing one would have proceedings which, perhaps with some degree of exaggeration, might be described as instant proceedings. I find it difficult to think that the legislature intended the words in s 53 (1) to mean that the process of summarily awarding a penalty comprised not only making the award but also the commencement of proceedings therefor, particularly in view of the nature of the proceedings contemplated by s 100 (7).

- f Counsel for the Crown also pointed to the initial words of s 53 (1), 'Any penalty incurred', and said that one can then turn to s 98 to find out what those penalties were. However, when one does that one finds there that the liability to the penalty of £50 is imposed without any qualifying or additional words, whereas the provision for liability to a daily penalty is qualified by the initial 'if' phrase, relating to a failure continuing after it has been declared by the court or commissioners before whom proceedings for the penalty have been commenced. Counsel for the Crown also

- h accepted that the opening words of s 100 were somewhat against him. These run:

'Except as otherwise provided in this section, no proceedings shall be commenced against any person for the recovery of any penalty under the Taxes Acts except by order of the Board.'

- i These words add to the improbability that something which does not amount to proceedings by the board and is not provided for by the section but consists of a penalty awarded by the General Commissioners under another section, s 53 (1), could be regarded as constituting valid 'proceedings' for the purpose of a subsequent daily penalty.

The result appears to me to be that no daily penalty can be imposed where no proceedings for a prior penalty have been commenced, for it is then not possible to point to any court or commissioners who can declare the failure for the purposes of the daily penalty and thus start the necessary period running. The words in s 53 (1), 'notwithstanding that no proceedings for its recovery have been commenced', seem to me to point in the same direction. It would have been possible for the draftsman of the Act to provide in s 98 (1) (ii) that for a failure there should be liability to a penalty not exceeding £50, and that if the failure continued after it had been 'declared by the court or Commissioners by whom the penalty has been imposed', there should be liability to a further penalty not exceeding £10 a day, and so on; or the language might have been 'declared by any court or any Commissioners'. Either set of words or their equivalent would have met a case, such as the case before me, where the initial penalty is imposed summarily under s 53 (1). Instead of the words that I have suggested, however, the draftsman has used the words 'before whom proceedings for the penalty have been commenced', and due effect must be given to the words which in fact appear in the statute.

It therefore seems to me that the point taken by counsel for the company must succeed. It is not a case in which he has suggested that his clients have any particular merits, but, of course, that is not the point. I am concerned with the construction of a penal provision, and so far as I feel any fair doubts on the construction of the statute these must be resolved in favour of those exposed to the penalty. I am not sure that the result is one that the draftsman would have intended, had the point been put to him, but I must give effect to the language that has in fact been used. Accordingly, in my judgment, in each case the appeal succeeds and the penalty must be discharged.

Appeals allowed.

Solicitors: The Simkins Partnership (for the taxpayer companies); Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

K Buckley Edwards Esq Barrister.

Ash v Ash

FAMILY DIVISION

BAGNALL J

25th, 26th NOVEMBER 1971

Divorce – Behaviour of respondent – Behaviour such that petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with respondent – Whether 'petitioner' meaning ordinary reasonable spouse looked at as a petitioner – Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 2 (1) (b).

Divorce – Behaviour of respondent – Behaviour such that petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with respondent – Reasonableness – Necessity for court to consider characteristics and behaviour of petitioner as well as of respondent – Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 2 (1) (b).

Divorce – Irretrievable breakdown of marriage – Evidence that marriage has broken down irretrievably – Assertion by petitioner that no possibility of contemplating living with respondent as his wife – Whether court bound to conclude marriage has irretrievably broken down – Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 2 (3).

On the true construction of s 2 (1) (b)^a of the Divorce Reform Act 1969 the word 'petitioner' means the particular petitioner in the case under consideration and not an ordinary reasonable spouse looked at as a petitioner (see p 585 f and g, post). The court in determining for the purposes of s 2 (1) (b) whether the particular petitioner a can or cannot reasonably be expected to live with the particular respondent must take into account the character, personality, disposition and behaviour of the petitioner as well as the behaviour of the respondent as alleged and established in evidence. If the petitioner and respondent are equally bad in similar respects, each can reasonably be expected to live with the other. A violent petitioner can, for example, reasonably be expected to live with a violent respondent (see p 585 h and j and p 586 a, post).

^a Section 2 (1), so far as material, provides: 'The court hearing a petition for divorce shall not hold the marriage to have broken down irretrievably unless the petitioner satisfies the court of one or more of the following facts, that is to say—... (b) that the respondent has behaved in such a way that the petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with the respondent ...'

b Where a petitioner for a decree of divorce is adamant that her marriage is at an end and asserts that there is no possibility of her contemplating living with the respondent as his wife, the court is not in law bound to conclude, for the purposes of s 2 (3)^b of the 1969 Act, that the marriage has broken down irretrievably; simple assertion cannot suffice. The court must examine all the evidence placed before it, including and giving not inconsiderable weight to the assertions of the parties, and determine, quite generally, whether it can be said that, in spite of the respondent's behaviour and the petitioner's reaction to that behaviour, the marriage has not broken down irretrievably (see p 586 f and g, post).

Notes

For decree of divorce on proof that the respondent has behaved in such a way that the petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with the respondent, see Supplement d to 12 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) para 437A, 3.

For the Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 2, see Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 1969 vol, p 1328.

Petition

This was a petition by the wife for divorce on the ground that her marriage to the husband had irretrievably broken down. The wife alleged that the husband had behaved in such a way that she could not reasonably be expected to live with him. By his answer the husband denied that the marriage had broken down irretrievably. The facts are set out in the judgment.

SIR Craig for the wife.

The husband appeared in person.

f

BAGNALL J. The petitioner and the respondent in this case, Anne-Marie Rose Ash and Brian Henry Dorland Ash, were married on 19th April 1963. They were respectively 29 and 26 years of age; the husband had previously been married, his previous marriage having been dissolved. At the time of the marriage they had been living together as man and wife for about a year and the wife was then pregnant of her first child, a boy, who was born on 20th May 1963. Subsequently a second child, a girl, was born on 28th September 1964. The matrimonial home was at all material times in Putney, London, where the wife now lives with the two children, who attend the local primary school. The husband lives generally at the home of his parents, although I think that from time to time he occupies other temporary accommodation. That state of affairs, so far as the husband is concerned, now obtains pursuant to an order of this court made on 4th May 1971 as a result of which the husband undertook not to return to the matrimonial home, except for certain limited purposes, and not to interfere with or molest the wife.

On 28th April 1971 the wife filed her petition wherein she alleged that the marriage had broken down irretrievably and, as particulars of that allegation, that the husband had behaved in such a way that the wife could not reasonably be expected to live with him. Further particularisation of that averment alleged general violence and intoxication amounting to alcoholism, with a number of specific instances of violence, either perpetrated on or threatened to the wife. By his answer, which was not j Section 2 (3), so far as material, provides: 'If the court is satisfied on the evidence of any such fact as is mentioned in subsection (1) of this section, then, unless it is satisfied on all the evidence that the marriage has not broken down irretrievably, it shall . . . grant a decree nisi of divorce.'

professionally drawn, the husband admitted tendencies to alcohol and violence and further admitted some of the specific acts of violence and threats of violence alleged in the petition. He averred that the principal reason for his behaviour was his unemployment, to which I shall have to refer. He makes an allegation that on one occasion the wife changed the locks of the matrimonial home during his absence so that he was unable to obtain access thereto. He makes some completely vague allegations against the wife, but adds that out of regard for the wife he has no wish to submit any evidence in support of those allegations unless the court should insist. Generally he attributes the present situation, as between himself and the wife, to his health and asserts that the marriage has not broken down irretrievably. a

At the time of the marriage the husband was an administrative assistant in a charity organisation and the wife was a market research controller. At that time, and during the first three or four years of the marriage, the husband was earning the comparatively modest income of about £1,250 a year. He has considerable literary talent which he has wished, and been able, to exercise and at the end of 1966 he obtained employment with a substantial petroleum company as part of its public relations organisation. This was an arduous occupation but one which was particularly suited to his abilities. As a result of it, not only did he obtain a greater income, amounting to some £3,000 per annum, but he was introduced to the modern phenomenon of the almost unlimited expense account. This, together with the demands of his employment, led very largely to the events with which I am concerned, but it did not lead there immediately. The husband undoubtedly found his business entertaining combined, as it necessarily was, with the consumption of hard liquor very much to his taste; also he found that he had adequate resources to enable him to entertain. But the wife during these more prosperous days was, I have no doubt, content to take the benefits in entertainment and other ways which that increased prosperity brought with it. Undoubtedly, however, during this period, as indeed he admits, the husband was drinking far too much far too often. However, he continued in that way of life for two or more years when the inevitable occurred and he resigned his post, becoming then unemployed. Since that time he has sought to make a living for himself as a freelance writer but with very limited financial success. b

On the husband's unemployment the wife, as perhaps one would expect, herself took employment which brought in a modest income and, of course, involved her in spending weekdays away from her home and children and in substantial travelling. During that period, therefore, one would have expected the husband to play his part in looking after the children and in relieving the wife of such of the household tasks as he was able to perform. c

After the onset of the expense account and even more after the misfortune of unemployment, the husband's drinking habits were undoubtedly coupled with abuse of, and violence towards, the wife. I must therefore first consider the wife as a witness in support of the allegations that she has made. I say at once that she did not impress me. She had a penchant for self-dramatisation to an extraordinary degree; she was vague and confused, not only about the dates but about the years and sequence of the various incidents, and she lost no opportunity of exhibiting extreme malevolence towards the husband, not only directed towards the later years of their marriage, the years of complaint, but also going back to the early days of the marriage and to the even earlier days before the marriage when they were living together as lovers. d

The husband, who has conducted his own case with an engaging manner and considerable restraint, also gave evidence. He exhibited similar restraint in the witness box and, as was perhaps foreshadowed in his answer, he was reluctant to criticise his wife. He was, however, constrained to admit, as had also been foreshadowed in his answer, the allegations contained in the petition both general, relating to drunkenness, alcoholism and violence, and particular, relating to specific acts and threats. He expressed the view, and stated as a fact, that his addiction to drink was not only produced by the expense account to which he had access but also by the demands e a which his work placed on him and the lack of interest in his problems and lack of understanding that was shown by the wife. It was apparent to both of them that his proclivities were becoming, if they were not already, an illness and as one example of the attitude of the wife I may perhaps cite this: they attended together a consultant psychiatrist in order to see what, if any, cure might be found for the husband's condition. This must necessarily have been one of the most important events in their short married life, but the wife had no recollection of the result of it when she was asked about it in the witness box. However, having regard to the admissions made by the husband both formally in the pleadings and on oath in the witness box I must find that the wife has established fully all the allegations contained in para 8 of her petition, that paragraph containing the particulars of the behaviour of the husband of which the wife complains; and I find as facts the matters there averred.

c The husband puts his defence to the petition in two ways. First, he says that notwithstanding the facts that he has admitted and that I have found, nevertheless it should not be held that he has behaved in such a way that the wife cannot reasonably be expected to live with him. Secondly, if that be wrong, he says that under the Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 2 (3), I should conclude that I am satisfied on all the evidence that the marriage has not broken down irretrievably. If he satisfies me on either of those two submissions, the prayer for dissolution in the petition must be rejected.

d I must therefore first consider the true construction of s 2 (1) (b) of the 1969 Act. That paragraph, which sets out one of the facts which have to be proved if a petitioner is to satisfy the court that the marriage has broken down irretrievably, reads as follows:

e 'that the respondent has behaved in such a way that the petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with the respondent'.

The phrase 'cannot reasonably be expected to live with the respondent' necessarily poses an objective test, in contradistinction to the phrase 'the petitioner finds it intolerable to live with the respondent' in para (a) of the subsection. So much is common ground. The question on which I heard considerable argument was: what is the meaning of the words 'the petitioner' in para (b)? Two possible constructions were canvassed, one which counsel for the wife, for whose assistance I am indebted, first submitted was that 'the petitioner' means the ordinary, reasonable spouse, looked at as a petitioner. The alternative which counsel for the wife adopted after he had resiled from his first submission was that 'the petitioner' means the particular petitioner in the case under consideration. Faced with a choice between those two meanings, I have no hesitation in adopting the latter; that is the sense in which the words 'the petitioner' are used, so it seems to me, throughout the section and that is the sense which, apart from that, I think the words naturally bear.

g In order, therefore, to answer the question whether the petitioner can or cannot reasonably be expected to live with the respondent, in my judgment, I have to consider not only the behaviour of the respondent as alleged and established in evidence, but the character, personality, disposition and behaviour of the petitioner. The general question may be expanded thus: can this petitioner, with his or her character and personality, with his or her faults and other attributes, good and bad, and having regard to his or her behaviour during the marriage, reasonably be expected to live with this respondent? It follows that if a respondent is seeking to resist a petition on the first ground on which the husband in this case relies, he must in his answer plead and in his evidence establish the characteristics, faults, attributes, personality and behaviour on the part of the petitioner on which he relies. Then, if I may give a few examples, it seems to me that a violent petitioner can reasonably be expected to live with a violent respondent; a petitioner who is addicted to drink can reasonably be expected to live with a respondent similarly addicted; a taciturn and morose spouse can reasonably be expected to live with a taciturn and morose partner; a flirtatious husband can reasonably be expected to live with a wife who is equally susceptible to the attractions of the opposite sex; and if each is equally bad, at any rate in similar respects, each can reasonably be expected to live with the other. This conclusion seems to me to be consonant with what have been said to be the objects of the 1969 legislation, which are not, in my view, simply to make divorce easier but, to quote from one source¹:

‘... (i) To buttress, rather than to undermine the stability of marriage; and (ii) When, regrettably, a marriage has irretrievably broken down, to enable the empty legal shell to be destroyed with the maximum fairness, and the minimum bitterness, distress and humiliation.’

I must therefore seek to apply that construction of the Act to the facts of this case. As I have indicated, it can be said of this petitioner that she was prepared to take advantage of the good and to enjoy prosperity, but has not been able to tolerate the disadvantages of the bad and of adversity. In general it seems to me this also is a consideration to be taken into account when answering the question whether a petitioner can reasonably be expected to live with a respondent. However, apart from my clear impression that the wife showed a lack of understanding of the problems of the husband, I have reached the conclusion that she has not shown herself to be of such a character and personality and her behaviour has not been such that I can conclude that she can reasonably be expected to live with the husband. I therefore hold that the wife has satisfied the court of the fact in relation to this marriage set out in s 2 (1) (b) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969.

I turn therefore to the husband's second submission and ask myself the question: am I satisfied on all the evidence that the marriage has not broken down irretrievably? The husband says, and undoubtedly believes, that what is involved is a temporary difficulty attributable partly to his health and partly to his unemployment, and that if the marriage has broken down, nevertheless it has not broken down irretrievably. The wife is adamant that the marriage is at an end and states with force and conviction, both through her counsel and in the witness box, that there is no possibility of her contemplating living with the husband as his wife. As a matter of law, I do not think that this is sufficient, because if both parties are agreed that the marriage has not broken down irretrievably, then the question cannot arise for determination. The only circumstances in which the court will have to decide under s 2 (3) of the 1969 Act whether the marriage has broken down irretrievably must be when one of the spouses is asserting the affirmative of that proposition and the other is asserting the negative. Simple assertion either way, it seems to me, cannot suffice. What I have to do is to examine the whole of the evidence placed before me, including and giving not inconsiderable weight to the assertions of the parties, and make up my mind, quite generally, whether it can be said that in spite of the behaviour of the husband, and the reaction to that behaviour of the wife, the marriage has not broken down irretrievably. In my opinion, in performing that general exercise on a survey of the evidence, only a general answer is appropriate and no useful purpose would be served by seeking to place quantitative weight on one consideration or another. Performing the best survey that I can of the evidence, and having regard to the personalities of the parties as displayed in the witness box, I have concluded that I cannot be satisfied on all the evidence that the marriage has not broken down irretrievably and accordingly I must pronounce a decree nisi.

Decree nisi.

Solicitors: Philip Conway, Thomas & Co (for the wife).

Alice Bloomfield Barrister.

¹ Law Commission Report: Reform of the Grounds of Divorce. The Field of Choice, para 15 (Cmdnd 3123)

Pheasant v Pheasant

FAMILY DIVISION

ORMROD J

29th, 30th NOVEMBER, 1st, 2nd, 10th DECEMBER 1971

- b Divorce – Behaviour of respondent – Behaviour such that petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with respondent – Reasonableness – Test to be applied – Breach of obligation – Whether reasonable to expect petitioner to put up with behaviour of respondent – Necessity for court to consider characteristics and behaviour of petitioner as well as of respondent – Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 2 (1) (b).

- c Divorce – Irretrievable breakdown of marriage – Proof – Date by which marriage had irretrievably broken down – Date of petition or date of hearing.

The husband left the wife and petitioned for divorce under s 2 (1) (b)^a of the Divorce Reform Act 1969. He alleged that she had not been able to give him the spontaneous, demonstrative affection which his nature demanded and for which he craved and that, in consequence, it was impossible for him to live with the wife any longer; accordingly he could not reasonably be expected to live with her and, therefore, the marriage had irretrievably broken down. The husband did not attempt to establish anything which could be regarded as a serious criticism of the wife's conduct or behaviour. In evidence the wife stated that she would welcome the husband's return and did not believe that the marriage had irretrievably broken down.

- e Held – The husband was not entitled to a decree nisi for the following reasons—

(i) the test to be applied under s 2 (1) (b) was similar to that which was formerly used in relation to constructive desertion, although the problem was to be approached more from the point of view of a breach of obligation than in terms of the idea of the matrimonial offence; the issue to be considered was whether it was reasonable to expect the petitioner to put up with the behaviour of this respondent bearing in mind the characters of each, trying to be fair to both, and expecting neither heroic virtue nor selfless abnegation from either of them (see p 591 c and d, post);

- f (ii) there was nothing in the wife's behaviour which could be regarded as a breach on her part of any of the obligations of the married state or as effectively contributing to the break-up of the marriage (see p 591 e, post).

- g Per Ormrod J. In order to obtain a decree of divorce it is not essential for the petitioner to prove that the marriage had irretrievably broken down when the petition was filed; it is sufficient that it has irretrievably broken down at the date of the hearing of the suit (see p 589 b, post).

Notes

- h For proof that the respondent to a petition for divorce has behaved in such a way that the petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with the respondent, see Supplement to 12 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) para 437A, 3.

For the Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 2, see Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn), 1969 vol, p 1328.

Cases referred to in judgment

- j Ash v Ash, p 582 ante, [1972] 2 WLR 347.

- a Section 2 (1), so far as material, provides: 'The court hearing a petition for divorce shall not hold the marriage to have broken down irretrievably unless the petitioner satisfies the court of one or more of the following facts, that is to say—... (b) that the respondent has behaved in such a way that the petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with the respondent ...'

Goodrich v Goodrich [1971] 2 All ER 1340, [1971] 1 WLR 1142.

Lissack v Lissack [1950] 2 All ER 233, [1951] P 1, 114 JP 393, 27 Digest (Repl) 311, 2587.

Cases also cited

Gollins v Gollins [1963] 2 All ER 966, [1964] AC 644.

Squire v Squire [1948] 2 All ER 51, [1949] P 51.

Petition

The husband petitioned for a decree of divorce under s 2 (1) (b) of the Divorce Reform Act 1969. By her answer the wife denied that she had behaved in such a way that the husband could not reasonably be expected to live with her and prayed, inter alia, that the husband's petition be dismissed. The facts are set out in the judgment.

C Trotter for the husband.

Adrianne Uziell-Hamilton for the wife.

Cur adv vult

10th December. ORMROD J read the following judgment. In this case, the husband, John Pheasant, is petitioning for divorce from his wife, Iris Audrey Pheasant. In accordance with the Divorce Reform Act 1969, s 1, the ground on which the petition is based is that the marriage has irretrievably broken down. But the husband is also obliged to comply with s 2 (1), which requires him to establish at least one of the five 'facts' specified therein. He has set out to prove the 'fact' set out in sub-para (b), namely, 'that the respondent has behaved in such a way that the petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with the respondent'. None of the remaining 'facts' is applicable in any way to this case. The husband was unable to establish, indeed in fairness to him it should be made clear that he did not attempt to establish, anything which could be regarded as a serious criticism of the wife's conduct or behaviour. His case, quite simply is that she has not been able to give him the spontaneous, demonstrative affection which he says that his nature demands and for which he craves. In these circumstances he says that it is impossible for him to live with the wife any longer, that in consequence he cannot reasonably be expected to live with her, and that therefore the marriage has irretrievably broken down. The wife by her answer has put in issue the specific facts (insofar as there are any) alleged in the petition and has said in evidence that she would welcome his return and does not believe that the marriage has irretrievably broken down. Her evidence and his admissions strongly suggest that the breakdown had not become irretrievable on 27th May 1971, the date on which the petition was filed; in the witness box she asserted that she thought it quite possible that he would still change his mind.

So brief a summary cannot, of course, do full justice to the husband's case but it brings out the two points of law with which I must deal, namely, the proper construction of s 2 (1) (b) and the date on which irretrievability must be established.

It will be convenient to dispose of the second point first. At first sight the wording of s 1 suggests that the husband must establish irretrievable breakdown at the date when the proceedings are begun. The section reads as follows:

'After the commencement of this Act the sole ground on which a petition for divorce may be presented to the court by either party to a marriage shall be that the marriage has broken down irretrievably.'

But the Act contains in s 3 a number of important provisions relating to reconciliation which make it plain that the policy of the legislature is to encourage reconciliation as far as may be practicable. Section 3 (2) is particularly important because it gives a the court power to adjourn the proceedings at any stage to enable attempts at reconciliation to be made. But if the petitioner were to be required to prove 'irretrievability' at the date of the filing of the petition this subsection would be of little value, and moreover, petitioners would be discouraged by their legal advisers from making or accepting any overtures for reconciliation while the proceedings were pending. Such a result would clearly be contrary to the policy of the Act. At best it would b result in the farce of asking for leave to file a second petition bearing the date of the hearing of the suit. In my judgment, therefore, in spite of the wording of s 1, it is sufficient if the petitioner establishes that the breakdown has become irretrievable by the date of the hearing.

c Turning to the first and important point, s 2 (1) (b) must be considered in the light of the Act as a whole. Counsel for the husband has submitted that this Act with its companion, the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, has introduced an entirely new conceptual basis for divorce and matrimonial proceedings generally, and has, in consequence, swept away the old law completely, so completely that the court must be on its guard that it does not inadvertently permit some of the old rules and attitudes to creep back. He says that the court in considering d whether a decree of dissolution should be pronounced, is concerned only to consider whether the breakdown in the marriage is irretrievable and, in the words quoted by Bagnall J in *Ash v Ash*¹, 'to enable the empty legal shell to be destroyed with the maximum of fairness, and the minimum bitterness, distress and humiliation'. There is a great deal of force in this submission but it must not be overstated for Parliament has not yet completely assimilated the law relating to marriage with the law of partnership. There are important differences both in the provisions for dissolution and for dealing with the financial and property issues arising from the dissolution.
e While every effort has been made in s 5 of the 1970 Act to displace conduct of the parties from its hitherto pre-eminent position, it is still a factor, and a factor which is likely to continue to influence decisions until the attitudes of the public and their advisers and of those who administer the law change.

f The Divorce Reform Act 1969 itself in s 2 (1) imposes on the court a species of restriction almost, if not absolutely, unique, which in itself demonstrates that the main submission of counsel for the husband requires modification. Having established by s 1, that the only ground on which a marriage may be dissolved is 'that the marriage has broken down irretrievably', the Act goes on to provide in s 2 (1) that the court 'shall not hold the marriage to have broken down irretrievably unless the petitioner satisfies the court of one or more of the following facts'. Thereafter g the well-known five 'facts' are defined. The question of irretrievable breakdown has not, therefore, been left at large for the court to determine, no doubt because it was realised that, except in the clearest cases, this is not a justiciable issue. Without guidelines the court has no means of judging what one person, let alone two, may decide to do in the future in relation to their marriage if there is any doubt about it. Section 2 (1) is designed to provide the guidelines and this it does by defining the h five essential 'facts' or situations from which alone the court may infer that the breakdown is irretrievable. These five facts fall into two groups. Three of them rest on separation for periods of years but in the remaining two separation is not an essential element. Sub-paragraphs (c) and (d) demand two years' separation coupled with either desertion or consent to the dissolution of the marriage; sub-para (e) demands five years' separation, simpliciter. On any view these are stringent i tests of the irretrievable character of the breakdown, and proof of these 'facts' must inevitably raise a very strong inference of irretrievable breakdown. Sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) are presumably intended to provide for those spouses who need relief before they have been separated for a period of years. Separation is, undoubtedly, the best evidence of breakdown, and the passing of time the most reliable indication that it is irretrievable. Where these are absent other criteria have to be devised which should be as reliable as possible in the circumstances. In sub-para (a) the criterion is adultery coupled with the assertion that the petitioner finds it intolerable to live with the respondent. This provides a reasonably secure basis for the inference that the breakdown is irretrievable. Each of these four sub-paras establishes tests which are essentially objective in character although the element of intolerability in sub-para (a) is recognised to be inescapably subjective (*Goodrich v Goodrich*²). On the other hand a petitioner is unlikely to present or proceed with a petition under this sub-paragraph if, from his or her point of view, the matrimonial relationship has not come finally to an end. Sub-paragraph (b) is quite different. It obviously requires the court to make a value judgment about the behaviour of the respondent and its effect on the petitioner. The wording is ambiguous in several respects. It could be argued that 'expected' is used in an anticipatory sense, meaning that the court should consider the conduct of the respondent and decide whether there is a reasonable prospect of the petitioner continuing to live with or return to the respondent. This construction would be consistent with the emphasis in the Act on irretrievability but it would require the court to make a decision at large about the future intentions and actions of the parties. It would also make the other four tests superfluous.

Counsel for the husband has not contended for this construction and concedes that the word 'expected' is used in its other sense, which approximates to 'required'. He submits that the matter should be approached very largely, if not entirely, from the point of view of the husband, and that the court should consider, in effect, whether it is reasonable to require the husband to go on living with the wife, having regard to her behaviour, giving that word its widest meaning and including both acts and omissions. This is sometimes called the subjective, in contrast to the objective, approach, but so stated the antithesis is, in my opinion, misleading. In matrimonial cases there are two subjects to be considered, and, moreover, two subjects whose personalities are constantly interacting with one another throughout their relationship.

In my judgment, this construction is untenable for several reasons. It places the primary emphasis on the petitioner and his personal idiosyncracies, whereas the sub-paragraph clearly places the primary emphasis on the behaviour of the respondent. A respondent whose behaviour is beyond reproach by any standards other than the petitioner's would be liable to be divorced without any possibility of resistance except to rely on s 2 (1) and try to show that the marriage has not finally broken down. Counsel for the husband faces this and says that under the modern law the court is concerned only to destroy empty shells. Had this been the intention of the Act, sub-para (b) need only have provided that a decree could be granted if the court is satisfied that the petitioner finds life with the respondent unbearable. Once again the other four sub-paragraphs would be surplusage and the court would be faced with an untriable issue. The experience of this particular trial, which proceeded on the assumption of counsel for the husband, should have convinced any doubters of the utter impracticability of such an enquiry. In the end it became reduced to a series of almost hysterical assertions by the husband and calm rebuttals by the wife. So far from saving 'bitterness, distress and humiliation' it produced a degree of humiliation in the husband which is unique in my experience.

There is another and, in my judgment, conclusive point. Sub-paragraph (b) must have a sensible relationship with sub-para (c). In the latter, the word 'desertion' appears. According to the ordinary rules of construction this word, which had an established legal meaning at the date when the 1969 Act was passed, must be assumed to have the same meaning in this Act unless a contrary intention can be gathered from the statute itself. I can find no such indication. Desertion means in law separation without consent and without just cause. In a suit based on sub-para (c) a respondent therefore might, although it is not very likely, set up just a cause by way of answer. To this extent, at least, the old law has been imported into the new, notwithstanding the change in the conceptual basis of divorce.

In the present case the husband, having left the wife, is undoubtedly in desertion unless he can establish just cause. On the evidence which he has given he could not begin to make out a case under the old law, and, even if the meaning of just cause is to be modified in the new law, he could only succeed if the concept of desertion has ceased to have any meaning. If counsel for the husband's submission is right the absurd result would be reached that a petitioner, unquestionably in desertion, would still be able to say that he could not reasonably be expected to live with his wife.

b All these considerations point to only one conclusion, namely, that the test to be applied under sub-para (b) is closely similar to, but not necessarily identical with, that which was formerly used in relation to constructive desertion. I would not wish to see carried over into the new law all the technicalities which accumulated round the idea of constructive desertion but rather to use the broader approach indicated by Pearce J in *Lissack v Lissack*³ and consider whether it is reasonable to expect this petitioner to put up with the behaviour of this respondent bearing in mind the characters and the difficulties of each of them, trying to be fair to both of them, and expecting neither heroic virtue nor selfless abnegation from either. It would be consistent with the spirit of the new legislation if this problem were now to be approached more from the point of view of breach of obligation than in terms of the now out-moded idea of the matrimonial offence. It must also be borne in mind that the husband is still free to make his own decision whether to live with the wife or otherwise. The court is only concerned with the next stage, i.e. whether he is entitled to have his marriage dissolved.

c Applying this test to the facts of the present case I have no hesitation in holding that there is nothing in the wife's behaviour which could be regarded as a breach on her part of any of the obligations of the married state or as effectively contributing to the break-up of the marriage. This, in my opinion, has been caused, if his evidence be true, by a change in the personality of the husband and the development in him of some psychoneurotic condition which has made him totally egocentric and obsessed with grievances. I do not intend, in the husband's own interests, to summarise the evidence in this case. I have no wish to add to his humiliations by exposing them to a wider audience and no useful purpose will be served in doing so. Suffice it to say that where their evidence differs I prefer the evidence of the wife. I am satisfied that she has shown him all the affection which she can and that she is sincere in saying that she would welcome him back. I do not think there is anything in the differences which arose between them in relation to the adopted son, who was born to her in her former marriage, which was in any way unusual. Most parents must have experienced similar difficulties in dealing with their teenage and now adult children. Similarly, the evidence in relation to the adoption, which did not take place until the son was 17 years old, shows how far both he and his mother were prepared to go to alleviate the husband's anxieties. I am by no means sure that she is not right in her suspicions that there may be another woman in the background. If this is not the case, then I agree with the husband's mother that he is in an unstable emotional condition as a result of which he seems quite unable at present to adopt a rational approach to his matrimonial difficulties; or to take advice or consult those who might help him. I hope that even at this late stage and having had the traumatic experience of exposing his unhappiness in court he will reconsider his attitude towards his wife and adopted son, and perhaps, at least try to see whether a psychiatrist or marriage guidance counsellor can help him to understand his own difficulties.

Finally, had it been necessary to consider s 2 (3) I would have hesitated, on the unusual facts of this case, to hold that this marriage has, in fact, irretrievably broken down. a Petition dismissed.

Solicitors: Ronald A Prior (for the husband); Oliver O Fisher & Co (for the wife). b

Alice Bloomfield Barrister.

Lusternik v Lusternik (legal personal representative of Jacob (otherwise Jakubas) Lusternik (deceased)) c

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
DAVIES, KARMINSKI AND CAIRNS LJJ
10th, 11th NOVEMBER 1971 d

Divorce – Financial provision – Deceased former spouse – Maintenance for surviving former spouse out of deceased's estate – Failure of deceased to make reasonable provision for former spouse – Value of estate at death and at date of award – Relevance of change in value in assessing award – Backdating of award – Proceedings extending over four years – Not necessary that award should be backdated to date of applicant's summons – Avoidance of backdating to such an extent that effect to add substantial lump sum order to award – Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, s 26. e

In April 1947 the applicant married the deceased, who had one daughter, the respondent. The applicant obtained a decree absolute of divorce from the deceased on the grounds of cruelty in August 1951. There were no children of the marriage. In November 1951 the applicant obtained an order for maintenance at the rate of £6 a week less tax, probably less than she would have been awarded but for untrue information given by the deceased at the time. She continued to have business and social relations with him, however, and was paid the maintenance and received some not very substantial additional benefit from him. In December 1960 the deceased made a will giving his shares in a company to the applicant for life and directing that she should become a director. He revoked that provision however by a codicil made six weeks before his death. The deceased died in December 1964, aged 81. He left a legacy of £500 to the applicant, who was then aged 59. He left a further legacy of £500 and a residuary legacy to the respondent, his executrix. In 1967 (an extension of time having been granted) the applicant applied for an order for additional financial provision out of the estate under s 26^a of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965. The net value of the estate, after deduction of all expenses, debts, liabilities, estate duty and the two legacies, was about £10,000. The estate consisted almost entirely of shares in two property companies, one with an assets valuation of £25,000, of which the estate owned 49 per cent and the respondent 51 per cent in her own right, and the second with an assets valuation of £8,500 of which the estate owned 51 per cent. The shares had produced little or nothing in the way of dividends. The respondent was self-supporting. At the time of her application the applicant was earning £12 a week as a waitress but since 1968 she had been unable to work owing to ill health. At the date of her appeal on the application she was 65 years of age and receiving retirement pension and supplementary allowance totalling £9 12s a f
g
h
j

^a Section 26, so far as material, is set out at p 595 b to j post

a week. Her rent was £3 17s per week including light and heat, but she sometimes sublet a furnished room for £3 10s a week (including light and heat). A medical report said she would enjoy better health if in a healthier district. The applicant said that her existing flat was unbearable because of traffic noise and the misbehaviour of other tenants in the block. She wanted a flat at Brighton costing £12.50 a week. The trial judge made an order for payment to the applicant of £6 per week backdated to February 1970, i.e. a year before the matter first came before the court, but enforcement of the arrears was postponed for six months. On appeal the applicant contended that the award should be at the rate of not less than £12 a week and should be backdated to the death of the deceased.

Held – The order made by the judge should be varied to the extent of substituting £8 for £6 per week on the following basis—

(i) although in deciding whether the deceased had made reasonable provision for the survivor the value of the estate at the date of death was the criterion, in considering what sum to award the survivor it was proper to take into account, as a relevant matter under s 26 (4) (d) of the 1965 Act, the value of the net estate not only at the date of death but also at the date when the award was made, for it would be wrong for the court to blind itself to the fact that, if such were the case, the sum available in the estate was far greater or far less than at the date of death (see p 597 f to h and p 598 g, post); Dun v Dun [1959] 2 All ER 134 considered;

(ii) as a matter of fairness between the applicant and the respondent, the only parties concerned, it was reasonable that the applicant should have more than a figure representing the income of half the estate and it was reasonable that she should have rather more than was awarded her as maintenance in 1951 (see p 598 a and g, post);

(iii) there was no rule that prima facie an award to a survivor should be backdated to the date of death, the matter being one for the discretion of the court; an order should not be backdated to a date earlier than that of the applicant's summons in the absence of very special circumstances; nor would it be appropriate to backdate it to that date where proceedings had extended over some four years, for the court should guard against backdating to such an extent as in effect to add a lump sum order which was substantial in relation to the estate (see p 598 b to d and g, post); Askew v Askew [1961] 2 All ER 60 approved;

(iv) while backdating for two or two and a half years would have been appropriate if there had been no provision for the applicant in the will, taking into account her legacy of £500 the shorter period of a year as determined by the judge was proper; it would not be fair to the respondent to increase the total of £480 arrears calculated on that basis and allowance should be made for the interim payments already made (see p 598 e and g, post).

Notes

For maintenance from the estate of a deceased former spouse, see Supplement to 16 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) para 930A, and for cases on the subject, see Digest (Cont Vol C) 459, 5729fa-fb.

For the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, s 26, see 17 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 197.

Cases referred to in judgment

Askew v Askew [1961] 2 All ER 60, [1961] 1 WLR 725, Digest (Cont Vol A) 787, 5729b.
Dun v Dun [1959] 2 All ER 134, [1959] AC 272, [1959] 2 WLR 554, Digest (Cont Vol A) 573, *2628b.

Appeal

The applicant, Mona Lusternik, appealed against an order made by Hollings J in chambers on 28th May 1971, ordering that she should receive £6 a week maintenance net out of the estate of her deceased former husband and that the order should be backdated to 22nd February 1970 but that the accrued arrears should not be enforced for a period of six months. She sought an order that such larger sum as might be just should be substituted for the £6 and that the order should be backdated to 19th December 1964, the date of the deceased's death. The grounds of appeal were: (i) that in all the circumstances of the case bearing in mind the deceased's capital at the time of his death, his revocation of the earlier grant to the applicant by codicil just before his death, his conduct towards the applicant between the divorce and his death, the applicant's circumstances and the findings and recommendations in the reports of Mr Registrar Tickle dated 17th December 1970 and 11th May 1971 the judge should have awarded at least £12 a week less tax; and (ii) that the judge should have backdated the order he made to the date of death, 19th December 1964, and was wrong to say on the evidence before him that had he done so that would have resulted in an imprudent realisation of the assets of the estate. The facts are set out in the judgment of Cairns LJ.

D P F Wheatley for the applicant.

Sheila Cameron for the respondent.

CAIRNS LJ delivered the first judgment at the invitation of Davies LJ. This is an appeal against a judgment of Hollings J given on 28th May 1971 in proceedings under s 26 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965. The appeal is brought by leave of the learned judge. Section 26 is the section which enables a woman whose marriage has been dissolved and whose husband has died to apply for financial provision from his estate. Here the applicant succeeded in getting an order for such provision but she is not satisfied with the amount or the terms and appeals for a more favourable order.

The history of the matter, quite briefly, is as follows. On 26th April 1947 the applicant was married to a man who had been previously married and had one daughter. The marriage between the applicant and that man was dissolved on the applicant's petition on the ground of cruelty, the decree being made absolute on 9th August 1951. There were no children of that marriage. In November 1951 an order was made in favour of the applicant for maintenance at the rate of £6 a week less tax. Such maintenance was paid up to the death of the former husband, which took place on 19th December 1964, when he was 81 and the applicant was 59 years of age. By his will he left her a legacy of £500, which has been paid. The executrix, who proved the will, was the daughter of the deceased husband, and she is also the residuary legatee under the will and the respondent in these proceedings. The applicant was out of time in making her application but the time was extended, without opposition from the respondent, by Sir Jocelyn Simon P.

The application first came before Mr Registrar Tickle, who made a report on 17th December 1970, recommending that periodical payments should be made by the respondent to the applicant at the rate of £7 10s a week, the order to be backdated for a year. After that the respondent produced some fresh documents and the matter came before Sir Jocelyn Simon P, who remitted it to the registrar with directions for the applicant to answer a questionnaire and to attend for cross-examination. There was a further hearing before the registrar when the applicant was cross-examined at considerable length. In a second report made on 11th May 1971, the registrar adhered to his previous recommendations except that he recommended that the order should be backdated to a year before Sir Jocelyn Simon P was first seised of the matter: that would mean that it would be backdated to 22nd February 1970.

After that the matter was restored before Hollings J at the direction of Sir Jocelyn Simon P. He considered the two reports of the registrar; he heard arguments of counsel; on 28th May 1971 he made the order which is now appealed against and a which followed the recommendations of the registrar except that the learned judge substituted £6 a week for the recommended £7 10s; and he directed that the accrued arrears should not be enforced for six months from the date of his order. Now, by a notice of appeal, the applicant contends that the award should be at the rate of not less than £12 a week and should be backdated to the death of the former husband (to whom I will refer hereafter as 'the deceased').

b The provisions of s 26 of the 1965 Act are as follows:

c '(1) Where after 31st December 1958 a person dies domiciled in England and is survived by a former spouse of his or hers (hereafter in this section referred to as "the survivor") who has not remarried, the survivor may [and then I read the section as subsequently amended] apply to the court for an order under this section on the ground that the deceased has not made reasonable provision for the survivor's maintenance after the deceased's death. An application under this section shall not, except with the permission of the court, be made after the end of the period of six months from the date on which representation in regard to the estate of the deceased is first taken out.

d '(2) If on an application under this section the court is satisfied—(a) that it would have been reasonable for the deceased to make provision for the survivor's maintenance; and (b) that the deceased has made no provision, or has not made reasonable provision, for the survivor's maintenance, the court may order that such reasonable provision for the survivor's maintenance as the court thinks fit shall be made out of the net estate of the deceased, subject to such conditions or restrictions (if any) as the court may impose.

e '(3) Where the court makes an order under this section requiring provision to be made for the maintenance of the survivor, the order shall require that provision to be made by way of periodical payments terminating not later than the survivor's death and, if the survivor remarries, not later than the remarriage. [Then there is a provision for making in certain circumstances a lump sum payment, which admittedly is not applicable in this case.]

f '(4) On an application under this section the court shall have regard—(a) to the past, present or future capital of the survivor and to any income of the survivor from any source; (b) to the survivor's conduct in relation to the deceased and otherwise; (c) to any application made or deemed to be made by the survivor during the lifetime of the deceased—(i) where the survivor is a former wife of the deceased, for such an order as is mentioned in section 16 (1) of this Act . . .'

g That is the relevant section, and is the section providing for maintenance to be paid by a husband to a wife after a divorce decree has been made absolute. Then, leaving out one paragraph which is irrelevant, the subsection goes on:

h ' . . . and to the order (if any) made on any such application [that in this case is, of course, an order for maintenance at the rate of £6 a week; and the rest of that paragraph is not relevant;] (d) to any other matter or thing which, in the circumstances of the case, the court may consider relevant or material in relation to the survivor, to persons interested in the estate of the deceased, or otherwise.

i '(5) In determining whether, and in what way, and as from what date, provision for maintenance ought to be made by an order under this section, the court shall have regard to the nature of the property representing the net estate of the deceased and shall not order any such provision to be made as would necessitate a realisation that would be imprudent having regard to the interests of the dependants of the deceased, of the survivor, and of the persons who apart from the order would be entitled to that property.'

Then sub-s (6) contains certain definitions, of which the material one is the definition of 'net estate', which is defined by a rather complicated process of cross-reference, and when the cross-reference is made one finds that 'net estate' means¹:

'all the property of which a deceased person had power to dispose by his will (otherwise than by virtue of a special power of appointment) less the amount of his funeral, testamentary and administration expenses, debts and liabilities and estate duty payable out of his estate on his death'.

Apart from the matters already recited, the main facts taken into account by the learned judge in making his order were these. The value of the net estate, according to the definition which I have just read, at the time of the death of the deceased was £11,608. Besides the legacy to the applicant there was another legacy outstanding of £500, so that the capital available without disturbing these legacies was just about £10,000. The principal assets—almost the sole assets—were shares in two companies, one called J L & D K Properties Ltd and the other called Corta Ltd. They were both property companies. The estate of the deceased holds 49 per cent of the shares in J L & D K Properties Ltd and the respondent now holds the other 51 per cent of those shares personally in her own right. In Corta Ltd, the estate has 51 per cent of the shares. On an assets valuation as estimated by the directors of the company, J L & D K Properties Ltd is now worth about £25,000 and the Corta company about £8,500. The shares of the companies are not saleable on the market, although in fact it was found possible to raise more than £3,000 from the assets of J L & D K Properties Ltd in order to pay part of the estate duty and administration expenses. There is still outstanding to be paid out of the estate £4,800 in respect of the remainder of the estate duty, certain debts, and the outstanding legacy of £500. The shares in these two companies have produced little or nothing in the way of dividend.

The deceased made a will on 13th December 1960, and by it he gave the income of his shares in Corta Ltd to the applicant for life and directed that she should become a director of that company. This provision, however, was revoked by a codicil made about six weeks before his death.

Hollings J was satisfied that at the time of the hearing the applicant's position was a sad one, as described in two paragraphs, one in each of the reports of the registrar, which I will read. The first of these reads as follows:

'At the time of his death the Deceased was aged 81; his former wife was then 59. In 1967 when she issued her originating summons she was working as a waitress earning £12 per week but since 1968 she has been unable to work on the grounds of ill-health. She is now 65 years of age and receives basic Retirement Pension of £4. 1. 0 per week and a Supplementary Allowance of £5. 11. 0, a total gross income of £9. 12. 0 per week. Her rent is £3. 17. 4 per week but from time to time she sublets a furnished room for £3. 10. 0 per week (inclusive of light and heat). A medical report . . . shows that she is suffering from [a certain ailment] and would enjoy better health if she could move to a healthier district than the area in which she now lives.'

The other paragraph is the last paragraph of the second report, and the material part of it is as follows:

'Her present accommodation was stated by her to be unbearable because of the noise from passing motor traffic and the alleged mis-behaviour of other tenants in the block of flats. She wants a flat at Brighton, which she tells me would cost about £12.50 per week to rent.'

Now, although the marriage lasted only four years, from 1947 to 1951, the applicant

¹ As defined in s 5 (1) of the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act 1938, as amended

a and the deceased continued to have business and social associations with each other right up to the date of his death. She did receive some financial benefit from him b beyond the £6 a week maintenance, but the amount thereof was not really very substantial. Owing to untrue information which had been given by the deceased in 1951, at the time of the maintenance application, about his relations with Corta Ltd, the maintenance order was probably less than it would have been if he had c been completely frank. The respondent is a lady who is self-supporting, and no question arises of comparative hardship as between her and the applicant. It is, however, necessary that her interests as residuary legatee should be respected.

The learned judge reached these conclusions. At the date of the death of the deceased the applicant was no better off than during his lifetime and could reasonably expect continued provision by his will; there was no evidence of any change in the respective means of the two of them leading to the change effected by the codicil executed shortly before the death. The judge was satisfied that it would have been reasonable for the deceased to make some further provision for the applicant by his will, and he thought that it would be reasonable to order that she should receive £6 a week from the estate, and that the order should be backdated to the extent recomd mended by the registrar. The judge was satisfied that the respondent could bring about the realisation of sufficient of the assets of the two companies to comply with such an order. But, bearing in mind the provisions of s 26 (5), he thought that immediate payment of the arrears should not be required and he therefore directed that enforcement thereof should be postponed for six months.

This court has heard most helpful arguments from counsel on both sides. With e regard to the weekly sum awarded, counsel for the applicant pointed out that the amount awarded by the learned judge was no more than was awarded for maintenance in 1951 at a time when the applicant had some earning capacity and when the court was misled to some extent as to the financial position of the deceased.
On the other side, counsel for the respondent contended that the amount of the net estate was such that it would be unfair to the respondent to award more than £6 a week to the applicant.

f In considering what sum it is reasonable to award, I am of opinion that it is relevant to take into account not only the value of the net estate at the date of death but also its value at the date when the award is made. *Dun v Dun*² is authority for the proposition that in deciding whether the deceased had made reasonable provision for the survivor it is the value at the date of the death that is the criterion. That is a Privy Council decision under a New South Wales Act, but I have no doubt that the same rule should be applied in relation to s 26 of the 1965 Act. When it comes, however, g to deciding how much it is reasonable to award to the survivor, it seems to me that it would be quite wrong for the court to blind itself to the fact—if it be a fact—that the sum available in the estate is either far greater or far less than the value of the estate at the date of death. I should consider this a relevant matter within s 26 (4) (d). At one stage I thought that this might make a considerable difference in judging how much should be awarded here; but counsel for the respondent has persuaded me that this is not so. Taking the only estimate of the 1971 values of the assets of the companies that was before the court, bearing in mind that the interest of the estate in each company is approximately 50 per cent, and taking account of the costs that would be incurred and the tax liability that would arise on realisation of the assets of the companies, I do not think it can be said that the capital that could be made available is in excess of about £10,000. Counsel for the respondent suggests that an award of £6 a week, representing approximately 6 per cent on half the total capital, is as much as could fairly be awarded to the applicant. Whether this was the way in which Hollings J arrived at his figure I do not know, because he has given no indication of how he did.

In my view it is reasonable that the applicant, as a matter of fairness between her and the respondent—and they are the only two people concerned—should have rather more than a figure representing the income of half the estate. I also think that, for the reasons advanced by counsel for the applicant it is reasonable that she should have rather more than was awarded to her as maintenance in 1951. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal to the extent of increasing the weekly payment from £6 a week to £8 a week.

As to the backdating, I do not accept the contention of counsel for the applicant that there is any rule that prima facie the payment should be backdated to the death. This was certainly not laid down as a rule in the case he cited, *Askew v Askew*³. There, Marshall J held that it was a matter of discretion in each case; and indeed I think that is the necessary result of the wording of the Act. When an applicant has not brought proceedings until several years after probate was granted, I should not, in the absence of very special circumstances, consider it right to backdate the order to a date earlier than that of the originating summons. And again where, as here, the proceedings have extended over some four years from the date of the originating summons to that of the order, I should not consider it right to backdate the order to the date of the summons unless it were shown that there had been some deliberate obstruction by the respondent in the course of the proceedings. One should, I think, guard against backdating the order for periodical payments to such an extent as in effect to add to it a lump sum order substantial in relation to the size of the estate. In this case, if there had been no provision at all for the applicant in the will, I should have been disposed to backdate the order for two years or perhaps two and a half years. But, taking account of her legacy of £500, I think that the registrar and the judge were right here in choosing a shorter period. By my reckoning, the arrears, calculated (now) at £8 a week and making allowance for the interim payments which were ordered and which I understand were made between February and May 1971, will be about £480, payable within a week or two, and I do not think it would be fair to the respondent to increase that sum.

I have arrived at this conclusion without the application of s 26 (5). I have not, therefore, had to consider whether the evidence was such as to show that to backdate the order further would involve 'imprudent realisation'. For the reasons I have given, I would allow the appeal, only to the extent of substituting £8 a week for £6 a week.

DAVIES LJ. I entirely agree, and cannot add anything to what Cairns LJ has said.

KARMINSKI LJ. I also agree.

Appeal allowed. Order below varied to the extent of substituting payment of £8 per week (less tax) for £6 per week. Existing arrears to be paid in accordance with direction of judge below. Further arrears (to be calculated, giving respondent credit in respect of payments made without subtracting tax) to be paid by 31st December 1971.

Solicitors: How, Davey & Lewis (for the applicant); Cox & Cardale (for the respondent).

F A Amies Esq Barrister.

3 [1961] 2 All ER 60, [1961] 1 WLR 725

R v Hartley

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

SACHS, ROSKILL LJ AND ACKNER J

18th NOVEMBER 1971

b Bankruptcy – Offences – Undischarged bankrupt obtaining credit – Obtaining credit to extent of £10 or upwards – Bankrupt obtaining credit on different occasions for sums under £10 – Total sum of credits obtained over £10 – Whether aggregation of smaller sums allowable – Bankruptcy Act 1914, s 155 (a).

c Bankruptcy – Offences – Undischarged bankrupt obtaining credit – Obtaining credit to extent of £10 or upwards – Indictment – Form – Particulars of offence – Accuracy regarding amount of credit obtained and time of alleged commission of offence.

The appellant opened an account at a bank without disclosing the fact that he was an undischarged bankrupt. Between May and October 1969 his overdraft at the bank gradually mounted until on 27th October it stood at £451. The majority of the cheques issued by the appellant and met by the bank during that period were for sums under £10. The last withdrawal was made about 10th October. The appellant also took a furnished room without disclosing to the landlords that he was an undischarged bankrupt, and paid a deposit of £10 in respect of certain electricity, telephone and dilapidation charges for which he was potentially liable. He fell into substantial arrears with the rent of eight guineas a week, and was given notice to quit. On 30th January 1970 when the notice took effect he was £64 in arrears with the rent. On 18th March he paid £50 to the landlords. When he vacated the room on 25th March, his liabilities amounted to £14 for arrears of rent and £76 for mesne profits. He was charged with two offences under s 155 (a)^a of the Bankruptcy Act 1914: count 1 alleged that on or about 27th October 1969 he obtained credit to the extent of £451 from the bank without disclosing that he was an undischarged bankrupt, and count 2 alleged that on or about 27th March 1970 he likewise obtained credit to the extent of £81 from his landlords. He was convicted. On appeal he contended, inter alia, (i) that several separate obtainings of credit could not be aggregated so as to amount to one obtaining of credit for the purpose of an offence under s 155 (a) of the 1914 Act, so that on both counts 1 and 2 there should have been no aggregation; (ii) that since the last of the cheques had been drawn on 10th October when the amount of the overdraft was slightly less than £451, the references to 'on or about 27th October', and '£451' in count 1 of the indictment were inaccurate and fatal; (iii) that mesne profits could not be the subject of an obtaining by credit, and (iv) that, excluding mesne profits, his indebtedness on or about 27th March was less than £10 since the £10 deposit paid to the landlords should have been taken into account.

h Held – The appeal would be dismissed for the following reasons—

(i) in order to support a charge under s 155 (a) of the Act, it was not necessary that the credit given to a person who failed to disclose his bankruptcy should have been in excess of £10 on each occasion when credit was obtained, provided that the total credit obtained by that person was in excess of £10; the offence was committed once the figure of £10 was reached, albeit by aggregating a series of smaller sums; the offence was an absolute one and any subsequent payments reducing the indebtedness might go in mitigation but could not provide a defence (see p 602 f to h post); principle stated in Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice, 37th Edn, 1969, at para 3684 approved;

(ii) where the words 'on or about the date' were used in an indictment then, provided that the offence was shown to have been committed within some period that had a reasonable approximation to the date mentioned in the indictment, the fact that the date was not correctly stated did not preclude a verdict of guilty (see p 603 b and c, post);

^a Section 155, so far as material, is set out at p 602 b, post

(iii) although it was desirable that in a count on an indictment the full amount of the credit obtained should be stated with accuracy, as the offence under s 155 (a) was of obtaining credit to an extent of £10 or more, a count which put the indebtedness at a greater sum than that actually obtained did not preclude a verdict of guilty (see p 602 j to p 603 a, post);

(iv) without taking into account mesne profits, the appellant's indebtedness on or about 27th March was in excess of £10 since the £10 deposit went against electricity, telephone and maintenance and not against rent (see p 603 d, post).

Quaere. Whether mesne profits can form a valid item in an account when the charge is one of obtaining credit under s 155 (a) of the 1914 Act (see p 603 e and f, post).

Observations on the form of indictment in charges under s 155 (a) (see p 603 f and g, post).

Notes

For obtaining credit when an undischarged bankrupt, see 2 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 630, 631, para 1252 (17), and for cases on the subject, see 5 Digest (Repl) 1129, 1130, 9098-9107.

For references to place, time, etc, in indictments, see 10 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 387, 388, para 702, and for a case on the subject, see 14 Digest (Repl) 246, 2118.

For the Bankruptcy Act 1914, s 155, see 3 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 154.

Cases referred to in judgment

R v Juby (1886) 55 LT 788, 51 JP 310, 16 Cox CC 160, 5 Digest (Repl) 1129, 9099.

R v Salter [1968] 2 All ER 951, [1968] 2 QB 793, [1968] 3 WLR 39, 52 Cr App Rep 549, Digest (Cont Vol C) 51, 9115b.

R v Smith (1915) 11 Cr App Rep 81, 5 Digest (Repl) 1130, 9105.

Cases also cited

Allard v Regem (1949) 94 Can Crim Cas 74.

Fisher v Raven [1963] 2 All ER 389, [1964] AC 210.

R v Peters (1886) 16 Cox CC 636.

Appeal

This was an appeal by Philip Gamble Hartley against his conviction on 9th March 1971 at Inner London Quarter Sessions before the deputy chairman (his Honour Judge Llewellyn) and a jury on two counts of obtaining credit as an undischarged bankrupt contrary to s 155 (a) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914. On count 1 the appellant was charged with obtaining credit while being bankrupt, in that on or about 27th October 1969 in the Inner London Area of Greater London, being an undischarged bankrupt, he obtained credit to the extent of £451 13s 9d from Lloyds Bank Ltd without informing the bank that he was then an undischarged bankrupt. On count 2 the appellant was charged with obtaining credit on or about 27th March 1970 to the extent of £81 5s 4d from Artillery Mansions Ltd in a like manner. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

John Mullick for the appellant.

Jean Southworth for the Crown.

SACHS LJ delivered the judgment of the court. On 9th March 1971 at Inner London Quarter Sessions before a deputy chairman the appellant was convicted of being a bankrupt obtaining credit in excess of £10 on two counts. He was thereupon a sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment on each count concurrent. In addition so much of two suspended sentences as totalled six months' imprisonment was ordered to take effect consecutively. The result was that as from 9th March 1971 the order of the court was that he was to undergo 18 months' imprisonment in all. The appellant now appeals against conviction by leave of the single judge, his application for leave to appeal against sentence having lapsed.

b The appellant is a man of some 60 years of age, of obviously good intelligence, and someone who has been a member of the Stock Exchange for some seven years, 1954 to 1961. There is no dispute but that the appellant was adjudged bankrupt in January 1963 and that he had never obtained a discharge from the bankruptcy. There was also no dispute as regards either count but that the appellant at no time disclosed to the persons involved that he was such an undischarged bankrupt. The first of these two counts related to an obtaining of credit from Lloyds Bank Ltd c which was alleged to be a credit to the extent of £451 and to have been obtained on or about 27th October 1969. That sum was the total amount of the overdraft at the bank as it stood in their accounts on the stated date; it had gradually been built up between May 1969 (shortly after he opened the account) and 27th October. The bulk of the cheques issued by the appellant and met by the bank were for sums d under £10, although some exceeded £10. As regards that count, the appellant at trial put forward a defence which was negatived by the jury and which has not been pursued in this court. That defence was to the effect that Lloyds Bank Ltd had agreed that they were to look for payment of any overdraft not to the appellant but to his employers, the Lafarge Cement Co Ltd. No document of any sort was produced from Lafarge Cement Co Ltd and there is no need to refer to that defence again.

e Next it is convenient to refer to the second count and its constituent parts. That count was laid—

‘ . . . being an undischarged bankrupt you obtained credit to the extent of £81. 5s. 4d. . . . without informing . . . Artillery Mansions Limited that you were then an undischarged bankrupt.’

f The facts which gave rise to this count were that the appellant obtained from Artillery Mansions Ltd a tenancy of a furnished room at eight guineas a week, undertaking also to pay for electricity and telephone charges, and to be responsible for certain dilapidations. In respect of the potential liabilities for electricity telephone and dilapidations he paid a deposit of £10. That tenancy commenced on 4th April 1969, but by October 1969 the appellant had fallen into substantial arrears. On 31st g December 1969 he was served with a formal notice to quit on 30th January 1970 and eventually vacated the room on 25th March 1970. As from 30th January 1970 his liability in respect of that room was thus for mesne profits and not for rent. The arrears of rent by 30th January 1970 were such that on 12th March, leaving out any question of mesne profits and giving all appropriate credits, he was in arrears to the extent of £63 17s 4d. About 18th March he paid a sum of £50; so on the date h referred to in the indictment, 27th March, his liability was for £13 17s 4d, again leaving out the question of mesne profits, which by then amounted to £76 4s.

Those being in essence the facts, it is convenient now to turn to the grounds of appeal. As regards the Lloyds Bank count, two points were taken: first, that having regard to the terms of s 155 (a) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 it was wrong of the learned deputy chairman to direct the jury to take into account the aggregate of the sums i for which the cheques were drawn, and that the proper course was to look at each cheque separately. In other words, his contention was that there can be no aggregation. His second point was that the indictment bore the wrong date in the particulars—the reference to ‘on or about the 27th October’ was said to be inaccurate and fatal. For that purpose counsel for the appellant referred to the details of the account and endeavoured to show that the last of the relevant cheques drawn had been presented somewhere in the region of 10th October and that on that date the sum of the overdraft was slightly less than the £451 mentioned in the indictment. a

As regards the second count, the contentions for the appellant were these: first, that mesne profits cannot be the subject of an obtaining by credit; secondly, that here again there could be no aggregation; and, thirdly, as in the case of the first count, if one looked at the date of 27th March and excluded mesne profits, the indebtedness on that particular date was less than £10. At this stage it is convenient to note that s 155 provides: b

'Where an undischarged bankrupt—(a) either alone or jointly with any other person obtains credit to the extent of ten pounds or upwards from any person without informing that person that he is an undischarged bankrupt; . . . he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.'

Taking first the aggregation point, it was contended on behalf of the appellant, as already indicated, that one can only look at the amount of credit obtained on the particular day that a relevant amount comes into the account. It was his contention that, for instance, if an undischarged bankrupt having managed to open an account at a London store went into that store on Monday and obtained credit for £9 for some articles, Tuesday for another £9 for another article and so on on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, that although on the fifth day the account at that store amounted to £45, that would be no offence under s 155 (a). Of course, if that were to be the law and if that was the correct interpretation of s 155 (a), it would provide very limited protection to the store owner, and it would contravene the general intent of that series of sections and subsections of the Bankruptcy Act 1914, the purpose of which was fully examined by this court in *R v Salter*¹. c

Moreover, as is even more striking, if that contention were accurate, it would run wholly against what has been said over many decades in Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice, the editions of which have consistently contained statements as in the current edition²: d

'It is not necessary, in order to support a charge under this section, that the goods in respect of which credit is obtained should all be supplied or ordered at the same time, provided that the total amount of credit is £10 or upwards, as appears from *R. v. Juby*³ . . .'

A similar statement has for decades appeared in Williams on Bankruptcy⁴. It so happens that no authority stating this proposition in those precise terms has been cited to this court. It is accordingly convenient that it should be here and now stated that the above passage in Archbold correctly states the law, its interpretation of *R v Juby*³ being well founded. e

Having regard to the various points taken by counsel for the appellant it is perhaps as well to set out certain elementary principles for which really no authority is needed. First, that if a person charged has by words or conduct secured that credit be given to him to the extent of £10 or more he has obtained that credit. The offence is of a category described as absolute. Secondly, that when the relevant credit extends to £10 that is the moment at which the offence is committed, albeit it may be by aggregating a series of smaller sums. Thirdly, that when once the figure of £10 is reached the offence is complete and any subsequent payments reducing the indebtedness may go to mitigation but cannot provide a defence. Fourthly, is is, of course, desirable that in a count of an indictment the full amount of the credit obtained should be stated with accuracy, but nonetheless the offence f

1 [1968] 2 All ER 951, [1968] 2 QB 793

2 37th Edn, 1969, p 1192, para 3684

3 (1886) 55 LT 788, 16 Cox CC 160

4 13th Edn, 1925, p 566, cf 18th Edn, 1968, pp 565, 566 g a is simply one of obtaining credit to an extent of £10 or more. Plainly if the relevant count puts the indebtedness at a greater sum than was actually obtained, that does not preclude the jury from giving a verdict of guilty of the offence as committed. Finally that if the words 'on or about the date' are used in an indictment then, provided that the offence is shown to have been committed within some period that has a reasonable approximation to the date mentioned in the indictment, then b the fact that the date is not correctly stated does not preclude a valid verdict of guilty. It has been necessary to state those factors because they were all raised in argument and apply in one shape or another to this particular case. The first submission on behalf of the appellant—as to aggregation—thus plainly fails.

Next, as regards count 1, for instance, it may well be that the indictment in referring to 27th October was not completely accurate, but on the facts already stated it is sufficiently accurate to support a verdict of guilty. The same applies to the attack c made on the amount of £451 odd. As to the count relating to the Artillery Mansions debt, a great deal of detail on accounts has been argued in this court as indeed it was at first instance, but it is not necessary to go into those details. It is sufficient to mention that the £10 deposit went against electricity, telephone and maintenance and not against rent and that the arrears stated earlier in this judgment, whether d one refers to the £13 17s 4d, which was the amount of the indebtedness on 27th March, or to the sum of £63 17s 4d, the indebtedness on 12th March, (in each case excluding mesne profits), were enough to support the obviously proper verdict of guilty.

As regards mesne profits, counsel for the Crown with admirable discretion did not ask that these be taken into account when computing the relevant figures at trial. Equally she does not ask this court to give a ruling whether mesne profits e can constitute a valid item in an account when the charge is obtaining of credit under s 155 (a) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914. She did, however, ask us to bear in mind *R v Smith*⁵ and to mention that with the aid of that and other authorities she submitted it might be argued on some future occasion that mesne profits could form a valid item in such an account. The court expresses no opinion on that point whatsoever.

One further matter requires mention concerning the phraseology used in the particulars of the two counts. Having heard considerable argument about their terms in relation to the facts of this case and remembering that similar facts may arise in many cases, this court considers that in general, and it emphasises the words 'in general', it would be better in a parallel case to use a phraseology for the particulars of offence which in the instant case would have resulted in count 1 reading: 'Philip g Gamble Hartley, in the Inner London area of Greater London, being an undischarged bankrupt, obtained credit which by about the 27th October, 1969 amounted to £451 13s. 9d. from Lloyds Bank Limited without informing the said Bank that he was then an undischarged bankrupt'.

In the upshot, the present appeal lacks both law and merit and is dismissed.

h Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Registrar of Criminal Appeals (for the appellant); Solicitor, Department of Trade and Industry (for the Crown).

N P Metcalfe Esq Barrister.

R v Rimmer

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, SACHS LJ AND ACKNER J

25th NOVEMBER 1971

Criminal law – Evidence – Admissibility – Trial – Plea of guilty at magistrates' court – Withdrawal of plea – Committal for trial to quarter sessions – Admissibility of original plea of guilty in evidence at subsequent trial – Discretion of judge – Factors to be considered.

On 8th March 1971 before justices the appellant pleaded guilty to theft on a charge of burglary. He elected to be dealt with summarily and was remanded until 10th March, when he asked to change his plea to one of 'not guilty'. On 31st March that request was granted. The appellant elected to be tried by jury and was committed to quarter sessions. The trial judge allowed evidence as to the appellant's original plea of guilty and his subsequent change of plea to be admitted. No evidence had however been put before the judge as to why the change of plea had been permitted by the justices. The appellant was convicted of burglary. On appeal he contended that in no circumstances could a reference be made at the trial to the fact that an accused had at an earlier stage changed his plea from guilty to not guilty for a plea of guilty which was withdrawn had no effect at all.

Held – (i) A plea of guilty in court which was withdrawn was not devoid of effect; in allowing such a plea to be withdrawn, the court was deciding that the accused ought not to be bound by his confession of fact in a way which otherwise would have resulted in an immediate conviction, but the question whether the confession made by the plea had any probative value remained open for consideration (see p 607 b to d, post).

(ii) It was a matter for the discretion of the trial judge whether evidence as to a previous plea and its withdrawal should be admitted into evidence; before exercising his discretion the trial judge had to consider whether the confession made by the plea of guilty had any probative value and whether such probative value as it had would exceed the prejudice to the accused which would be induced by the admission of such evidence (see p 607 f, post).

(iii) At the appellant's trial the evidence of his change of plea should not have been admitted because the material matters had not been appropriately investigated and the attention of the judge had not been directed to the relevant principles to be applied before exercising his discretion (see p 607 g to p 608 a, post).

(iv) Applying the proviso to s 2 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, the appeal would however be dismissed as the evidence against the appellant, even without the reference to the change of plea, was so overwhelming that it would have resulted in conviction (see p 608 a and b, post).

Notes

For plea of guilty generally, see 10 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 408, para 742, and for cases on the subject, see 14 Digest (Repl) 284-287, 2593-2626.

For discretionary powers of a judge as to evidence, see 10 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 423, para 778, and 15 ibid 274, 275, para 499.

Case referred to in judgment

S (an infant) v Manchester City Recorder [1969] 3 All ER 1230, [1971] AC 481, [1970] 2 WLR 21, 134 JP 3, Digest (Cont Vol C) 655, 550Ac.

Cases and authority also cited

R v McNally [1954] 2 All ER 372, [1954] 1 WLR 933.

R v Muford and Lothingland Justices, ex parte Harber, R v East Suffolk Quarter Sessions, ex parte Harber [1971] 1 All ER 81, [1971] 2 WLR 460.

- R v Plummer* [1902] 2 KB 339, [1900-03] All ER Rep 613.
a Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice, 37th Edn, para 1091.

Appeal

- This was an appeal by Patrick Rimmer against his conviction on 27th July 1971 at West Riding Quarter Sessions before the deputy chairman (H G Hall Esq) and a jury of entering a ship as a trespasser and stealing a suit, i.e. burglary, contrary to s 9 (1) (b) of the Theft Act 1968. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

S M Spencer for the appellant.

J M Meredith for the Crown.

- SACHS LJ delivered the judgment of the court. This case gives rise to a point of law of general interest in somewhat unusual circumstances. On 24th February 1971 at Goole West Riding Magistrates' Court the appellant was convicted of taking a motor boat without the owner's consent, and he was sentenced to be made the subject of a probation order for three years. That conviction is not under consideration. Then on 8th March 1971 at Selby West Riding Magistrates' Court the appellant pleaded guilty to theft; the charge against him was that he had on 5th March 1971 trespassed on board a Dutch ship and stolen an overall suit belonging to a member of the crew. He then elected to be dealt with summarily and was remanded until 10th March for reports as to his suitability for borstal training. On 10th March when he appeared on remand he asked that his plea should be changed to one of not guilty in circumstances which fall to be considered later in this judgment. On 31st March he was allowed to change his plea to that of not guilty; he then elected trial by jury and was duly committed to quarter sessions. On 27th July at West Riding Quarter Sessions he was convicted of burglary and sentenced by the deputy chairman to nine months' imprisonment, and for the breach of the probation order of 24th February 1971 he was at the same time sentenced to a sentence of three months' imprisonment to run consecutively to the sentence for the offence committed on 5th March: thus the sentence of the court was 12 months' imprisonment in all. Now by leave of the single judge he appeals against conviction on the ground that at trial at quarter sessions there was improperly admitted evidence of the plea of guilty which he tendered at the magistrates' court on 8th March.

- The facts of the case were as follows. The charge which was originally before the justices and then before sessions related, as already indicated, to the theft from a Dutch ship lying in Goole Dock of a blue and red overall suit worth about £10, a suit which had been kept hanging outside the crew's cabin. It belonged to one Mr Hoch, a member of the crew who had on 5th March gone ashore in the evening and returned about 10.00 p.m. At that late hour he saw the suit still hanging in the corridor. Next morning he discovered that it had gone. So much for 5th March. On 6th March at about 1.00 p.m. the appellant was seen wearing this suit which undisputedly belonged to Mr Hoch. On 7th March the appellant went at the request of the police to Goole police station where the suit was in the custody of the police force. He was interviewed by a police sergeant about 10.40 a.m. and explained his possession of the suit by saying that the mate of the Dutch ship had given it to him when he had been aboard that ship in the afternoon of 5th March; he maintained that Mr Hoch was wrong when he said he had seen that suit at 10.00 p.m. In that state of affairs the appellant was asked if he would like the mate of the ship to be brought to the police station. At his request that was done; thereupon the mate, in the presence of the appellant, said that he had not given the latter any suit at all. At that stage the appellant made an oral confession as follows:

'Fair enough, I stole it. I went back to the ship at 10 p.m. I took it because I was cold and I had nowhere to stay.'

That oral confession was followed by a written statement, and in the course of that statement the appellant said: a

‘I was N.F.A. and at about 10 p.m. I went on board and took it to keep me warm because it was a cold night. I realise I was doing wrong and stealing . . .’

Then one comes to 8th March, the day on which the matter first came before the justices. On that day the mate and Mr Hoch attended court, and the suit was available there. On that occasion, so it appears, the appellant pleaded guilty in carefully chosen words. He pleaded not guilty to burglary but guilty to theft. Thereupon the justices having regard to his past record, remanded him for consideration whether he should be committed with a view to an order for borstal training. Thereafter the mate and Mr Hoch were in effect told that it was all right for them to sail away in their Dutch ship, and at the same time the suit was returned from the custody of the appellant to Mr Hoch himself. At that stage, accordingly, the evidence against the appellant quite literally sailed away. Then came 10th March 1971 when the appellant, who having regard to his record can hardly be said to be unacquainted with the procedure of courts, proceeded to change his plea. The matter was adjourned until 31st March, and on that occasion he was given permission to make that change; thereupon such evidence as was available, which did not include that of the mate, was heard, and he was committed for trial. b
c
d

At the trial on 27th July 1971 the mate was again not available. A time came in the course of the evidence of Police Sergeant Redhead when the jury were asked to retire, and the deputy chairman was asked to consider whether the police officer could be asked questions in relation to 8th March with a view to establishing that there had been a change of plea in circumstances which were consistent with that change having taken place because the appellant considered that there was then a better chance of acquittal, and at the same time to some extent to explain the circumstances in which the mate of the Dutch ship was not going to be called at sessions. After a discussion to which it is not necessary to refer in any detail at this stage, the learned deputy chairman directed that the evidence as to the original plea of guilty and the subsequent change should be admitted into evidence. He appears to have taken the view that this should be done on general grounds in relation to the circumstances as a whole, and in particular in relation to explaining the fact that the mate would not be giving evidence at the sessions trial. e
f

It is against that decision and the admission of subsequent evidence that the appellant sought and was granted leave to appeal. Before this court it has been submitted on his behalf in the course of, if the court may be permitted to say so, a well constructed argument by counsel for appellant, that in no circumstances can reference be made at trial to the fact that the appellant at an earlier stage pleaded guilty and later changed his plea. That is a matter which is of more consequence nowadays than it has previously been, because it is only recently that justices have been held to have a discretion to allow a plea of guilty to be changed between the moment of plea and the moment of sentence. That discretion was first stated to exist in *S (an infant) v Manchester City Recorder*¹ which was decided by the House of Lords on 21st October 1969. By virtue of that decision justices have a general discretion which can be exercised on occasions which, it was assumed at the time by Lord Upjohn, would be likely to occur only rarely; but no guidelines have been laid down as to the circumstances in which such changes shall or shall not be permitted, and it is plain that justices may at times exercise that discretion when in doubt whether facts stated to them by an accused in person are true or not. Indeed nothing that this court would state is intended to suggest that they should take anything but a liberal view of what should be done when an accused appears in person, as he did in the present case. g a Today it has been submitted to this court that in law there is a distinction as regards, for instance, statements by way of voluntary confession on the way into court made by an accused, and what five minutes later, in the quieter and more solemn precincts of the court itself he may say by way of voluntary confession when in the dock. In aid of that submission, it was put to this court that the withdrawal of a plea of guilty so to speak wipes the slate entirely clean so that it can never be referred to in the course of the trial.
h
i

¹ [1969] 3 All ER 1230, [1971] AC 481

b In the view of this court that argument overlooks the fact that a plea of guilty has two effects: first of all it is a confession of fact; secondly it is such a confession that without further evidence the court is entitled to and indeed in all proper circumstances will so act on it that it results in a conviction. This court is not prepared to accept the submission that a plea of guilty in court, if withdrawn, has simply no effect whatsoever. In truth the request for a withdrawal affects the second constituent of the plea, in other words the court may decide that the accused ought not to be bound by his confession in a way which results in an immediate conviction, and if the court allows the withdrawal, it is that second constituent that is affected. That leaves for consideration in each case the question whether the confession made by the plea has any probative value, and whether that probative value is one that exceeds the prejudice that might be imported by referring to it. Whether it has a probative value at all, and whether that probative value exceeds the prejudice which may be thus imported, must depend on the facts of the case. The circumstances in which a withdrawal of a plea is permitted may vary infinitely. One may have a case where a plea, for instance, to a charge of handling is most properly withdrawn because the appellant did not realise that it was necessary for him to have the relevant knowledge that the goods were stolen. On the other hand, the withdrawal of a plea may result from some completely false statement of fact made by the accused himself as to what has happened between the date of the plea and the date that withdrawal is requested, something which the justices cannot and would not check on the spot. Whether in any individual case the evidence as to the previous plea and its withdrawal should be admitted into evidence is plainly a matter for the discretion of the trial judge, who must most carefully examine whether indeed the probative value does exceed the prejudice which would be induced by the admission of such evidence. In the vast majority of cases in practice the result of such an examination would be that the evidence would not be admitted. Indeed, the occasions on which it is likely to be regarded as admissible will, of their nature, be rare. In each case that question must be decided, as it was in the present case, by an examination of the relevant facts on what is often referred to as 'a trial within a trial'.

g That being the principle to be applied, it is now appropriate to return to the particular facts of this case. It is to be observed that when the submissions were made to the learned deputy chairman, there was no evidence before him of any sort as to the reasons why on 31st March the change of plea was permitted. Nor does the deputy chairman appear to have approached, or indeed been invited to approach, the question of the admission of the evidence as being a matter of discretion to be determined in the way in which has just been stated. Whether, had the correct approach been adopted then on a careful examination of the material matters in the light of the oral and written admissions made by the appellant, according to the police evidence, on 7th March, the evidence of the change of plea might have been admitted, is an issue on which this court does not feel disposed to offer observations. The fact remains that the matters were not appropriately investigated before the deputy chairman, nor was his attention directed to the relevant principles to be applied. It is, however, as well to state at once that this court would not have considered that his discretion would have been properly applied if it had related simply to the question of explaining the absence of the mate of the Dutch ship, because that absence could be and in practice was adequately explained by other means at the trial itself. In those circumstances, this court is proceeding on the basis that the evidence was not in this particular instance properly admitted, particularly as any such admission would have to be followed by a very careful direction by the trial judge as to exactly how it was to be looked at from a jury point of view. This court however, returning to the oral statement and the very clear written statement of the appellant and to the compelling nature of the surrounding facts, has come to the conclusion that even without referring to the change of plea the evidence against the appellant was overwhelming, and would in any event have resulted in a conviction by the jury. In those circumstances, applying the proviso², the court dismisses the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Registrar of Criminal Appeals; A V Hammond & Co, Bradford (for the Crown).

N P Metcalfe Esq Barrister.

Practice Direction

CROWN COURT

Crown Court – Practice – Solicitor – Right of audience.

In exercise of the power conferred on him by s 12 of the Courts Act 1971 the Lord Chancellor hereby gives the following direction:

1. A solicitor may appear in, conduct, defend and address the court in—(a) criminal proceedings in the Crown Court on appeal from a magistrates' court or on committal of a person for sentence or to be dealt with, if he, or any partner of his, or any solicitor in his employment or by whom he is employed, appeared on behalf of the defendant in the magistrates' court; (b) civil proceedings in the Crown Court on appeal from a magistrates' court if he, or any partner of his, or any solicitor in his employment or by whom he is employed, appeared in the proceedings in the magistrates' court.

2. The rights of audience conferred by this direction are in addition to and not in derogation from the rights of audience conferred by the Practice Direction³ dated 7th December 1971.

3. This direction shall come into force on 1st March 1972.

HAILSHAM OF ST MARYLEBONE C

9th February 1972

² I.e. to s 2 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968

³ [1972] 1 All ER 144, [1972] 1 WLR 5

a Bloomfield and others v Springfield Hosiery Finishing Co Ltd

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COURT

SIR JOHN DONALDSON P AND MR H BRIGGS

b 9th, 16th DECEMBER 1971

Employment – Period of continuous employment – Strike – Disruption of continuity – Continuity not broken where employee takes part in strike – Dismissal of employee whilst on strike – Employee re-engaged and returning to work after termination of strike – Whether employee continuing to be on strike after dismissal – Whether continuity of employment broken – Contracts of Employment Act 1963, Sch 1, paras 7 (2), 11.

c On 7th July 1969 the employees went on strike. On 11th July the employees were summarily dismissed by the employers. Subsequently agreement was reached between the parties that the employees should be taken back on 21st July and they returned to work on that day. Due to a decline in the supply of work the employees were laid off between 6th October and 28th December 1970, and it was conceded that they had been or were deemed to have been dismissed for redundancy. d The employees gave notice under s 6 (1) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 of their intention to claim redundancy payments. The Industrial Tribunal dismissed the claims on the ground that the continuity of their employment had been broken by their absence from work during the period 11th–21st July 1969 and that consequently the period of employment between that break and their dismissal was less than the statutory minimum qualifying period, i.e. 104 weeks. e The tribunal held that the absence from work between 11th–21st July could not be deemed not to have broken the continuity of their employment by virtue of para 7 (2)^a of Sch 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 since the employees had ceased to be employed on 11th July when they were dismissed and so could not be said to have been on strike after that date. On appeal, f Held – The appeal would be allowed; the employees' continuity of employment had not been broken in July 1969 and they were consequently entitled to redundancy payments; despite their summary dismissal on 11th July, the employees had continued to take part in the strike for the purposes of para 7 (2) since the expression 'persons employed' contained in the definition of 'strike' in para 11 (1)^b of Sch 1 to the 1963 Act must be extended to include persons who, but for their action in ceasing or refusing to continue to work, would be employees; the fact that an employer terminated their contracts of employment did not take employees who were on strike outside the category of 'persons employed' unless and until the employer engaged other persons on a permanent basis to do the work which the strikers had been doing, or permanently discontinued the activity in which they had been employed g (see p 613 e and p 614 c, post).

h Per Curiam. Similar considerations relating to continuity of employment would have applied if the employees had been absent from work by reason of a lock-out in which case they would have had to rely on para 8^c of Sch 1 to the 1963 Act to maintain the continuity of their employment (see p 614 b, post).

j Notes

For the continuity of a period of employment, see Supplement to 25 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) para 945A, 6.

a Paragraph 7 (2) is set out at p 612 f, post

b Paragraph 11 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 613 a and b, post

c Paragraph 8 is set out at p 613 j to p 614 a, post

For the Contracts of Employment Act 1963, Sch 1, paras 7, 8, 11, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 213, 214. a

Cases referred to in judgment

Clarke Chapman-John Thompson Ltd v Walters p 614, post.

Fitzgerald v Hall Russell & Co Ltd [1969] 3 All ER 1140, [1970] AC 984, [1969] 3 WLR 868, Digest (Cont Vol C) 691, 816Aee. b

Cases also cited

Bunt v Fishlow Products Ltd 1970 ITR 127.

Morgan v Fry [1968] 3 All ER 452, [1968] 2 QB 710, [1968] 3 WLR 506.

Appeal

This was an appeal by Arthur Bloomfield, Peter John Bagley, Ronald Archer and William Ernest Cockayne ('the employees') against a decision of the Industrial Tribunal (chairman J I E Arnold Esq) sitting at Nottingham, dated 20th April 1971, that they were not entitled to claim redundancy payments from their employers, Springfield Hosiery Finishing Co Ltd, under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. c

Alexander Irvine for the employees.

Bruce Markham David for the employers. d

Cur adv vult

16th December. SIR JOHN DONALDSON P read the following judgment of the court. With the consent of the parties and pursuant to the Industrial Relations Act 1971, Sch 3, para 17, this appeal has been heard by a court of two. It raises a very important point on which the employees' trade union and, it may be, other trade unions require a decision. That question is whether for purposes of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 a strike or lock-out can continue after the strikers or locked out workmen have been dismissed. If it cannot, the period of employment before the dismissal will not count for purposes of calculating redundancy payments. In the present case the Industrial Tribunal sitting at Nottingham has decided that a strike ended when the employees were dismissed and that therefore there was a break in the continuity of their employment. As the period of employment between this break and their dismissal by reason of redundancy was less than 104 weeks, the minimum qualifying period, the tribunal held that they were not entitled to any redundancy payment. e

The facts as found by the tribunal are no longer in dispute and can be summarised as follows. In February 1968 agreement was reached between the respondent employers and the appellant employees that dilute labour, ie unskilled or semi-skilled trainees, would be permitted to work in the trim shop on skilled work. This was followed in May 1968 by a procedure agreement, which provided that there should be no stoppage of work before the full negotiating procedures had been exhausted. On 4th July 1969 the employers informed Mr Pendleton, the shop steward, that they proposed to take on an unqualified trimmer on 7th July. On that day work began as usual at 7.00 a.m. However, a hour later the unqualified trimmer reported for work and at 8.15 a.m. the men downed tools and walked out. This was, as counsel for the employees very frankly admitted, a breach not only of the agreement to accept dilute labour but also of the procedure agreement. Mr Stocker, the employers' managing director, took the view that such conduct was repudiatory and at a meeting with the men on the morning of 7th July told them that they would be summarily dismissed on 11th July unless they had gone back to work by then. They did not go back to work and on 11th July all the employees were summarily dismissed. At the time of the dismissal Mr Stocker hoped, to use his own words, 'they would come back in a proper situation or stay away altogether'. After 11th July Mr Stocker f
g
h
i

a began to take on new men. Perhaps as a consequence, enthusiasm for the strike began to wane. By 17th or 18th July agreement had been reached between the employers and the employees other than Mr Bagley that they should be taken back on 21st July. A similar agreement was reached with Mr Bagley with reference to a different date, but nothing turns on this difference. Each of the employees signed a new memorandum, under the Contracts of Employment Act 1963, which expressly agreed to the employment of dilutee labour in the capacity of trainees and further provided that there should be no industrial action until the proper negotiating machinery had been exhausted. The effect of this was that the subject-matter of the previous informal agreements had become enforceable and legally binding terms of the contract of employment.

c Nothing further would have been heard of this incident but for the fact that in the latter part of 1970 the supply of work began to fall off. As a result the employees were laid off between 6th October and 28th December 1970. As they were entitled, they submitted a notification of their intention to claim a redundancy payment pursuant to the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, s 6 (1), and it is conceded that they were, or were deemed to have been, dismissed for redundancy. In giving their reasons for deciding that there was no entitlement to redundancy payments the members of the tribunal treated Mr Bagley's case as representative of the claims of all the employees. They said:

e 'We feel that the criteria for determining whether a strike exists or continues to exist cannot be wholly subjective. From the nature of things one has to be objective about it at some stage. Mr. Bagley was certainly on strike on 7th July. He may conceivably have been still on strike up to the Wednesday, 9th July, because of the 48 hours given. In our view he cannot have been on strike after Friday, 11th July, because by then he was no longer an employee. To hold otherwise would be to create an impossible position in industry as well as at law. A dismissed employee might never return, and, if he did he might not be re-engaged. In this case the [employees] were only away for 10 days and so were able to get their jobs back. Even in that time however Mr. Stocker had set on 12 new unqualified men. If they had been away for say a month all their positions might have been filled. It would be idle in those circumstances to talk of the continuance of a strike. In view of these considerations, we feel that this strike had ceased to be a reality by the end of the first week, and that therefore there is no basis on which Mr. Bagley can claim that his employment continued between 11th July and 11th August.'

g Is this conclusion correct? The Redundancy Payments Act 1965 provides that employees dismissed by reason of redundancy may become entitled to redundancy payments in certain circumstances. Their entitlement and the amount of the payment depend in part on the length of the period of continuous employment immediately preceding their dismissal. However, the code which is used for calculating the length of this period, Sch 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 (hereinafter called 'the code'), provides for the application of different criteria for determining whether employment has been continuous and for determining the length of that employment. Accordingly a week may count for purposes of continuity, but not for purposes of determining the length of the period of continuous employment. To put the matter in another way, the code is concerned simultaneously with continuity and with enumeration, but the two aspects have to be considered separately. The relevant provisions of the code are as follows:

'General provisions as to continuity of period of employment

'2. Except so far as otherwise provided by the following provisions of this Schedule, any week which does not count under paragraphs 3 to 6 of this Schedule breaks the continuity of the period of employment.

'Normal working weeks'

'3. Any week in which the employee is employed for twenty-one hours or more shall count in computing a period of employment. a 'Employment governed by contract'

'4. Any week during the whole or part of which the employee's relations with the employer are governed by a contract of employment which normally involves employment for twenty-one hours or more weekly shall count in computing a period of employment. b

'Periods in which there is no contract of employment'

'5.—(1) If in any week the employee is, for the whole or part of the week—
(a) incapable of work in consequence of sickness or injury, or (b) absent from work on account of a temporary cessation of work, or (c) absent from work in circumstances such that, by arrangement or custom, he is regarded as continuing in the employment of his employer for all or any purposes, that week shall, notwithstanding that it does not fall under paragraph 3 or paragraph 4 of this Schedule, count as a period of employment. . . . c

'(3) Paragraph (b) of sub-paragraph (1) of this paragraph shall not apply to a temporary cessation of work on account of a strike in which the employee takes part. d

Paragraph 7 of the code has been amended by the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, s 37, and now reads:

'Industrial disputes after Act comes into force'

'7.—(1) A week shall not count under paragraph 3, paragraph 4 or paragraph 5 of this Schedule if in that week, or any part of that week, the employee takes part in a strike. e

'(2) The continuity of an employee's period of employment is not broken by a week which does not count under this Schedule, and which begins after it comes into force, if in that week, or any part of that week, the employee takes part in a strike.

'(3) Sub-paragraph (2) applies whether or not the week would, apart from sub-paragraph (1), have counted under this Schedule. f

It will be seen that para 7 (1) is concerned solely with computing the length of the period of continuous employment and not with its continuity. For this purpose weeks in any part of which an employee was on strike do not count. Paragraph 7 (2) and (3) deals with continuity and under these sub-paras continuity is not broken by a week during any part of which the employee is taking part in a strike whether or not that week would otherwise have counted. g

Basing themselves on this paragraph, the employees submit that for purposes of continuity they are entitled to count the whole period between 7th July, when they went on strike and 21st July, when they were re-employed, or, in the case of Mr Bagley, are deemed to have been re-employed. The employers' answer to this contention is that the strike ended when the employees were dismissed, that thereafter their relations with the employers were not governed by any contract of employment, thus excluding para 4 of the code, and that there was no 'temporary cessation of work' within the meaning of para 5 (1) (b), these words having been construed in Fitzgerald v Hall Russell & Co Ltd per Lord Upjohn¹ as describing a situation in which the employer no longer had work available for the employee personally. In this case, they say, there was ample work available to the employees if only they were prepared to undertake it upon the employers' terms. h a 'the cessation of work by a body of persons employed acting in combination, or a concerted refusal or a refusal under a common understanding of any number of persons employed to continue to work for an employer in consequence of a dispute, done as a means of compelling their employer or any person or body of persons employed, or to aid other employees in compelling their employer or any person or body of persons employed, to accept or not to accept terms or conditions of or affecting employment'.

A 'strike' is defined in para 11 (1) of the code as meaning— j

b Counsel for the employers submits that once the contract of employment is terminated by dismissal, the strikers cease to be 'a body of persons employed' and their action ceases to be a strike. Although this argument is superficially attractive, it is, in our judgment, wholly fallacious. It is true that under s 8 (1) of the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 it is provided that 'employee' means 'an individual who has entered into or works under a contract with an employer . . . and cognate expressions shall be construed accordingly'. However, if this definition were applied narrowly, para 5 of the code could not apply to a break in employment such as occurred in *Fitzgerald v Hall Russell & Co Ltd*², because during the break there was no contract with the employer and the workmen would not therefore have been employees. The House of Lords has held that para 5 can apply in such a situation and it follows that the word 'employee' in the code is to be given a wider meaning.

c In para 5 of the code 'employee' must mean a person who, but for and during the continuance of one of the specified circumstances (sickness, temporary cessation of work, etc) would be an employee. Similarly in our judgment 'persons employed' in the definition of a strike must be read as extending to include persons who, but for their action in ceasing or refusing to continue to work, would be employees. The fact that the employer terminates their contracts of employment does not take them outside this category, unless and until he engages other persons on a permanent basis to do the work which the strikers had been doing or he permanently discontinues the activity in which they were employed. Similarly the fact that the striker takes other temporary employment pending the settlement of the dispute, does not prevent him claiming that he is taking part in a strike.

d In fact in the present case none of the employees took other employment and, as we have said, all were re-employed. In our judgment the employees were taking part in a strike from 7th until 21st July 1970, unless their return to work was in some way delayed in order to achieve a phased resumption of work. In the latter case the period of delay would be covered by para 5 (1) (b) of the code as being, for the reasons given in a judgment of another division of this court in *Clarke Chapman-John Thompson Ltd v Walters*³, an absence from work on account of a temporary cessation of work within the meaning of that paragraph. In relation to the issue of continuity, it matters not which paragraph applies and on the facts of this case it is unlikely to affect the amount of the redundancy payment to which the employees are entitled, although in theory it could.

e Two of the employees' former colleagues, Mr Pendleton and Mr Jarvis, were never re-employed. We do not have to decide exactly when they ceased to be on strike, but in principle this occurred either when they took other employment without an intention of returning as soon as possible to employment by the employers or when the employers engaged other replacement employees on a permanent basis, whichever occurred first.

f Some argument was directed to the question whether or not the employees could successfully contend that they were absent from work by reason of a lock-out and rely on para 8 of the code which provides:

'The continuity of the period of employment is not broken by a week which

2 [1969] 3 All ER 1140, [1970] AC 984

3 Page 614, post

begins after this Schedule comes into force and which does not count under this Schedule, if in that week or any part of that week the employee is absent from work because of a lock-out by the employer.' a

It is a commonplace that one man's strike is another man's lock-out and it will, we think, suffice to say that similar considerations apply to the definition of 'lock-out' as to the definition of 'strike'. The only effect of dismissal as part of a lock-out is that para 4 of the code ceases to apply and the locked out workman must rely on para 8 to maintain his continuity of employment for purposes of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. b

For the reasons which we have given, the appeal will be allowed and the case remitted to the Industrial Tribunal for assessment of the amount of the employees' respective entitlements to a redundancy payment on the footing that there was no break in their employments in July 1969. c

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: W H Thompson, Manchester (for the employees); Wells & Hind, Nottingham (for the employers).

Gordon H Scott Esq Barrister. d

Clarke Chapman-John Thompson Ltd v Walters

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COURT

SIR JOHN BRIGHTMAN, MR R BOYFIELD AND MR H BRIGGS

2nd, 16th DECEMBER 1971 e

Employment – Period of continuous employment – Temporary cessation of work – Disruption of continuity – Employee taking part in strike – Strikers given notice of dismissal on account of failure to return to work – Strike ending – Strikers allowed to apply for re-employment – Some strikers taken on immediately – Employee not re-engaged immediately as work not available for him – Employee re-engaged after lapse of 16 days – Whether absence from work on account of dismissal or on account of temporary cessation of work – Whether temporary cessation of work on account of strike in which employee taking part – Contracts of Employment Act 1963, Sch 1, para 5 (1) (b), (3). f

W, a crane driver, began his employment with C Ltd in October 1967. In August 1969 W was, with certain fellow employees, on strike for two successive weeks (weeks 1 and 2). The strikers decided to resume work on Tuesday of the following week (week 3) but they were notified by their employers that if they did not return to work on Monday of week 3 they would automatically be dismissed. On presenting themselves for work on Tuesday of week 3, they were all told that they had been discharged but were allowed to complete application forms for re-employment. C Ltd planned a staged resumption of work after the strike. Some of W's fellow employees were re-engaged at once, but he was not re-engaged until the Thursday of week 5 (during week 4 he was not working). He remained continuously employed by C Ltd from the Thursday of week 5 until he was dismissed because of redundancy in December 1970. W then claimed redundancy payment under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. His employers contended that he was not entitled to such payment since he had not as required by s 1 (1) of the 1965 Act been continuously employed for 104 weeks by December 1970. The continuity of his employment they submitted had been disrupted in 1969 because his absence from work during week 4 was not on account of a temporary cessation of work within the meaning of para 5 (1) (b)^a of Sch 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 but on account of the notice g a of dismissal; further even if his absence was on account of a temporary cessation of work, para 5 (1) (b) did not, by virtue of para 5 (3)^b of that schedule, apply, as the temporary cessation of work was a consequence of the strike in which W had taken part.

^a Paragraph 5 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 617 b, post h

Held – (i) By virtue of para 5 (1) (b) of Sch 1 the continuity of W's employment with C Ltd was not broken for the following reasons—

b (a) his absence from work during week 4 was not on account of his dismissal but, within the meaning of para 5 (1) (b), on account of a temporary cessation of work for him personally to do (see p 619 c and d, post); dicta of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest and Lord Upjohn in Fitzgerald v Hall Russell & Co Ltd [1969] 3 All ER at 1144, 1145, 1150 applied;

c (b) para 5 (3) of Sch 1 could not apply because on the true construction of that paragraph the words 'temporary cessation of work on account of a strike in which the employee takes part' meant 'a temporary cessation of work on account of a strike in which the employee is currently taking part' and not 'a temporary cessation of work as a consequence of a strike in which the employee is currently taking part or has theretofore taken part' (see p 618 j, post).

(ii) Accordingly W was entitled to a redundancy payment.

d Notes

For computation of period of employment, see Supplement to 25 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) para 945A, 5, and for cases on continuity of employment under the Contracts of Employment Act 1963, Sch 1, para 5, see Digest (Cont Vol C) 690-691, 816Aee, Aed, Aee.

e For the Contracts of Employment Act 1963, Sch 1, para 5, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 213.

For the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, s 1, see ibid 238.

Case referred to in judgment

Fitzgerald v Hall Russell & Co Ltd [1969] 3 All ER 1140, [1970] AC 984, [1969] 3 WLR 868, Digest (Cont Vol C) 691, 816Aee.

Appeal

This was an appeal by Clarke Chapman-John Thompson Ltd ('the employers') from a decision, given on 1st June 1971, of the Industrial Tribunal (chairman E D B Powell Esq) sitting at Haverfordwest that Rex Walters ('the employee') had been continuously employed by the employers for a period of 104 weeks and was entitled to a redundancy payment under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Mark Waller for the employers.

Alexander Irvine for the employee.

Cur adv vult

h 16th December. SIR JOHN BRIGHTMAN read the following judgment of the court. This appeal raises an important point on the construction of Sch 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963. Mr Walters, the respondent employee, was a crane driver for the appellants, Clarke Chapman-John Thompson Ltd ('the employers'). He was engaged in October 1967. He was dismissed for redundancy 3½ years later in December 1970. The question which arises is whether by December 1970 he had been continuously employed for the requisite period of two years so as to be entitled to a redundancy payment, having regard to the events of the five weeks ending on 23rd August, 30th August, 6th September, 13th September and 20th September 1969, to which we will refer respectively as weeks 1 to 5.

b Paragraph 5 (3) is set out at p 617 c, post

The events were these. On Thursday of week 1, 120 members of the Constructional Engineering Union, including the employee, went on strike owing to dissatisfaction with the downgrading of a storeman which they considered unjust. They continued the strike throughout week 2. During that week, the men decided to return to work on Tuesday of week 3, and the employers were so informed. There was a difference of view between the employers and their employees whether Monday of week 3 (a bank holiday) was a day on which the employees could be required to work as a result of an extra holiday given to them earlier in the year. On Thursday of week 2 the employers wrote a letter to each of the men on strike in the following terms:

'Your unconstitutional action in withdrawing your labour on Thursday, the 21st August, 1969, constitutes a repudiation of the Contracts of Employment existing between employees and the [employers]. If you have not returned to normal working by 8 a.m. on Monday, the 1st September, 1969, your act of repudiation will be accepted, and you will, therefore, automatically cease to be in the [employers'] employ.'

On Sunday in week 3 the men held a meeting and voted to stand by their decision to return to work on Tuesday. When they presented themselves for work on Tuesday, they were told that they had been discharged but would be allowed to complete application forms for employment. Some of the men were taken on at once. Others, including the employee, were taken on at a later date. During the intervening period, the employee spoke to the resident engineer's deputy three or four times and was told that he 'might be taken on in due course'. He was, in fact, re-engaged on Thursday of week 5. Thereafter his employment by the employers was continuous until he became redundant in December 1970.

The crucial week is week 4, during no part of which the employee was either on strike or working. If that week counts for continuity of employment, the employee had completed the requisite continuous period of employment by the time he became redundant in December 1970. If, however, that week disrupted the continuity of his employment, he is not entitled to a redundancy payment. The Industrial Tribunal decided that he was so entitled.

The Redundancy Payments Act 1965, s 1, read with ss 3 and 8 and Sch 1, provides that, subject to certain exceptions, where an employee has been continuously employed for 104 weeks and is dismissed by reason of redundancy, he is entitled to a redundancy payment, the amount of which is to be calculated by reference to the period during which he has been continuously employed. Under s 8 the provisions of Sch 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 are to have effect for determining whether an employee has been continuously employed for the requisite period of 104 weeks. Under para 1 of Sch 1 to the 1965 Act, the provisions of Sch 1 to the 1963 Act also have effect for calculating the length of continuous employment.

The 1963 Act uses Sch 1 to test the existence of continuous employment, on which the right of an employee to a certain statutory length of notice depends, and also to measure the duration of continuous employment on which the length of such notice depends. The scheme of the schedule is to set out the rules for determining whether a particular week counts as a week for the purpose of (a) enumerating the weeks during which such employment lasted, and (b) continuity; a week which does not count for purposes of 'enumeration' because work did not take place or was curtailed, may nevertheless be deemed to exist for 'continuity' in the sense that it is deemed not to disrupt continuity.

Paragraph 1 of Sch 1 provides that an employee's period of employment shall be computed in weeks. Under para 11 a week ends on Saturday. Paragraph 2 contains the basic principle that a week which does not count for purposes of enumeration under paras 3 to 6 disrupts continuity. Paragraph 3 provides that if a person works for at least 21 hours in a week, he is deemed to have worked for a week. Paragraph 4 a carries this principle further and provides that if employment during a week is governed by a contract of employment which normally involves 21 hours' work a week, that week so counts, although actual employment may be less than 21 hours. Paragraph 5 is headed, 'Periods in which there is no contract of employment'. It reads as follows, so far as relevant:

b '(1) If in any week the employee is, for the whole or part of the week—(a) incapable of work in consequence of sickness or injury, or (b) absent from work on account of a temporary cessation of work, or (c) . . . that week shall, notwithstanding that it does not fall under paragraph 3 or paragraph 4 of this Schedule, count as a period of employment . . .

c '(3) Paragraph (b) of sub-paragraph (1) of this paragraph shall not apply to a temporary cessation of work on account of a strike in which the employee takes part.'

If, therefore, an employee (who has no subsisting contract) is ill or is absent from work on account of a temporary cessation of work, so that he is employed for less than 21 hours and para 3 cannot operate, the week so missed or curtailed is to count for purposes of enumeration and therefore for purposes of continuity. If, however, the temporary cessation of work is on account of a strike in which the employee takes part, sub-para (1) (b) has no application. This means that if the week is missed or curtailed in the circumstances indicated, it is not (subject to a later exception) to be taken into account for the purposes of enumeration or continuity; but it is to be observed that such a strike does not, by virtue of para 5, affect paras 3 and 4; so, if in a strike-affected week the employee in fact works 21 hours, or his employment is governed by a contract which normally involves 21 hours' work, such week still counts both for enumeration and continuity, so far as para 5 is concerned.

e We come to para 7, which relates to industrial disputes occurring after the 1963 Act has come into force. It has to be read with the deletion introduced by s 37 (1) of the 1965 Act. So read, it provides as follows:

f '(1) A week shall not count under paragraph 3, paragraph 4 or paragraph 5 of this Schedule if in that week, or any part of that week, the employee takes part in a strike.

'(2) The continuity of an employee's period of employment is not broken by a week which does not count under this Schedule, and which begins after it comes into force, if in that week, or any part of that week, the employee takes part in a strike.

g '(3) Sub-paragraph (2) applies whether or not the week would, apart from sub-paragraph (1), have counted under this Schedule.'

The effect is this. If in a particular week the employee takes part in a strike, that week does not count for purposes of enumeration, even if paras 3, 4 or 5 would otherwise have applied, i.e. even if the employee worked for 21 hours in that week, or under his contract would normally have worked 21 hours, or was incapable of working part of the week owing, for example, to sickness or injury. The week in which he takes part in a strike is not however to disrupt continuity, so that the strike-affected week counts for continuity but not for enumeration.

h In the present case there is no doubt that weeks 1 and 2 count for continuity by virtue of para 7, but are excluded from counting for enumeration by virtue of para 5 (3) or para 7 (1) which are capable of overlapping. On any basis week 5 counts both for continuity and enumeration, because the employee was not on strike and he worked for 21 hours or more during that week. The week principally in question is week 4, when the employee was not on strike and was not working. Week 3 could also be in issue, according to whether or not it is correct to regard the men as on strike for failing to work on Monday; the tribunal, however, accepted that it was not necessary to clarify this point and we agree.

The tribunal decided that week 4 fell within para 5 (1) (b) or alternatively within para 7 (2). So far as para 7 (2) is concerned, we do not find ourselves in agreement with the tribunal. In our view, week 4 cannot be regarded as falling within para 7 (2), for the simple reason that it was not a week during which, or during any part of which, the employee was taking part in a strike. The circumstances were the very contrary. He was trying once again to work for his employers. The claim to a redundancy payment must be based on para 5 (1) (b) if it is to succeed. To bring himself within para 5 (1) (b), the employee must establish that he was 'absent from work on account of a temporary cessation of work' and that such cessation of work was not 'on account of a strike in which the employee takes part'.

The primary facts found by the tribunal and the inference which they drew from them were as follows:

'The [employers] employed eight crane-drivers on this site, including the [employee]. There were nine or ten cranes. Until he was re-engaged on 18 September there were fewer than eight crane-drivers employed. That is to say that the [employers]—if (as we assume) they were not merely vindictive—had no work for the [employee] as a crane-driver until that date . . . In cross-examination Mr Blair [the resident engineer] agreed that members of other unions had remained at work throughout, unaffected by the strike of CEU members; and further that if all the CEU men had turned up on 1 September they would have started back without interruption. He was therefore bound to agree that the same could have happened on 2, 3 or 4 September, or at least that he could have found them work to do. In re-examination he explained that replanning was necessary in any case: they would have had to replan for a general resumption on the Thursday—they did not do so, but instead replanned for a staged resumption—and he added "I don't know how I could have employed a surplus crane-driver." All we can conclude from that evidence is that in the exercise of their prerogative the [employers] decided so to replan the work programme that they did not need the [employee's] services until 18 September. That involved a temporary cessation of work for him . . . Here we find that, as Mr Blair said, the work could have been replanned to give employment to all on 4 September: therefore the temporary cessation of work for some which resulted from the [employers'] alternative plan was on account of that deliberate choice of plan, and not on account of the strike in which [the employee] had recently taken part.'

Counsel for the employers submitted that there were four tests to be applied, and that the employee failed two of them. First, was there a cessation of work at the time when the employee was refused re-engagement or (as counsel for the employers put it) 'laid off'? It was conceded that that should be answered affirmatively. Secondly, was the employee laid off (in that sense) because of such cessation of work? It was submitted that that should be answered in the negative because the employers had served notice on the employee requiring him to return to work on 1st September and he did not do so. Therefore, it was said, he was laid off by reason of that notice and not by reason of a cessation of work. Thirdly, was the cessation of work temporary? It was conceded that the answer to that question was affirmative. Lastly, was the cessation of work not 'on account of a strike in which the employee takes part'? Otherwise para 5 (1) (b) has no application. Counsel submitted that the employee was unable to pass that test, because the cessation of work was a consequence which flowed from a strike and the employee was a person who had taken part in that strike.

We start with the fourth point. In our view the submission of counsel for the employers fails. We think that para 5 (3) means 'a temporary cessation of work on account of a strike in which the employee is currently taking part' and not 'a temporary cessation of work as a consequence of a strike in which the employee is currently taking part or has theretofore taken part'. We reach this conclusion for a two reasons. First, the wording 'a strike in which the employee takes part' is similar to the wording in para 7 (2), 'the employee takes part in a strike'. Paragraph 7 (2) is indubitably referring to a current strike and not a past strike. The similar wording of para 5 (3) should be similarly construed. Secondly, the theory of the 1963 and 1965 Acts seems to be that a strike (originally, under the 1963 Act a strike not in breach of contract, but now any strike) does not disrupt continuity. If para 5 (3) is read in the manner submitted by counsel for the employers, a strike would in fact disrupt continuity for some employees in all cases in which the strike is followed by a phased and orderly return to work. We do not think that this can have been the intention of the legislature.

b We turn to the second point. The argument here is that the employee's absence from work was not on account of a temporary cessation of work but on account of the notice of dismissal. We think this is a narrow view. Admittedly the employee's contract had ended on account of the notice of dismissal which was served on him and became effective when he did not present himself on Monday of week 3. It is absolutely plain from the evidence and from the findings of the tribunal that the reason that he remained absent from work from Tuesday in week 3 until Thursday in week 5 was that the employers declined to re-engage him; the reason he was not re-engaged was not because he had been dismissed but because there was temporarily no need for the full complement of crane drivers; therefore, the reason that he was absent from work from Tuesday in week 3 until Thursday in week 5 was the cessation of any work for him. In our view, the case falls fairly and squarely within para 5 (1) (b).

c Counsel for the employers relied on *Fitzgerald v Hall Russell & Co Ltd*¹. In that case an employee was originally engaged in July 1958 and was ultimately dismissed by reason of redundancy in December 1967. The point at issue was whether a period of eight weeks' absence from work from November 1962 to January 1963 broke the continuity of his employment so that his qualifying service began in January 1963 and not in July 1958. The employee in question was a welder. Between June and December 1962 the respondent employer halved its labour force as a result of shortage of work. The appellant was among the 20 welders dismissed in November. The question before the House of Lords depended on the proper construction of the words 'absent from work on account of a temporary cessation of work' in para 5 (1) (b) of Sch 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963. Both the Industrial Tribunal and the Court of Session held that the eight weeks period did not count by virtue of that provision. They were reversed by the House of Lords. The nature of the problem is summarised in the speech of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest²:

g 'The words "temporary cessation of work" are capable of more than one meaning. In cases falling within para. 5 of Sch. 1 the words fall to be considered in cases where someone after dismissal has been re-employed. After re-employment there will then be a process of looking back. Looking back at a period which was an interval between two periods of employment the question has to be asked—Was the employee absent from work on account of a temporary cessation of work? The word "temporary" will involve questions of degree. The words "cessation of work" may be differently regarded according to whether they are thought to refer to the employee's work or the employer's work. If over a period of years an employer manufactures a particular article but because of a temporary shortage of demand for the article he dismisses one who for years has been an employee but then re-employs him after a period which could properly be regarded as "temporary" there could be two points of view. The employer could at some later time say that his work had not at any moment ceased. The employee could at some later time say that he had worked for his employer for many years save only for a period of a few weeks during which he was absent from work on account of a temporary cessation of work.'

i [1969] 3 All ER 1140, [1970] AC 984

2 [1969] 3 All ER at 1144, [1970] AC at 994

Then later Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest said³:

'If it was a period during which he would have been at work but for the fact that his employer could not find work for him but which period ended when the employer did find work for him, I consider that it could properly be said that he was absent from work on account of a cessation of work even though the employer's business or the particular department of it had not completely closed down.'

Counsel for the employers fastened on the following passage in the speech of Lord Upjohn⁴:

'No doubt in many cases a break of employment will prove fatal to a claim to throw the period of continuous employment back to the period of his earlier engagement; thus, if he gave notice himself for his own reasons, or was dismissed because he was unsatisfactory, it would no doubt be impossible for him to show that his employment was continuous from the earlier date.'

The argument of counsel for the employers was that as the employee's contract was terminated in consequence of his refusal to work on Monday of week 3 as required by the employers, so he was in the same position as a man who, in the words of Lord Upjohn⁴, 'was dismissed because he was unsatisfactory' or (in a later passage⁵ in his speech) 'because he took french leave'. In our view the decision in *Fitzgerald v Hall Russell & Co Ltd*⁶ does not sustain the contention which counsel for the employers sought to base on it. It is abundantly clear that para 5 (1) (b) applies notwithstanding that the employee was absent from work and had in fact been dismissed: see Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest⁷ where he says with reference to para 5 (1) (c), that the provision 'deals with the cessation of the job of the employee who is dismissed'; and see Lord Upjohn⁴: 'That dismissal is not conclusive against the employee's claim is, I think, clear having regard to the whole structure of the Schedule to the Act of 1963'.

The question in the present case is whether the employee's absence from work during week 4 was on account of a temporary cessation of work for him to do or was on account of something else, i.e. his dismissal on Monday of week 3. In our view the facts found by the tribunal show that his absence from work stemmed from the fact that there was a temporary cessation of work for him to do. In other words his absence from work during week 4 was on account of a temporary absence of work available for him personally to do and not on account of the fact of his earlier dismissal.

There is a practical objection to the employers' submission. If the employers are correct, it will in practice become difficult, if not impossible, for employees or their trade unions to agree to a phased and orderly return to work after a strike. Otherwise, continuity of employment will be disrupted in regard to those employees who, under the phasing, are not due to return in the first phase. We think that this would be an unfortunate conclusion.

For the reasons which we have given, we consider that the tribunal was correct in its decision under para 5 (1) (b) and we dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Maples, Teesdale & Co, agents for Lambert, Taylor & Galbraith, Gateshead (for the employers); W H Thompson (for the employee).

Gordon H Scott Esq Barrister.

3 [1969] 3 All ER at 1145, [1970] AC at 996

4 [1969] 3 All ER at 1150, [1970] AC at 1001

5 [1969] 3 All ER at 1151, [1970] AC at 1003

6 [1969] 3 All ER 1140, [1970] AC 984

7 [1969] 3 All ER at 1145, [1970] AC at 995

a Schaefer v Schuhmann and others

PRIVY COUNCIL

LORD WILBERFORCE, LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON, LORD HODSON, LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE AND LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA

5th, 6th, 7th, 8th JULY, 7th DECEMBER 1971

- b Privy Council – Australia – New South Wales – Family provision – Will – Contract to make disposition by will – Disposition made in performance of contract – Inadequate provision for dependants – Order for further provision out of testator's estate – Whether burden of further provision should be shared by contractual legatee – Testator leaving house and contents to housekeeper in pursuance of contract – Specific pecuniary legacies to daughters – Residue of estate to be shared by sons – Order for further provision in favour of daughters – Whether burden of further provision to be borne in part by housekeeper – Testator's Family Maintenance and Guardianship of Infants Act 1916-1954, s 3 (1).

- d By his will made in 1962 the testator gave his four daughters legacies of $2,000 each and left the residue of his estate to be shared equally between his three sons. In 1966 the testator purchased a house and, as he was in poor health, in May 1966 he engaged a housekeeper to keep house for him at $12 a week. At the end of May the testator paid the housekeeper the wages to which she was entitled up to that date and in June he instructed his solicitor to prepare a codicil to his will. The testator received the document on 28th June and, his eyesight being poor, he asked the housekeeper to read it to him. By the terms of the codicil he devised the house in which he was living and its contents to the housekeeper if she should 'still be employed by me as a housekeeper at the date of my death'. Having had it read to him the testator executed the codicil on the same day. When on the following day, or the day after, the time came to pay the housekeeper her wages he told her that he did not propose to pay her any more wages because he had left her the house. Thereafter he only paid her sufficient money to meet household expenses. She was still employed as housekeeper in November 1966 when the testator died. He left an estate worth $68,700 net, the house and its contents being worth $14,500. The four daughters of the testator applied under s 3 (1)^a of the Testator's Family Maintenance and Guardianship of Infants Act 1916-1954 for further provision for their maintenance to be made out of the estate. The court decided that, although there was a contract between the testator and the housekeeper to leave her the house and contents, it had jurisdiction under the 1916-1954 Act to throw on the property given to the housekeeper such part as it thought fit of the additional provision to which, on the evidence, it held that three of those daughters were entitled. Accordingly the court made an order in favour of the three daughters and increased their legacies, such increase to be met in the first instance by a charge on the property given to the housekeeper, except as to a sum of $2,300; thereafter the remaining burden of the orders in favour of the daughters was to fall on the three sons equally. The housekeeper appealed, contending that the court had no power to throw any of the burden of the additional provision on the property bequeathed to her and that the whole of it should come out of the residuary estate left to the sons.

- j Held (Lord Simon of Glaisdale dissenting) – The appeal would be allowed for the following reasons—

(i) it was a fair inference from the available evidence that between 28th and 30th June 1966 a change had been brought about in the contractual relations between the testator and the housekeeper whereby the contract of employment at a weekly wage was changed into a contract to serve for no wages on the footing that she was to become the owner of the house and its contents on the testator's death under his will; the executed codicil was an adequate memorandum of the contract (see p 626 h and j and p 627 c, post);

^a Section 3 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 624 f to h, post

(ii) there was no basis for the contention that, where a testator had contracted to make a disposition under his will and the contract had been performed in that the will was framed in accordance with the testator's contractual undertaking, the rights of the other party to the contract became simply the rights of a legatee, for those rights, having arisen contractually, existed independently of the will; the 1916-1954 Act was based on the supposition that a free testator had chosen to deprive his wife or children of what he was at liberty, after satisfying any contractual claims, to leave them and on which they had some moral claim for maintenance; the court had no power therefore to interfere with testamentary dispositions made in pursuance of bona fide contracts; such a power could only be given by legislation deliberately framed for that purpose (see p 629 f, p 630 a and h and p 631 a and p 633 a and d, post).

Coffill v Comr of Stamp Duties (1920) 20 NSW SR 278, Re Syme [1933] VLR 283 and dictum of Nicholls CJ in Re Richardson's Estate (1934) 29 Tas LR at 155, approved and applied.

Dictum of Giffard LJ in Re Brookman's Trust [1869] 5 Ch App at 192 considered.

Dillon v Public Trustee of New Zealand [1941] 2 All ER 284 not followed.

Notes

For provision for maintenance out of a deceased's estate, see 16 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 460-462, paras 920-922, and for cases on the subject, see 24 Digest (Repl) 971-981, 9762-9798.

For the effect of contracts to make a gift by will, see 39 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 851-852, 854, paras 1286, 1287, 1290.

Cases referred to in opinions

Brookman's Trust, Re (1869) 5 Ch App 182, 39 LJCh 138, 22 LT 891, 48 Digest (Repl) 364, 3151.

Brown, Re, Brown v Knowles (1955) 105 LJ 169.

Central Trust & Safe Deposit Co v Snider [1916] 1 AC 266, 85 LJPC 87, 114 LT 250, 20 Digest (Repl) 505, 2119.

Coffill v Comr of Stamp Duties (1920) 20 NSW SR 278.

Dillon v Public Trustee of New Zealand [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294, 165 LT 357, 24 Digest (Repl) 975, *2570.

Edwards, Macadam v Wright, Re [1957] 2 All ER 495, [1958] Ch 168, [1957] 3 WLR 131, 48 Digest (Repl) 259, 2331.

Eyre v Munro (1857) 3 K & J 305, 26 LJCh 757, 30 LTOS 561, 40 Digest (Repl) 527, 372.

Graham v Wickham (1863) 1 De GJ & Sm 474, 12 Digest (Repl) 242, 1831.

Gregor v Kemp (1722) 3 Swan 404, 36 ER 926, 40 Digest (Repl) 529, 386.

Hammersley v De Biel (1845) 12 Cl & Fin 45, 8 ER 1312, affg sub nom De Beil v Thomson (1841) 3 Beav 469, 12 Digest (Repl) 146, 918.

Heydon's Case (1584) 3 Co Rep 7a, 76 ER 637, 44 Digest (Repl) 203, 149.

Hochster v De La Tour (1853) 2 E & B 678, [1843-60] All ER Rep 12, 27 LJQB 455, 22 LTOS 171, 1 CLR 846, 12 Digest (Repl) 377, 2960.

Hyman v Hyman [1929] AC 601, [1929] All ER Rep 245, 98 LJP 81, 141 LT 329, 93 JP 209, 27 Digest (Repl) 235, 1888.

Jervis v Wolferstan (1874) LR 18 Eq 18, 43 LJCh 809, 30 LT 452, 40 Digest (Repl) 527, 369.

Jones v How (1850) 9 CB 1, 137 ER 790; subsequent proceedings, 7 Hare 267, 48 Digest (Repl) 22, 93.

Maddison v Alderson (1883) LR 8 App Cas 467, 52 LJQB 737, 49 LT 303, 47 JP 821; affg sub nom Alderson v Maddison (1881) 7 QBD 174, 12 Digest (Repl) 182, 1245.

Oliver v Perrin (1946) 2 DLR 461.

- a* Richardson's Estate, Re (1934) 29 Tas LR 149, 24 Digest (Repl) 973, *2545.
Syme, Re [1933] VLR 283.
Synge v Synge [1894] 1 QB 466, [1891-94] All ER Rep 1164, 63 LJQB 202, 70 LT 221, 58 JP 396, 42 WR 309, 12 Digest (Repl) 388, 3017.
Tait's Trustees v Lees 1886 13 R 1104.
Wells v Matthews & Ors (1914) 18 CLR 440, 12 Digest (Repl) 58, *118.
b Williams Estate, Re (1951) 4 WWR (NS) 114.

Appeal

- This was an appeal by Elizabeth Schaefer against the order of Street J in the Supreme Court of New South Wales dated 26th September 1969 made in favour of three of the four applicants, Ellen Elizabeth Schuhmann, Mary Jane Fay Lousick, Maureen Joan Williams and Catherine Eileen Seery. The applicants, who were the daughters of the deceased testator, Edward Seery, had applied to the Supreme Court of New South Wales for further provision out of his estate under the Testator's Family Maintenance and Guardianship of Infants Act 1916-1954. The effective respondent to the appeal was the respondent to the application, Cornelius Patrick Seery, the executor of the testator's will. The facts are set out in the opinion of the majority of the Board.
- d* K R Handley (of the New South Wales Bar) for the appellant.
N C H Browne-Wilkinson for the respondent.

- LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. This is an appeal by Elizabeth Schaefer against so much of an order of Street J made on 1st December 1969 in proceedings in the Supreme Court of New South Wales under the Testator's Family Maintenance and Guardianship of Infants Act 1916-1954 as imposed a charge in favour of three of the daughters of the testator, Edward Seery, on a house, 124 Nuwarra Road, Chipping Norton, which the testator had by a codicil to his will devised to the appellant. The appellant contended that the devise had been made to her in fulfilment of a contract binding on the testator. Two points arose for decision in the proceedings: the first whether the testator and the appellant had entered into an enforceable contract with regard to the house, and the second whether, if they had, the court had nevertheless jurisdiction under the Act to interfere with the benefit which the testator had conferred on the appellant in pursuance of it. The judge decided the first question in favour of the appellant but the second question against her. The effective respondent to the appeal, Cornelius Patrick Seery, a son of the testator and the sole executor of his will, contended before the Board not only that the judge was right on the question of jurisdiction but also that even if he was wrong on that point the appeal should nevertheless be dismissed because he was wrong in finding that there was an enforceable contract between the testator and the appellant.
- e* f g

- The testator, who was a retired market gardener, died on 16th November 1966, aged 76. He was a widower with seven children—three sons and four daughters, three of whom were married. All the children were over 21 at the date of their father's death. He left an estate worth some $90,000 gross. The net estate remaining after payment of debts, duties and expenses was worth about $68,700 including the house above referred to and its contents worth together $14,500. By his will which he made on 23rd January 1962 the testator gave each of his four daughters $2,000 and left the residue of his estate equally between his three sons. His wife died in 1962. In the same year he retired from business and went to live with his bachelor son Edward and his unmarried daughter Catherine in a cottage belonging to the son. Early in 1966 he decided to live by himself and purchased 124 Nuwarra Road as a home to live in. He was in poor health and at the beginning of May he advertised in the local paper for a housekeeper. The appellant, who is a married woman with three children, answered the advertisement and the testator engaged her to keep house for him at a wage of $12 a week. Her employment began on 13th May and she continued to look after the testator, who needed constant attention, and to keep house for him until his death. Her husband used to visit the house once or twice a week and there is no suggestion that the relations between the testator and the appellant were other than those between employer and employee. At the end of May the testator paid the appellant the wages to which she was entitled up to that date. Sometime in June he gave his solicitor instructions to prepare a codicil to his will. The solicitor having prepared the document posted it to the testator who received it on 28th June. His eyesight was not good and he asked the appellant to read it to him. It was in the following terms:
- h* i

'NOW I HEREBY DECLARE that if my housekeeper ELIZABETH SCHAEFER shall still be employed by me as a housekeeper at the date of my death THEN but not otherwise I GIVE DEVISE AND BEQUEATH free of all duties payable in consequence of my death unto her absolutely my house and land known as Number 124 Nuwarra Road, Chipping Norton, being the whole of the land comprised in Certificate of Title Volume 5425 Folio 9 together with all my furniture and household effects contained therein.'

Having read the codicil to him the appellant called a taxi to take the testator to the bank where he executed the document that day. Next day or the day after when the time came for the testator to pay the appellant the wages due to her he told her that he did not propose to pay her any more wages because he had left her the house—adding 'If you need any money to help you out, let me know'. The testator provided the appellant with money to meet such household expenses as were paid for in cash but he paid her no wages after the end of May.

In 1967 after the will and codicil had been proved the four daughters of the testator applied to the court under the Testator's Family Maintenance and Guardianship of Infants Act 1916-1954. The only provisions of the Act to which it is necessary to refer are ss 3 (1) and 4 (1) which are in the following terms:

'Testator's family maintenance.'

'3. (1) If any person (hereinafter called "the testator") dying or having died since the seventh day of October, one thousand nine hundred and fifteen, disposes of or has disposed of his property either wholly or partly by will, in such a manner that the widow, husband, or children of such person, or any or all of them, are left without adequate provision for their proper maintenance, education, or advancement in life as the case may be, the court may at its discretion, and taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, on application by or on behalf of such wife, husband, or children, or any of them, order that such provision for such maintenance, education, and advancement as the court thinks fit shall be made out of the estate of the testator for such wife, husband, or children, or any or all of them.

'Notice of such application shall be served by the applicant on the executor of the will of the deceased person.

'The court may order such other persons as it may think fit to be served with notice of such application . . .

'4. (1) Every provision made under this Act shall subject to this Act, operate and take effect as if the same had been made by a codicil to the will of the deceased person executed immediately before his or her death . . .'

The respondent to the applications was the executor, Cornelius Patrick Seery, but the appellant and another son, William John Seery, intervened in the proceedings by the leave of the court. The third son, Edward took no part in them. The judge having considered the evidence given by the four applicants as to their financial circumstances held that one of them, Mrs Lousick, had not established that she was left without adequate provision for her proper maintenance but that the other three applicants, Mrs Schuhmann, Mrs Williams and Miss Seery had made out cases a for relief under the Act. He decided that the legacies of $2,000 each given to Mrs Schuhmann and Mrs Williams should be increased to legacies of $12,000 each and that Miss Seery should receive a legacy of $4,000 in place of her legacy of $2,000 and in addition a life interest in a fund of $8,000. Having decided that he had jurisdiction to throw on the property given to the appellant such part as he thought fit of the additional provision which he was making for the three daughters he ordered that on b the appellant by her counsel undertaking not to bring any action against the executor for wages or other services in respect of her employment by the testator with liberty nevertheless to her to apply to be released wholly or partly from the performance of that undertaking the burden of the orders in favour of the three daughters be met in the first instance by, and be a charge on, the property given to the appellant except as to a sum of $2,300 part thereof and that thereafter the remaining burden of the c orders in favour of the daughters should fall on the three sons equally. The wages which the appellant would have received, had no other arrangements been made, in the period from the end of May to the death of the testator would have been nearly $300. So the effect of the order so far as concerns the appellant is to substitute a gift of $2,000 for the gift of the house and furniture worth some $14,500. The appellant does not dispute that the testator failed to make adequate provision for d the three daughters in question nor does she quarrel with the amount of the additional provision which the judge decided to award them. Her contention is simply that the judge had no power to throw any of it on the property given to her and that the whole of it should come out of the residuary estate left to the sons.

e Logically the first question which arises is that which the judge answered in favour of the appellant—namely whether the testator at the end of June 1966 bound himself by an enforceable contract to leave her the house by his will. The only evidence on this point is that set out above which was contained in an affidavit sworn by the appellant. It seems most unlikely that nothing more was said on either side at the time in connection with the disposal of the house beyond what was stated in the affidavit; but although the appellant was cross-examined at length on other matters f she was not asked a single question as to what the testator said to her about the gift of the house or as to how she reacted to what he said. The judge therefore had to proceed on the footing that what was stated in the affidavit was an accurate and complete record of what passed between the parties. The part of his judgment dealing with this aspect of the case is in the following terms:

g [Counsel for the appellant] has presented a powerful argument to the effect that the production to [the appellant] of this codicil for her to read, coupled with her subsequent rendering of these services, constituted a contract whereby the testator bound himself to leave this cottage to her if she should still be employed by him at the date of his death. The specific promise as propounded by [counsel for the appellant] was in the following terms: "On 28th h June, 1966, the testator made a written offer to [the appellant] that if she would work as his housekeeper until his death he would leave to her by will the property at 124 Nuwarra Road, Chipping Norton, together with furniture and household effects therein at his death."

i 'A number of questions arise in connexion with this argument. The first of these is whether or not what took place between the testator and [the appellant] was contractual in its nature. [Counsel] has contended that the facts fall rather within the type of situation described by Griffith, C.J. and Isaacs, J. . . . in *Wells v. Matthews & Ors*¹. This initial question is itself one of considerable difficulty, due in no small measure to the paucity of evidence from which one might infer that a contract had come into existence. [Counsel for the appellant] contends that the testator's asking [the appellant] to read the codicil aloud was a communication of the offer. Were it not for the conversation at the end of June, deposed to in para. 15, I should have had great difficulty in concluding that this was intended to be contractual on the testator's part. The inescapable fact, however, is that the testator was then dependent to a large extent upon [the appellant's] continuing attention to his needs. The position in which she was employed was not perhaps a very attractive one, and he may well have anticipated difficulty in filling it again. It is quite clear that on any view of the evidence he held out to [the appellant] the knowledge that he had made this codicil in this way as an inducement to her to continue in his employment. The fact that he intended her to alter her position upon the faith of what was set forth in the codicil is borne out by the conversation towards the end of June to the effect that he would no longer pay her wages. It seems in these circumstances that one is justified in drawing the inference that his submission of the codicil to her for perusal—albeit that it was a perusal associated with it being read aloud to him—was intended by him to bring its contents to her notice, and to induce her to continue to serve him in her then capacity. I am disposed accordingly to regard the communication of this codicil to her as associated with a contractual intention on the part of the testator. The contract came into existence by reason of [the appellant] having discharged the consideration contemplated in the wording of the codicil, namely, being still employed as the testator's housekeeper at the date of his death. This connotes an element of the continuity in the employment from the date the codicil was shown to her through until the death of the testator.

It is contended that there was not sufficient memorandum of the contract, being one falling within the Statute of Frauds, to render it the subject of recognition in this Court. I am of the view, however, that the terms of the codicil themselves, being capable of being regarded—as I do regard them—as a written communication of the offer, are sufficient in that behalf.

Counsel for the respondent attacked the judge's finding that there was an enforceable contract on two grounds. In the first place he submitted that it was wrong to treat the communication to her of the terms of the codicil which he was about to execute as a contractual offer which she could convert into a binding contract by continuing to serve him. His reason for getting her to read the codicil to him was no doubt not simply that his sight was bad. It was a fair inference that by making known to her that he was leaving her the house by will if she remained in his service he was hoping to induce her to remain in an employment which she might well come to find increasingly irksome. But there is, it was argued, a world of difference between saying 'See what you will get under my will if you look after me until I die' and saying 'If you undertake to look after me until I die I will execute this document and not revoke it.' Secondly counsel submitted that even if there was a contract the codicil was not an adequate memorandum of it. He conceded that the fact that it was not executed until after the contract was alleged to have been made was no objection to its sufficiency as a memorandum but he submitted that it was defective first because it did not indicate the existence of any contract and secondly because it did not state any consideration. Their Lordships agree with the judge that it is a fair inference to be drawn from the scanty material available that between 28th and 30th June 1966 a change was brought about in the contractual relations between the testator and the appellant. The contract of employment at a weekly wage of $12 was changed into a contract to serve for no wages on the footing that she was to become owner of the house and its contents on the testator's death under his will. That in the event she had to serve for only five months more to secure a house worth over $14,000 and that the testator left his daughters insufficiently provided for are circumstances which incline one to view the appellant's case with little sympathy; but the result in law of what passed between them between 28th and 30th June would have been just the same if she had subsequently served for five years a without wages, if the testator had had no family to provide for, and if he had revoked the codicil on his death bed and left the house to some new friend. Their Lordships think that the new contract may well not have come into being until the testator, after he had executed the codicil which the appellant had previously read, told her that as he had left her the house by will he was not going to pay her any more wages and she acquiesced in this arrangement. Viewed in that way the contract b would have been a contract not to revoke the gift provided that she continued to serve him until his death and no memorandum would have been necessary. But it is somewhat unreal to draw a hard and fast line between what happened on 28th June and what happened on 29th or 30th June and although their Lordships feel the force of counsel's submissions as to treating the reading of the draft codicil as a contractual offer they think that the judge was entitled to consider what was the testator's intention c in causing her to read it in the light of what he said to her next day or the day after. Again if once one views the terms of the codicil as a contractual offer capable of acceptance by conduct it would be an intolerable refinement to say that the executed codicil was not an adequate memorandum. By whichever route the result is arrived at their Lordships are not prepared to differ from the conclusion reached by the judge on the contract point.

d Their Lordships turn now to the question of the jurisdiction of the court under the 1916-1954 Act. The Act contains no definition of the 'estate' out of which the court is empowered by s 3 (1) to make provision for members of the family. It is, however, clear that it cannot mean the gross estate passing to the executor but must be confined to the net estate available to answer the dispositions made by the will. Again if one reads the section without having in mind the particular problem created by dispositions made in pursuance of previous contracts the e language suggests that what the court is given power to do is to make such provision for members of the testator's family as the testator ought to have made, and could have made, but failed to make. The view that the court is not being given power to do something which the testator could not effectually have done himself received strong support from s 4 (1) which says that a provision made under the Act is to f operate and take effect as if it had been made by a codicil executed by the testator immediately before his death.

That being the apparent meaning of the Act their Lordships pass to consider what are the rights of a person on whom a testator has agreed for valuable consideration under a bona fide contract to confer a benefit by will. If the benefit contracted for is a legacy the testator is at liberty to dispose of his property during his lifetime as he thinks fit; but on his death, if he has failed to leave the legacy the promisee can g claim payment from his estate (*Hammersley v De Biel*²). Further if he dies insolvent then whether or not he has left the legacy by his will the other party to the contract is entitled to claim as a creditor for the amount of the legacy. This is shown by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Chancery in *Graham v Wickham*³. There a father covenanted on the marriage of his son Charles by his will to give and bequeath to him h £2,500 to be held on certain trusts. Under his own marriage settlement the father had a power of appointment amongst his four children over a fund of £10,000 which in default of appointment was to pass to his children equally. By his will he appointed £2,500, part of the £10,000, to Charles saying that it was to be taken in discharge of his covenant; but it was held that this appointment could not satisfy the covenant since the fund of £10,000 did not belong to the testator but belonged j to his children subject to their father's power of distribution. The father died insolvent and it was argued on behalf of his ordinary creditors that the £2,500 covenanted to be left in the form of a legacy was only payable out of assets applicable for payment of legacies and was not a debt coming into competition with other debts. The Lords Justices rejected that argument and held that the covenant to leave £2,500

2 (1845) 12 Cl & Fin 45

3 (1863) 1 De GJ & Sm 474

by will created a specialty debt. The decision would plainly have been the same had the testator bequeathed Charles a legacy of £2,500 but died, as he did, without assets sufficient to meet it as a legacy. If the covenant had been a covenant to leave a share of residue the decision would, of course, have been different since residue is only ascertained after debts have been paid (see *Jervis v Wolferstan*⁴).

If the contract is to devise or bequeath specific property the position of the promisee during the testator's lifetime is stronger than if the contract is simply to leave a legacy. If the testator sells the property during his lifetime the promisee can treat the sale as a repudiation of the contract and recover damages at law, which will be assessed subject to a reduction for the acceleration of the benefit and also if the benefit of the contract is personal to the promisee subject to a deduction for the contingency of his failing to survive the promisor. But if he can intervene before a purchaser for value without notice obtains an interest in the property he can obtain a declaration of his right to have it left to him by will and an injunction to restrain the testator from disposing of it in breach of contract (*Synge v Synge*⁵). No doubt if the property is land he could also register the contract or a caution against the title. Their Lordships were not referred to any case which deals with the position which would arise if the testator under such a contract retained the property in question until his death but died insolvent. It must however follow from *Graham v Wickham*⁶ that the property would form part of the general estate available for the payment of debts but that the promisee would be entitled to rank as a creditor for the value of the property as at the death in competition with other creditors of the same degree. If, therefore, the testator in this case had died insolvent the appellant would have had a right to be paid a dividend on a proof for $14,500 and if the assets had been nearly sufficient to cover all the liabilities that dividend would have amounted to nearly the whole value of the house. If, on the other hand, the testator had left just sufficient assets to meet all his other liabilities without recourse to the house then, if the respondent is right, the court would have power to take the house away from the appellant and give it to the daughters. That the promisee might be better off if the testator died insolvent than if he died solvent would be very odd. Again if the respondent is right the promisee might be better off if the testator broke his contract by selling the property in question in his lifetime than if he kept it, since in the latter event the property might be taken from the promisee by an exercise by the court of its powers under the Act. In the case of *Dillon v Public Trustee of New Zealand*⁷—hereafter referred to—it was suggested that any damages which the promisor was ordered to pay would be assessed in the light of the possibility of the exercise by the court of its jurisdiction but it is difficult to see how in practice any deduction could be made for this contingency since at the date of the breach sued on it would be quite uncertain whether or not on any occasion for exercise of the court's powers under the Act would arise on the testator's death. If a testator having contracted to leave property by will to A leaves it to B and there is no need to have recourse to the property to pay his debts, then the executor will be ordered to convey it to A as the person beneficially entitled to it (see *Synge v Synge*⁸, Re Edwards, *Macadam v Wright*⁹). It is not easy to see how on the wording of the Act the court, in some circumstances at least, could have jurisdiction to override this trust arising in favour of the promisee. Suppose, for example, that the testator in this case had made a codicil immediately before his death revoking the devise to the appellant and leaving the house to his three daughters for whom he was held to have made insufficient provision and that the appellant claimed to have the house transferred to her under the trust in her favour arising by reason of the contract. If the words 'disposes of his property by will' as used in s 3 (1) include property which the testator has disposed of in breach of contract then

4 (1874) LR 18 Eq 18 at 24

5 [1894] 1 QB 466, [1891-94] All ER Rep 1164

6 (1863) 1 De GJ & Sm 474

7 [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294

8 [1894] 1 QB at 470, 471

9 [1957] 2 All ER 495, [1958] Ch 168

a the condition precedent to the arising of the court's jurisdiction would not be satisfied since the applicants' lack of provision would not be due to the dispositions of the will but to the appellant's insistence on her rights under the contract. If, on the other hand, the property to which the section refers does not include property which the testator has bound himself by contract to dispose of in a particular way it is hard to see how the court can have jurisdiction under the section to make orders affecting such property.

b Counsel for the respondent faced with these anomalies submitted that at all events if the testator died solvent having performed his contract the rights of the other party to the contract became as from that moment simply the rights of a legatee or devisee; that notwithstanding that the testator could not have made any other disposition without breaking his contract the court despite the wording of s 4 (1) could make a fresh disposition which he could not effectually have made; and that c the fact that the promisee might have been better off if the testator had died insolvent or broken his contract was irrelevant. The only English authority which counsel cited in support of these submissions was a dictum of Giffard LJ in *Re Brookman's Trust*¹⁰, where he said:

d 'If a testator is bound to make a will in a certain form, the law says there is no breach provided he makes a will in due form, and it is not owing to any act of his that the child does not take.'

In that case a father covenanted on his daughter's marriage to make a certain provision either by inter vivos settlement or by will for his daughter and her family. He made the provision by will and the terms of it followed exactly the wording of the covenant; but as the gift was by will the interest of a beneficiary who predeceased e the testator, and which had the provision been made by deed would have passed to his estate, lapsed. Malins VC¹¹ held that the will ought to have contained a declaration against lapse but Giffard LJ held on appeal that the absence of a declaration against lapse did not amount to a breach of the covenant. In the context of the actual decision it is their Lordships think impossible to treat the words of Giffard LJ f quoted above¹² as an authority which lends any support to the argument on behalf of the respondent.

Counsel for the appellant referred the Board to two cases in Australian courts which are inconsistent with the proposition that if the estate is solvent and the contract is performed the rights of the other party to the contract become simply the rights of a legatee. The first is a decision of the Court of Appeal in New South Wales (*Coffill v Comr of Stamp Duties*¹³). There a business which had been carried on g by a husband and wife in partnership was sold and the wife who had brought considerable sums of money into the partnership applied for her share of the assets. Thereupon an agreement was made between them that in consideration of the wife giving up all claims to the assets the husband should make a will leaving her £5,000 and not revoke it to her prejudice. After the husband's death the question arose whether in calculating duty the £5,000 left to the wife was deductible as a debt and h it was held that it was. The Chief Justice, after quoting *Graham v Wickham*¹⁴ and an earlier case of *Eyre v Munro*¹⁵ which is to the same effect, said¹⁶:

'It seems to me therefore that it is not open to the Commissioner to treat this particular legatee as if she had no other right than that which appears on the face of the will naming her as legatee. She is a person who could have sued for her share, whatever it was in the moneys realised by the sale of the partnership assets, and on the evidence before us only forbore to sue on the undertaking that j the money should be made good to her by the will of her husband.'

¹⁰ (1869) 5 Ch App 182 at 192

¹¹ In Re Brookman's Trust [1869] 5 Ch App 182

¹² (1869) 5 Ch App at 192

¹³ (1920) 20 NSW SR 278

¹⁴ (1863) 1 De GJ & Sm 474

¹⁵ (1857) 3 K & J 305

¹⁶ (1920) 20 NSW SR at 285

That decision, which seems to their Lordships to be good sense as well as good law, is inconsistent with the view that the mere fact that the estate is solvent and the contract performed turns the other party to the contract from a creditor into a mere legatee. The second case is *Re Syme*¹⁷. The facts are somewhat complicated and their Lordships do not think it necessary to set them out; but they agree with counsel for the appellant that that decision also is inconsistent with the proposition advanced by counsel for the respondent.

In 1935 the very point which their Lordships have to decide came before the Court of Appeal in Tasmania in the case of *Re Richardson's Estate*¹⁸. The facts there were that the testator had been separated from his wife for some thirty years before his death in 1934. From 1920 until his death, he lived with a Mrs Henderson. They pooled their resources and agreed that they should make mutual wills in one another's favour. In pursuance of that agreement the testator left his estate to Mrs Henderson. His wife and daughter brought proceedings under the Testator's Family Maintenance Act which gave the Tasmanian court the same powers as are given to the court by the New South Wales Act and contained in s 9 a provision similar to that contained in s 4 (1) of the New South Wales Act. When he heard the case at first instance Nicholls CJ, while pointing out that if the testator had broken his contract Mrs Henderson could have recovered damages, accepted the submission of counsel that as he had performed it the court had jurisdiction to make an order but he dismissed the application on the merits. The widow and daughter appealed and the appeal was dismissed by Nicholls CJ and Crisp J, Clark J dissenting. In his judgment dismissing the appeal Nicholls CJ expressed himself as follows¹⁹:

'All that I propose to add to what I already have said on this case, is that the respondent's rights do not arise under the will. They arise contractually and exist independently of the will. If the testator had made no will, or had made a will leaving everything to his widow and daughter, he would have made a breach of his contract with the respondent. She then could have sued for damages for the breach, and the measure of her damages would have been the value of the testator's estate. Her status afterwards would have been that of a judgment creditor. It is true that the performance of the contract was to be, and actually was, in the form of a will, but, as is proved by the fact that it prevents a cause of action for breach arising, the will operates as the performance of the contract, not as bounty, as it would in the ordinary case of a testator giving, by way of a free gift, property which he had the right to dispose of as he pleased. As against the respondent, he had no right to leave his property to his widow and child. Any interference with respondent's rights now, must amount to wholly or partially setting aside the contract. What we are asked to do is to reduce contractual rights to the level of gifts under a will, and to make the performance of the contract the reason why we can prevent its full performance, and to do that by an order which by section 9 will take effect as if it were a codicil, which as a fact the testator had no right to make. The "Testator's Family Maintenance Act" is based solely upon the supposition that a free testator has chosen to deprive his wife or children of what he was at liberty to leave to them and upon which they have some moral claim for maintenance. In such a case the Court is given a discretion to do what the testator could and should have done, but no more.'

Crisp J concurred in the dismissal of the appeal on the ground that Nicholls CJ was in any case right in exercising his discretion against the appellants. Clark J on the other hand thought that the court had jurisdiction and that Nicholls CJ had exercised his discretion wrongly. He appears to have recognised that if the testator had broken his contract Mrs Henderson would have been entitled to damages but he thought that a as the contract had been performed the court had jurisdiction notwithstanding s 9. Were it not for the decision of the Board in *Dillon v Public Trustee of New Zealand*²⁰, which is the sheet anchor of the respondent's case, their Lordships would have had no hesitation in preferring the view of Nicholls CJ in *Re Richardson's Estate*¹ to that of Clark J supported as it is by a consistent body of authority, earlier referred to, both in England and Australia as to the nature of the rights of persons under a contract to make a bequest by will.

¹⁷ [1933] VLR 283

¹⁸ (1934) 29 Tas LR 149

¹⁹ (1934) 29 Tas LR at 155

b But on the other side, and clearly out of line with this body of authority is Dillon's case²⁰, the facts of which were as follows. Henry Dillon senior, a widower aged 79 with five grown up children, entered into a written agreement on 2nd February 1933 with his two sons. There had been litigation between the parties. The agreement which compromised the litigation provided that the lands belonging to the father and the sons respectively should be farmed in partnership, that one son should be appointed manager and devote his whole time to the work and that the other should work full time in the business as a general hand. Clause 17 was in the following terms:

c 'That the said Henry Dillon senior shall by his last will devise and bequeath his own farm lands to his trustees upon trust for his son Henry Dillon junior and his two daughters Mary Kathleen Dillon and Eileen Dillon in equal shares subject however to an annuity or rentcharge of fifty pounds (£50) per annum in favour of his daughter Elsie Higgins and shall forthwith execute a will containing such devise and bequest'

d

On 24th August 1935, when he was 81, Henry Dillon married again. It does not appear whether he had made a will implementing cl 17 of the agreement, but if he had the will was revoked by the marriage. On 17th March 1936 he made his last will devising his farm lands pursuant to cl 17 of the agreement and leaving his residue to his wife. He died on 29th January 1937 and on 28th July the widow applied to the court under the Family Protection Act 1908 asking for further provision to be made for her out of her husband's estate. Section 33 (1) of the Act—which corresponds to s 3 of the New South Wales Act—is in the following terms:

e

f 'If any person (hereinafter called the "testator") dies leaving a will, and without making therein adequate provision for the proper maintenance and support of the testator's wife, husband, or children, the court may at its discretion, on application by or on behalf of the said wife, husband, or children, order that such provision as the court thinks fit shall be made out of the estate of the testator for such wife, husband, or children.'

g

The Act contains no definition of 'estate' and no section corresponding to s 4 (1) of the New South Wales Act. Northcroft J, before whom the application came at first instance, held that the principle of two earlier cases which decided that agreements between husband and wife, whether made before or after marriage, under which she purported to relinquish all rights under the Act and to free her husband from his obligations under it were void covered the instant case, and on the merits he made an order in favour of the widow. That decision was reserved by the Court of Appeal—Myers CJ and Ostler J, Smith J dissenting. Myers CJ in his judgment first said that the two cases on which Northcroft J relied had no application to contracts made by the husband in the ordinary course of business. He then set out what were the rights of the promisees under the agreement made by the testator both before and after his death in accordance with the decision in *Synge v Synge*² and said that it would be an extraordinary thing if the fact that the testator had performed his agreement put the promisees in a worse position than they would have been in had he broken it

h

i

20 [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294

1 (1934) 29 Tas LR 149

2 [1894] 1 QB 466, [1891-94] All ER Rep 1164

either by selling the property in his lifetime or leaving it by will to someone else. Finally he said that a person to whom a devise is made in pursuance of an agreement could not properly be regarded as an object of the testator's bounty and that the power given to the court by the Act did not extend beyond cancelling or diminishing in favour of his widow and children bequests made by him to other objects of his bounty. The judgment of Ostler J was to the same effect as that of Myers CJ. Smith J in his dissenting judgment said (1) that the agreement gave the promisees no interest in the lands but only a right to have the will framed in a particular way, (2) that the testator had fulfilled his contract by framing the will in that way, (3) that their right to the lands arose through an exercise of the testator's testamentary power—albeit he was obliged to exercise it in a particular way—and was therefore subject to the control of the court in the same way as any other benefit conferred by the will, (4) that if the testator failed to carry out his contract any right to damages or to specific performance to which the promisees would become entitled would be assessed or granted subject to, and in the light of, the exercise or possible exercise by the court of its powers under the Act.

The widow appealed to the Privy Council³ which allowed the appeal. The reasoning of the Board follows closely the dissenting judgment of Smith J. The testator's children—it was said—were simply devisees and not creditors; the testator did what he contracted to do; and if he had broken his contract the children's right to damages or specific performance would have been assessed or granted subject to the possible or actual impact of the power of the court under the Act. So far as appears the attention of the Board was not drawn either to the case, of *Coffill*⁴ and *Syme*⁵, which proceed on the footing that the fact that the testator carries out his contract does not change the character of the promisee's rights, or to the case of *Re Richardson's Estate*⁶.

Counsel for the respondent submitted in the court below that *Dillon's case*³ could be distinguished from this case because the New Zealand statute which was then under consideration contained no provision corresponding to s 4 (1) of the New South Wales Act. Street J refused to draw such a distinction and their Lordships think that he was clearly right to refuse to draw it. The terms of s 33 of the New Zealand Act and of s 3 of the New South Wales Act themselves indicate that the power of the court extends no further than the power of the testator. Section 4 (1) of the New South Wales Act only emphasises and makes explicit what would be implicit in the Act if it were not there. Refusing as he rightly did to distinguish *Dillon's case*³ Street J naturally followed it in the present case and held that he had jurisdiction to charge the house devised to the appellant with part of the provision which he thought it right to make for the testator's daughters.

In the light of the arguments presented to the Board on behalf of the appellant which were, it would seem, far fuller than those presented to the Board on behalf of the respondent in *Dillon's case*³ their Lordships, had the matter been res integra, would not have hesitated to hold that the court had no jurisdiction. But the matter is not res integra and *Dillon's case*³ was decided 30 years ago. It is true that it has met with some criticism both judicial and academic. Thus in *Oliver v Perrin*⁷ a case on all fours with *Dillon's case*³ which came before the Court of Appeal in Ontario but where all the judges in fact agreed that the claim failed in any case on the merits, Laidlaw JA plainly thought that *Dillon's case*³ was wrongly decided; and in *Re Williams Estate*⁸ Egbert J said by way of dictum that it was 'a somewhat surprising decision'. Again it was criticised by D M Gordon QC in the Canadian Bar Review⁹ and by the editor of Theobald on Wills¹⁰. On the other hand it may well be that

3 [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294

4 (1920) 20 NSWLR 278

5 [1933] VLR 283

6 (1934) 29 Tas LR 149

7 (1946) 2 DLR 461

8 (1951) 4 WWR (NS) 114

9 In two articles entitled 'The conflict between limitations on testamentary power by statute and contract': (1941) 19 Can BR 603; (1942) 20 Can BR 72

10 (1963) 12 Edn, pp 97, 98

a it has been on occasion accepted without argument as correct and that orders have been made in reliance on it (cf *Re Brown*¹¹).

In these circumstances their Lordships have considered anxiously whether or not they ought to decline to follow it. The conclusion which they have reached is that they should decline to follow it. It seems most unlikely that those who framed the New Zealand and New South Wales statutes—or for the matter of that the English Inheritance (Family Provision) Act 1938—had the problem posed by contracts to leave legacies or to dispose of property by will in mind. The question whether contracts made by a testator not with a view to excluding the jurisdiction of the court under the Act but in the normal course of arranging his affairs in his lifetime should be liable to be wholly or partially set aside by the court under legislation of this character is a question of social policy on which different people may reasonably take different views. In this connection it is not without interest to observe that, by the Law Reform (Testamentary Promises) Acts 1944 and 1949, the New Zealand legislature has itself enacted provisions designed to protect persons who have rendered services to testators in reliance on promises on their part which have not been honoured to leave them benefits by will. If and so far as it is thought desirable that the courts of any country should have power to interfere with testamentary dispositions made in pursuance of bona fide contracts to make them, it is, their Lordships think, better that such a power should be given by legislation deliberately framed with that end in view rather than by the placing of a construction on legislation couched in the form of that under consideration in this case which results in such astonishing anomalies as flow from the decision in *Dillon's case*¹². Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal be allowed.

e If the judge had realised that he had no power to throw any part of the provision to be made for the daughters on the property devised to the appellant he might perhaps have made smaller provision for them. Their Lordships will therefore advise that the case be remitted to the court below for it to decide what additional provision should be made for the three daughters out of the estate of the testator on the footing that the testator had disposed of his property by will in such a manner that they were left without adequate provision for their maintenance, but that the court had no power to throw any part of any provision to be made for them on the property devised to the appellant.

f The costs of the appellant of her appeal to the Board taxed as between party and party will be paid out of the residuary estate.

g LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. I regret that I differ from the majority of their Lordships on the central issue of this appeal; in my judgment *Dillon's case*¹² was correctly decided. Moreover, I do not think that a contract between the testator and the appellant was ever established by her. But if this latter were my only matter of disagreement I should not have ventured to express my dissent from the majority of their Lordships, since the issue is, in all its circumstances, peculiar to the instant appeal. But the issue on *Dillon's case*¹² is of profound social importance and of potentially widespread repercussion. The New South Wales Testator's Family Maintenance and Guardianship of Infants Act 1916-1954, in its vindication of rights and duties of maintenance within the family, is concerned with a fundamental institution of society and with basic human rights; the statute has its counterpart in other jurisdictions; and the decision in *Dillon's case*¹² has stood for 30 years. So far as I am aware, there has only been one legislative modification of its effect, and that largely endorses it: the New Zealand Law Reform Act 1944, s 3, (now the Law Reform (Testamentary Promises) Act 1949) although providing that where a claimant proves an express or implied promise to reward him for services or work by making some testamentary provision for him the claim is to be enforceable against the estate of the deceased to the extent to which the deceased has failed to make that testamentary provision, goes on to stipulate that, if no amount is specified or if the promise (as in *Dillon's case*¹³ and in the instant appeal) relates to real property or to personal property other than money, the court may order payment to the claimant of such amount as is reasonable having regard, inter alia, to the nature and amounts of the claims of other persons against the estate, whether as creditors, beneficiaries, wife, husband, children, next-of-kin, or otherwise—which would seem to contemplate the statutory claims of family dependants competing with contractual claims, the competition to be resolved so as best to do justice to all concerned, exactly as envisaged by the Board in *Dillon's case*¹³. In view of the foregoing matters, I have felt bound to overcome my diffidence in expressing dissent.

11 (1955) 105 LJ 169

12 [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294

The effect of overruling *Dillon's case*¹³ is that the New South Wales statute is so construed as to countenance the following situation: a widower is left with two infant children; he proposes marriage to another woman, promising to bequeath her the whole of his estate if she will accept him; she does accept him on these terms; he dies shortly afterwards; the court is powerless to order any provision out of his estate for his infant children. The legislatures of the various jurisdictions concerned may wish to consider this situation.

The alleged contract

The contract was alleged by the appellant to have been constituted by a written offer made to her by the testator on 28th June 1966 through his having asked her to read aloud the draft codicil sent to him by his solicitor, such offer allegedly having been accepted by performance on her part. But the codicil is not framed as a contractual offer; and I cannot see that it can become one through a purposing testator of failing eyesight asking his housekeeper, the purposed beneficiary, to read it to him. It is not alleged that the contract was constituted otherwise—for example, that the testator promised not to revoke the executed codicil in consideration of the appellant working for him without wages during joint lives, which is the (different) sort of contract the subsequent conversation about wages might have implied, if it were capable of being evidence of any contractual relationship at all. The codicil made no reference to the forgoing of wages. I can see the holding out of an inducement by the testator, but no contractual offer by him. I can see conduct by the appellant consistent with the expectation of a testamentary reward, but nothing which is only reasonably explicable on the basis that she was accepting by conduct a contractual offer. I cannot believe that if the appellant had left the service of the testator before his death—say, to remarry—she would have been adjudged to have been guilty of breach of contract.

The sort of testamentary provision with which the instant appeal is concerned is far from uncommon; and there must have been many cases in which the draft or the executed provision has been brought to the notice of the purposed beneficiary. But I know of only one case where it has been suggested that the testator (or purposing testator) was thereby contractually bound to carry out the testamentary disposition in question or that the proposed beneficiary became thereby a creditor of the estate. That one case, *Maddison v Alderson*¹⁴, has striking similarities to the instant one, although the evidence there in support of a contract was stronger and a jury had found a contract established; yet the House of Lords unanimously held the evidence to be insufficient to support the jury's findings. The appellant in that case was induced to serve the testator as his housekeeper without wages for many years by his oral promises to make a will leaving her a life estate in his farm; he did in fact sign a will with such a provision, which he read over to her, asking her 'whether she was satisfied'; but it was not duly attested. The Earl of Selborne LC discerned¹⁵—

¹³ [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294

¹⁵ (1883) LR 8 App Cas at 472

¹⁴ (1883) LR 8 App Cas 467

- a* 'conduct on the part of the appellant (affecting her arrangements in life and pecuniary interests) induced by promises of her master to leave her a life estate in the Moulton Manor Farm by will, rather than one of definite contract, for mutual considerations, made between herself and him at any particular time.'

Lord O'Hagan, in addition to concurring with the reasoning of the Earl of Selborne LC, said¹⁶:

- b* '... there would be no ground for inferring a contract for the conveyance or devise of landed estate to the person rendering the service, however valuable it might have been, and however clear might be the right to remuneration for it in another way, the rendering of it not being necessarily referable to any such contract.'

- c* Lord Blackburn said¹⁷:

'... the evidence is evidence from which a contract would not have been found by a jury, if it had been explained to them that to make a contract there must be a bargain between both parties.'

- d* Lord Fitzgerald said¹⁸:

- e* '... the acts of the [appellant] had no necessary reference to any contract such as is relied on, or indeed to any contract whatever... and would be properly accounted for by some expectation of bounty from her master... There is not to be found in it [the will] any allusion to any agreement or promise or representation, nor is the intended devise for her benefit said to be as a reward for her services... although [the testator] probably made representations to her of the benefits he intended to confer on her if she remained with him during his life, there never was any agreement binding on him to do so.'

All these observations seem to me to be cogently applicable to the instant case; indeed, the first, with its reference to 'promises', is a fortiori.

- f* *Dillon's case*¹⁹

I do not presume to cover ground already traversed by the opinion of the Board in *Dillon's case*¹⁹. What I propose to say is by way of marginal comment.

The 'mischief' of the statute

- g* Men and women necessarily have different functions to perform in the creation of new members of society and in their upbringing to independent membership. A functional division of co-operative labour generally calls for a sharing of the rewards of the labour. The social function carried out by women in the bearing and upbringing of children puts them at an economic disadvantage. Indeed, it is by the woman's assumption of responsibility as childbearer and homekeeper that the man is freed for his assumption of responsibility as breadwinner. In consequence of this division of responsibility the man incurs an obligation to share the loaf with the woman and the woman acquires a right to share in it. Similarly, their children, who did not ask to be brought into the world and whose upbringing is required by society for its continuity, have a right to support until capable of self-support—primarily from their father, since it is he who has been released to be the breadwinner. The family is the social and legal institution within which these various rights and obligations are worked out.

- j* Moreover, the rights and obligations do not necessarily come to an end on the death of the husband and parent. The wife's needs and, generally, her economic impairment subsist. The children continue to need support until themselves ready to

¹⁶ (1883) LR 8 App Cas at 486

¹⁷ (1883) LR 8 App Cas at 487

¹⁸ (1883) LR 8 App Cas at 492, 493

¹⁹ [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294

assume independent membership of their society. On the other hand, the means of the husband and father available for the support of wife and child are not necessarily cut off by his death. He may have been enabled to make an accumulation which is available. a Most societies enforce by law the husband and parent's duty to provide for dependants not only during joint lives but after death as well. Many adopt a system whereby a portion of a deceased's estate is reserved from his testamentary power and allocated to the support of his dependants. The Scottish system of jus relictæ for the widow and legitim for the children, leaving only the 'dead's part' (a third if there are widow and children) subject to testamentary disposition, is an example. 'Whatever may be the nature of the jus relictæ, whether a claim for division or a claim for debt', said the Lord Justice-Clerk (Lord Moncrieff), in *Tait's Trustees v Lees*²⁰, 'this at all events is certain that the testator has no right and no power to test upon it'. Such a system obtained in England until the end of the 17th century (and even later by local custom). Then, after an interval of unbridled testamentary licence, English law and its associated systems adopted a discretionary code, first in the New Zealand Family Protection Act 1908 (which fell for construction in *Dillon's case*¹), and then in similar legislation elsewhere, including the New South Wales Family Maintenance and Guardianship of Infants Act 1916-1954, with which (as amended) we are concerned in the instant appeal, and the English Inheritance (Family Provision) Act 1938. b

c
d

The legislative intention cannot therefore be in doubt: it was to prevent family dependants being thrown on the world with inadequate provision, when the person on whom they were dependent died possessed of sufficient estate to provide for or contribute towards their maintenance. This was the 'mischief' for which the statute was providing a remedy; and the courts should endeavour so to construe the statute as to advance the remedy and abate the mischief: *Heydon's Case*². A construction which permits the sort of situation which I gave as an illustration at the beginning of this opinion obviously fails to fulfil this requirement. e

The competing claims on the estate

We are concerned here with three different sorts of social obligation to which legal effect has been given. The first arises because a system of quid pro quo is fundamental to ordered human society. Legal regimes therefore enforce contractual obligations if the promisor himself makes default; and, if the promisor dies in default, will generally make his personal representative do what the deceased should himself have done. The second type of obligation arises where property gets into a person's hands which is not meant for his own benefit and in such circumstances that justice demands that he should use it for the purpose for which it was in fact intended. Obvious examples are the situations of a trustee or of the personal representative of a deceased's estate. I accept that where A covenants to bequeath property to B, A's personal representative will generally be constructive trustee of the property for B, and that the law (as developed in courts of equity) will generally compel the personal representative to do what the deceased should himself have done. The third type of obligation—that of a deceased to provide for his dependants—arises juristically from the statute, which (like that rule of equity) empowers the court to order the personal representative to do what the deceased should himself have done. f
g
h

But I cannot see any reason, social or juridical, which makes the first two types of obligation in any way more potent or overriding than the third. On the contrary, a statutory provision generally prevails over a rule of judge-made law where there is any conflict. But in the instant situation, in my view, none of the three types of obligation overrides any other; they are concurrent. The promisee's contractual or equitable rights fall to be considered along with the dependant's statutory rights. i

20 1886 13 R 1104 at 1110

2 (1584) 3 Co Rep 7a

1 [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294

- a In my judgment the headnote in *Dillon's case*³ correctly summarises the opinion of the Board:

'The court, in considering how its discretion should be exercised and how far it is just and necessary to modify the provisions of a will, will pay regard to the circumstances in which the will is drawn as it is, to the interests of the members of the family, and to all relevant circumstances, among which may be the fact that the testator was under obligation to a third party.'

- b On this approach justice will so far as possible be done to all concerned. Certainly, in the instant case Street J's order seems to me to be an entirely just one.

- c Even on a narrowly technical approach, the property which was the subject-matter of the alleged covenant passed into the hands of the executor. As Lord Parker of Waddington said in *Central Trust & Safe Deposit Co v Snider*⁴:

'... the testator's promise to devise a moiety of the property in her favour is inconsistent with her being intended to remain in equity the owner of such moiety, whether the testator did or did not make such a devise. A contract to devise a beneficial interest assumes an estate in the person who contracts sufficient to enable the contract to be performed, and it would be contrary to ordinary equitable principles to construe a promise to settle as a present declaration of trust.'

- d To apply these words to the instant case, the property allegedly promised to the appellant remained the testator's up to the moment of his death; the property was part of the estate of the testator; as such it passed on death to his executor; then, for the first time, the appellant acquired an interest in it; but then, simultaneously, her interest had to compete with that of the testator's dependants under the statute. (Insofar as *Synge v Synge*⁵ appears to decide that a promisee has any interest before the death of the promisor, it not only seems to depend on *Hochster v De La Tour*⁶ being good law, but also to be inconsistent with the line of authorities which establishes that the promisee must survive the promisor in order to have any remedy: *Jones v How*⁷;
- f *Re Brookman's Trust*⁸.)

The authorities

- I do not find it necessary to discuss all the many authorities which were cited to us. How difficult of reconciliation is the totality of the case law is to be seen from the article by W A Lee, 'Contracts to make Wills'⁹; and insofar as principles of distinction can be discerned it is often difficult to grasp either their logic or their justice. Of the cases cited to us, apart from *Dillon's case*¹⁰, only *Re Richardson's Estate*¹¹ had the instant situation in judicial contemplation—namely, a contractual or equitable claim competing with one under the statute. In *Richardson's case*¹¹, Nicholls CJ held that the promisee's equitable rights prevailed over the dependants' statutory rights (in effect, accepting the argument advanced by the instant appellant). Clark J, dissenting, held that the testator had fulfilled his obligation by making a will in implementation of his covenant; and that the court was not precluded from making family provision out of the estate (in effect, accepting the argument advanced by the instant respondent). Crisp J concurred in the result with Nicholls CJ, but on the ground

- 3 [1941] AC 294. Italics added, and see especially [1941] AC at 301, [1941] 2 All ER at 287
- 4 [1916] 1 AC 266 at 270, 271
- j 5 [1894] 1 QB 466, [1891-94] All ER Rep 1164
- 6 (1853) 2 E & B 678, [1843-60] All ER Rep 12
- 7 (1850) 9 CB 1
- 8 (1869) 5 Ch App 182
- 9 See (1971) 87 LQR 358
- 10 [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294
- 11 (1934) 29 Tas LR 149

that 'in all the circumstances, . . . the Chief Justice's discretion here was well exercised', i.e. treating the case as if Nicholls CJ had not held that the statute could not operate at all on the subject-matter of the promise, but as if it could, and Nicholls CJ in his discretion had preferred the claim of the promisee to that of the dependants. This is hardly a satisfactory authority; but if anything it is in favour of the instant respondent, only the appellate judgment of Nicholls CJ being inconsistent with *Dillon's case*¹².

As for the other cases relied on by the appellant, it may be that if facts similar thereto arose in a situation where a promisee's contractual or equitable claim has to compete with one of a dependant under the statute, the conclusions in those cases might require modification rather on the lines that the Board in *Dillon's case*¹³ suggested that damages for breach of contract might have to be modified by the impact of the statute.

Another way of reconciling *Dillon's case*¹² with the authorities relied on by the appellant would be to imply in every covenant to leave property by will a proviso 'so far as the law allows'. This would seem to be necessary in those systems which limit a testator's power of disposition to part only of his estate (cf the passage cited from *Tait's Trustees v Lees*¹⁴). In the context of the discretionary code with which we are concerned in the instant appeal, the implied proviso would be spelt out as 'subject to the statutory discretion vested in the court to order family provision'. Such an implied proviso would be closely analogous to the refusal of the law to allow any contractual derogation from its discretionary power to order maintenance for an ex-wife (see *Hyman v Hyman*¹⁵), or (to look a little wider) the refusal of those systems which have adopted a regime of rent restriction or security of tenure to allow the powers of the courts to be pre-empted by covenant.

There is an alternative way of approaching the concept advanced in the previous paragraph. Some of the conflict of authorities before *Dillon's case*¹² can be resolved by drawing a distinction (however unjustly it works out in particular instances) between a promise to leave by will a specific sum or asset, e.g. *Graham v Wickham*¹⁶, *Synge v Synge*¹⁷ on the one hand, and a share of the residue, e.g. *Jervis v Wolferstan*¹⁸ on the other. But even where a share of the residue is promised, the testator will not be permitted fraudulently (in the sense used in equity) to render his promise nugatory by making substantial gifts inter vivos or by way of specific legacy (*Gregor v Kemp*¹⁹). In principle, similarly a testator should not be permitted to render his dependants' statutory rights nugatory by covenants to make bequests by will.

In any event, whatever difficulty the cited cases might raise if the Act limited the powers of the court to the 'net estate' of the deceased, statutorily defined, as does the English Inheritance (Family Provision) Act 1938 (on which, however, I must not be taken as expressing a view), only *Coffill v Comr of Stamp Duties*²⁰ and *Re Syme*¹ need cause any embarrassment in construing the New South Wales Act, which refers merely to the 'estate' of the deceased. For all the appellant's contention, it seems to me unarguable that the subject-matter of her bequest did not form part of the testator's 'estate'. If it did not form part of his estate, it could not pass to the appellant under his will, as she claims it did. Moreover, the passage cited from *Central Trust & Safe Deposit Co v Snider*² is clear authority that it did form part of his estate.

As for *Re Syme*¹, Lowe J regarded the claim which competed with the promisee's as that of a 'mere volunteer'; and his judgment turned on the contrast, juristically well established, between a promisee's equitable interest and the interest of a 'mere volunteer'. But that case was in no way concerned with family provision; and

12 [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294

13 [1941] 2 All ER at 289, [1941] AC at 304, 305

14 1886 13 R at 1110

15 [1929] AC 601, [1929] All ER Rep 245

16 (1863) 1 De GJ & Sm 474

17 (1894) 1 QB 466, [1891-94] All ER Rep 1164

18 (1874) 18 LR Eq 18

19 (1722) 3 Swan 404

20 (1920) 20 NSWLR 278

1 [1933] VLR 283

2 [1916] 1 AC 266 at 270, 271

- a 'mere volunteer' is to my mind quite inapt to describe the status of a family dependant under the statute. I cannot therefore regard the decision in *Re Syme*³ as providing any cause for impugning the validity of the subsequent decision in *Dillon's case*⁴. As for *Coffill's case*⁵, I do not find it necessary to hold that it must inevitably be considered to be overruled if *Dillon's case*⁴ stands. The covenant in *Coffill's case*⁵ was peculiar, and there was no question of any competing statutory provision for dependants. A contract to leave property by will is a most unusual one, in that it can only
- b be performed at the moment of death. It may be that different considerations apply, on the one hand, to a revenue case pure and simple and, on the other, to one where the promisee's claim competes with a claim under the Testator's Family Maintenance and Guardianship of Infants Act 1916-1954. It may be significant that there has been no attempt in the supervening 30 years to argue that *Coffill's case*⁵ has been, in effect, overruled by *Dillon's case*⁴. If I had to choose between *Coffill's case*⁵ and *Dillon's case*⁴, I should unhesitatingly prefer the latter.
- c

The alleged 'anomalies'

- I have tried to indicate how the alleged anomalies largely disappear if ancient authorities decided in a different social context are not carried forward hypnotically to what may seem their logical conclusions regardless of the impact of a modern
- d statute of clearly ascertainable social purpose, or if there is read into every contract to leave property by will the proviso 'so far as the law allows' or 'subject to the statutory discretion of the court to order family provision'. But even were anomalies to remain, desirable as it is to adopt a construction which does not produce anomalous results, it is still more desirable in my view to adopt a construction which accords
- e with the ascertainable intention of the legislature and which promotes justice between conflicting interests. This, I believe, would be done by following *Dillon's case*⁴.

*The juridical setting of Dillon's case*⁴

I respectfully agree with Street J's statement in his judgment in the instant case:

- f 'The effect of the decision of the Privy Council [in *Dillon's case*⁴] is but an instance of the general proposition enunciated by Giffard LJ in *Re Brookman's Trust*⁶: "If a testator is bound to make a will in a certain form, the law says there is no breach provided he makes a will in due form, and it is not owing to any act of his that the child does not take." . . . [The promisee's] rights to the property are to be drawn through the will and hence are subject to certain laws
- g affecting testamentary succession. A promisee's rights under a contract to leave property by will may, without any breach on the part of the testator, be subject to an inroad upon the property being made without thereby giving any consequential right, either to damages or otherwise, to the promisee under that contract. An order under the Testator's Family Maintenance Act is an instance of such an inroad.'

- h Appeal allowed. Case remitted for the court to decide what additional provision should be made for the respondents.

Solicitors: Barfield & Hubbard (for the appellant); Church, Adams, Tatham & Co (for the respondents).

S A Hatteea Esq Barrister.

j

3 [1933] VLR 283

4 [1941] 2 All ER 284, [1941] AC 294

5 (1920) 20 NSWSR 278

6 (1869) LR 5 Ch App at 192

Practice Direction

FAMILY DIVISION

Family Division – Procedure – Blood tests – Tests to determine paternity – Direction for use of blood tests – Arrangements for taking and testing of samples.

When a direction is given pursuant to Part III of the Family Law Reform Act 1969 for the use of blood tests in proceedings in the Family Division and divorce county courts the arrangements for the taking and testing of blood samples will be made by the solicitor for the party on whose application the direction was given.

Where the application is proceeding at the Divorce Registry, on receipt of a copy of the court's direction the solicitor should apply to the Registry for the necessary number of copies of the direction form prescribed by the Blood Tests (Evidence of Paternity) Regulations 1971¹; a form is required in respect of each person to be tested. He should, in consultation with the solicitors for the other parties, get in touch with a tester (a list of the authorised testers is available) and a sampler and make arrangements for the taking and testing of the samples. The solicitor should then complete Parts I and II of a direction form in respect of each person to be tested and attend with the forms before the registrar by whom the direction was given, or if it was not given by a registrar before the registrar for the day. If the registrar is satisfied with the arrangements he will sign the forms and return them to the solicitor with a copy of the Notes for the Guidance of Samplers.

The subsequent procedure is set out in the regulations and in RSC Ord 112 in the case of High Court proceedings, and CCR Ord 46, r 23, in the case of proceedings in the county courts.

Issued with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor.

17th February 1972

COMPTON MILLER
Senior Registrar

¹ SI 1971 No 1861

a

National Westminster Bank Ltd v Halesowen Presswork and Assemblies Ltd

HOUSE OF LORDS

VISCOUNT DILHORNE, LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE, LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA AND LORD KILBRANDON

b 8th, 9th, 11th, 12th, 15th NOVEMBER 1971, 26th JANUARY 1972

Bank – Account – Separate accounts – Right to combine or set-off – Company – Winding-up – Agreement between bank and company to keep separate frozen and active accounts – Existing current account of company substantially in debit – Agreement to freeze account at existing figure and to open new account to be maintained on a credit basis – Purpose of agreement to keep company on its feet as a going concern – Agreement to remain in operation for four months – Resolution for voluntary winding-up after two months – Credit account substantially in credit at date of winding-up – Whether agreement precluding bank from setting-off balance on credit account against debit on frozen account – Whether ‘mutual credits’ and ‘mutual dealings’ – Companies Act 1948, s 317 – Bankruptcy Act 1914, s 31.

d In February 1968 the account of the respondent company (‘the company’) with the appellant bank (‘the bank’) was overdrawn to the extent of £11,339. On 23rd February the bank informed L, a director of the company, that the account was ‘unacceptable’ to the bank. At a meeting between the bank and L on 4th April it was agreed that in order to maintain the company’s business so that it could be disposed of as a going concern the company’s account (the ‘no 1 account’) would be frozen at its then present figure and ‘no further transactions save for permanent reduction are to take place thereon’. In addition the company was to open a new account with the bank (the ‘no 2 account’) ‘to be maintained strictly on a credit basis’. Furthermore L undertook to come to a decision regarding the sale of the company ‘within the next four months’. For its part the bank agreed to adhere to the proposed scheme of arrangement for the period of time ‘in the absence of materially changed circumstances’. On 24th May the company gave notice of a meeting of creditors to be held on 12th June to consider a resolution to wind up the company. Although this constituted a material change of circumstances the bank indicated that it was prepared to continue to operate the no 2 account provided that it was kept in credit. On 12th June a cheque drawn by G Ltd in favour of the company for £8,611 5s 10d was paid into the no 2 account before the creditors’ meeting was held that afternoon.

g At that meeting a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company. On 13th June the amount of £8,611 5s 10d was credited to the no 2 account and the cheque was cleared on 14th June. On 19th June the bank told the liquidator that they considered that their claim in the liquidation would be ‘for the net balance between all accounts, plus outstanding interest and commission’. The figure of £8,611 5s 10d represented virtually the whole of the credit balance on the no 2 account

h which the bank thus claimed to be entitled to set off against the company’s indebtedness to the bank on the no 1 account. The liquidator however maintained that the bank were in no better position than any other creditor and that he was entitled to the £8,611 5s 10d. Subsequently the company brought an action claiming that the bank had wrongfully and in breach of the agreement of 4th April refused to pay over the £8,611 5s 10d.

j Held – The bank were entitled to set-off the balance on the no 2 account, including the sum of £8,611 5s 10d, against the debt on the no 1 account and to claim in the liquidation for the net balance for the following reasons—

(i) the substratum of the agreement of 4th April 1968 was that the company was to be kept on its feet as a going concern or for the profitable disposal of its assets; it could not have been in the contemplation of the parties that the agreement should continue in force after liquidation, which event would make either of its objectives unattainable; accordingly, once the resolution for winding-up the company had been passed the agreement was at an end; thereupon the bank was entitled to consolidate the two accounts and to exercise the right which, in the absence of agreement, existed on a winding-up to set off the balance on the no 2 account against the company's debt on the frozen no 1 account (see p 651 b and d, p 654 b and c, p 655 f and p 662 c and f, post); dictum of Lord Macnaghten in British Guiana Bank v Official Receiver (1911) 104 LT at 755 applied;

(ii) even if the bank was not otherwise entitled to combine the two accounts it could do so by virtue of s 31^a of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 as applied by s 317^b of the Companies Act 1948 because—

(a) notwithstanding the fact that the agreement had the temporary effect of precluding the bank from appropriating any credit on the no 2 account towards the debt on the no 1 account, the dealings giving rise to the obligations were 'mutual dealings' within the meaning of s 31 and the credits were 'mutual credits'; it was impossible to regard the opening of the no 2 account and the payment into it by the company from time to time of their customers' cheques against which they drew cheques for their trading expenses as being in any way analogous to the deposit by a debtor with his creditor of money to be applied by the creditor for a special purpose (see p 650 b d e g and h, p 651 g and j to p 652 a, p 654 j to p 655 a and c, p 662 h and p 663 e, post);

(b) by their agreement of 4th April 1968 the parties had not contracted out of the provisions of s 31 since the agreement only remained operative so long as the company was a going concern (see p 649 d e and h, p 651 d, p 655 f and p 662 e and f, post);

(c) (Lord Cross of Chelsea dissenting) it was not in any event possible for the parties to contract out of s 31 since the provisions of that section were mandatory, prescribing the course to be followed in the administration of the bankrupt's property (see p 649 c, p 652 b and e, p 663 j and p 665 e, post); dicta of Lord Selborne LC in Re Devezé, ex parte Barnett (1874) 9 Ch App at 295 and in Mersey Steel & Iron Co Ltd v Naylor, Benzon & Co [1881-85] All ER Rep at 367, of Lord Hanworth MR in Re City Life Assurance Co Ltd [1925] All ER Rep at 457, in Re Fenton (No 1) [1930] All ER Rep at 18 and in Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Co Ltd (No 2) [1930] All ER Rep at 318, 319, of Hallett J in Victoria Products Ltd v Tosh & Co Ltd (1941) 165 LT at 80, and Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox [1967] 1 All ER 397 applied; dicta of James and Baggallay LJ in Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher (1877) 6 Ch D at 357, Deering v Hyndman (1886) 18 LR (Ir) QB 467 and dictum of Wright J in Watkins v Lindsay & Co (1898) 5 Mans at 29 disapproved.

Decision of the Court of Appeal sub nom Halesowen Presswork & Assemblies Ltd v Westminster Bank Ltd [1970] 3 All ER 473 reversed.

Notes

For the statutory right of set-off in cases of insolvency, see 2 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 480, 481, para 952, and for cases on the subject, see 4 Digest (Repl) 436-444, 3859-3913.

For combination of different accounts, see 2 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 172, 173, para 322, for a banker's set-off on combining accounts, see ibid 213, para 395, and for cases on the subject, see 3 Digest (Repl) 328, 1027-1029.

For the Bankruptcy Act 1914, s 31, see 3 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 80, and for the Companies Act 1948, s 317, see 5 ibid 344.

Cases referred to in opinions

Ashby v White (1703) 1 Bro Parl Cas 62, Holt KB 524, 2 Ld Raym 938, 6 Mod Rep 45, 1 Salk 19, 3 Salk 17, 1 Digest (Repl) 26, 197.

Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co, Re, Lee & Chapman's Case (1885) 30 Ch D 216, 54 LJCh 460, 153 LT 65, 10 Digest (Repl) 990, 6814.

Ayr Harbour Trustees v Oswald (1883) 8 App Cas 623, 11 Digest (Repl) 103, 5.

^a Section 31, so far as material, is set out at p 646 g, post

^b Section 317, so far as material, is set out at p 646 j, post

- a* Bank of Australasia v Palmer [1897] AC 540, 66 LJPC 105, 3 Digest (Repl) 239, 626.
Bradford Old Bank Ltd v Sutcliffe [1918] 2 KB 833, 88 LJKB 85, 119 LT 727, 3 Digest (Repl) 296, 914.
British Guiana Bank v Official Receiver (1911) 104 LT 754, 3 Digest (Repl) 332, *947.
City Equitable Fire Insurance Co Ltd (No 2), Re [1930] 2 Ch 293, [1930] All ER Rep 315, 99 LJCh 536, 143 LT 444, 4 Digest (Repl) 423, 3750.
- b* City Life Assurance Co Ltd, Re [1926] Ch 191, [1925] All ER Rep 453, 95 LJCh 65, 134 LT 207, 10 Digest (Repl) 1173, 8160.
Deering v Hyndman (1886) 18 LR (Ir) 323, 467, 4 Digest (Repl) 450, *1753.
Deveze, Re, ex parte Barnett (1874) 9 Ch App 293, 43 LJBCy 87, 29 LT 858, 4 Digest (Repl) 433, 3844.
- c* Fenton (No 1), Re, ex parte Fenton Textile Association Ltd [1931] 1 Ch 85, [1930] All ER Rep 15, 99 LJCh 358, 143 LT 273, 4 Digest (Repl) 434, 3849.
Greenhalgh (W P) & Sons v Union Bank of Manchester Ltd [1924] 2 KB 153, [1924] All ER Rep 338, 93 LJKB 844, 131 LT 637, 3 Digest (Repl) 180, 313.
Keever (a bankrupt), Re, ex parte The Trustee of the Property of the Bankrupt v Midland Bank Ltd [1966] 3 All ER 631, [1967] Ch 182, [1966] 3 WLR 779, Digest (Cont Vol B) 59, 7903a.
- d* Mersey Steel & Iron Co Ltd v Naylor, Benzon & Co (1884) 9 App Cas 434, [1881-85] All ER Rep 365, 53 LJQB 497, 51 LT 637, 10 Digest (Repl) 990, 6813.
Mid-Kent Fruit Factory, Re [1896] 1 Ch 567, 65 LJCh 250, 74 LT 22, 4 Digest (Repl) 427, 3788.
Morel (E J) (1934) Ltd, Re [1961] 1 All ER 796, [1962] Ch 27, [1961] 3 WLR 57, Digest (Cont Vol A) 50, 915a.
- e* Pollitt, Re, ex parte Minor [1893] 1 QB 455, 62 LJQB 236, 68 LT 366, 4 Digest (Repl) 428, 3802.
Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox [1967] 1 All ER 397, [1967] 1 QB 552, [1967] 2 WLR 241, Digest (Cont Vol C) 120, 7349b.
Spurling v Bantoft [1891] 2 QB 384, 60 LJQB 745, 65 LT 584, 56 JP 132, 33 Digest (Repl) 452, 38.
- f* Vaughan, Re, ex parte Fletcher (1877) 6 Ch D 350, 37 LT 282, 4 Digest (Repl) 449, 3942.
Victoria Products Ltd v Tosh & Co Ltd (1941) 165 LT 78, 4 Digest (Repl) 423, 3751.
Watkins v Lindsay & Co (1898) 5 Mans 25, 67 LJQB 362, 4 Digest (Repl) 547, 4783.

Appeal

g National Westminster Bank Ltd ('the bank') appealed against an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning MR and Winn LJ, Buckley LJ dissenting) dated 29th July 1970 and reported [1970] 3 All ER 473 reversing the judgment of Roskill J dated 5th November 1969 and reported [1970] 1 All ER 33 whereby the action by Halesowen Presswork and Assemblies Ltd ('the company') against the bank was dismissed. The facts are set out in the opinion of Viscount Dilhorne.

R A MacCrindle QC and R M Yorke QC for the bank.
h Allan Heyman QC and M K I Kennedy for the company.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

26th January. The following opinions were delivered.

j VISCOUNT DILHORNE. My Lords, the respondent company's account with the Halesowen branch of the appellant bank was in February 1968 overdrawn to the extent of £11,339. Mr F I Lewis was at all material times a director of the company. He was also interested in two other associated companies, Lewis Distributors Ltd and Jack Lewis Properties (Halesowen) Ltd, both of which had accounts with the bank which were in debit in February 1968, the bank being owed £143,289 by Lewis Distributors Ltd and £8,943 by Jack Lewis Properties (Halesowen) Ltd.

The bank being concerned about the position, their assistant manager in Birmingham saw Mr Lewis on 23rd February and, after their meeting, wrote him a letter dated 23rd February. In the letter he recorded that he had stated at the meeting that the accounts of the company and Lewis Distributors Ltd were 'unacceptable to the Bank, which itself needs to reserve all its rights of action'. The assistant manager said that additional security was required in the absence of cash as an initial measure and enclosed debentures and guarantees to be issued and given by Lewis Distributors Ltd and the company which, he said, had been prepared 'in accordance with what you agreed'.

Mr Lewis then consulted a Mr Bernard Phillips, an accountant and member of the firm of Bernard Phillips & Co, who wrote to the assistant manager on Mr Lewis's behalf in reply to the letter of 23rd February. In his letter Mr Phillips said that from a draft statement of affairs which had been prepared, it was 'clear that a proper realisation of the company's assets would enable the company to discharge all its debts and obligations in full' but that 'a forced realisation . . . would show a position of insolvency'. Consequently, he said, if the directors were to comply with the bank's request, they might be accused of attempting a fraudulent preference, or if the company were to be wound up within 12 months, the debenture would prove invalid. He went on to say that active steps had been taken to dispose of the business as a going concern and that the figures involved in such a transaction would 'certainly' enable all the creditors of the company to be paid in full and he asked that a reasonable opportunity should be given to the directors 'to effect a transaction which will enable all the company's liabilities to be dealt with equally'.

On 15th March 1968 Mr Phillips wrote to the bank saying that no one had shown any interest in making an offer for the company's factory and that the bank were right in assuming that the company's banking business was being passed through the company's account at Lloyds Bank, Halesowen. The account at Lloyds had been opened, as Mr Lewis admitted at a meeting on 4th April, as he was afraid to pay in receipts to the bank's branch at Halesowen lest the bank should freeze on to them. The account at Lloyds was conducted on a credit basis. A memorandum of that meeting on 4th April, prepared by a district manager of the bank, records that Mr Lewis—

'mindful in particular of the incidence of interest on the large debts, said that in no circumstances would he persist in his endeavour to sell [the company] as a going concern for more than six months. In fact, he might in four months' time come to this decision so as to sell on a break-up basis in the two month remaining period.'

Later the memorandum stated:

' . . . if we [the bank] are able to arrange for Mr. Lewis to have the time which he seeks it was agreed that an active credit account would be reopened at Birmingham Branch with the existing indebtedness there . . . entirely frozen.'

On 17th April 1968 the assistant general manager of the bank wrote to Mr Lewis, saying inter alia:

'In an endeavour to resolve the present somewhat disastrous situation of your two Companies we have now obtained approval to proceed on the lines we discussed with you on the 4th April . . . So far as the existing account at our Birmingham Branch of [the company] is concerned, this is to be frozen at its present figure and no further transactions save for permanent reduction are to take place thereon . . . As part of the arrangements it was agreed that all of the Company's current business should be passed through [the bank], and I look to you, therefore, to arrange for the account with Lloyds Bank to be closed

- a so that all transactions henceforward may be passed through a new account to be opened at Birmingham Branch. This new account is, of course, to be maintained strictly on a credit basis and you should bear in mind that the bank charges, including interest on the indebtedness at Birmingham, will, in the usual way, be debited to this new account . . . There is, I feel, no need for me to underline the Bank's concern regarding the overall indebtedness, and in acknowledgment of this you undertook to come to a decision regarding a sale of [the company], or failing this the disposal of its assets, within the next four months, and in the absence of materially changed circumstances in the meantime we for our part will adhere to the present scheme of arrangements for this period of time.'
- b

Mr Lewis replied to this letter on 22nd April saying that he accepted the conditions and arrangements that had been laid out.

- c A new account, called the no 2 account, in the name of the company was opened at the Halesowen branch of the bank. Then, on 20th May 1968, just a month later, the company gave notice (received by the bank on 24th May) that on 12th June a meeting of creditors would be held for the purposes mentioned in ss 294 and 295 of the Companies Act 1948. This notice was acknowledged by the bank by letter dated 28th May 1968, in which they said:
- d

'Needless to say, in the light of these events the Bank wishes the Company's No. 2 Account to be maintained to credit at all times and I am sure that we can rely on your co-operation to provide cleared funds in the Account to meet cheques which may be presented.'

- e It was common ground that the giving of the notice of the meeting of creditors was a material change of circumstance which would have entitled the bank to treat the arrangement made in the letters of 17th and 22nd April as at an end. The letter of 28th May shows that they did not do so. They were, despite that material change of circumstance, prepared to allow the company to continue to operate the no 2 account provided that it was kept in credit.

- f On 12th June a cheque drawn by Girlings Ltd in favour of the company for £8,611 5s 10d was paid into the no 2 account at the bank's Halesowen branch before the creditors' meeting was held that afternoon. At that meeting a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company and Mr Bernard Phillips was appointed liquidator. The amount of £8,611 5s 10d was credited to the no 2 account on 13th June and the cheque was cleared on 14th June.

- g By letter dated 19th June the bank told the liquidator that they considered their claim in the liquidation would be 'for the net balance between all accounts, plus outstanding interest and commission'. On this basis they said that the net amount due to the bank was £3,219 17s 10d. Mr Phillips did not agree. He maintained that the bank were in no better position than any other creditor and claimed to be entitled to the £8,611 5s 10d and asserted that that could not be set off against the company's indebtedness to the bank.
- h

- On 7th January 1969 a writ was issued by the company against the bank. The company alleged that the bank had wrongfully and in breach of their agreement refused to pay over the £8,611 5s 10d and claimed that as the proceeds of the cheque for that amount were collected after the commencement of the winding-up, the bank were accountable therefor to the liquidator. In the statement of claim it was also alleged that it was agreed at the meeting on 4th April that 'at no time should the . . . Bank have the right to consolidate the two . . . accounts'. The bank strenuously denied ever having agreed to that. The action was tried by Roskill J¹ who accepted the evidence given on behalf of the bank and rejected that given on behalf of the company on this issue. He said that they had failed to satisfy him that any such agreement had been made. Roskill J's finding on this has not been challenged either in the Court of Appeal² or in this House but the company have throughout contended that the bank were not entitled to consolidate the two accounts. If they are right, then the agreement they alleged would have been superfluous.

If I read his judgment correctly, Roskill J held³ that the banker's right of lien, although abrogated as long as the banker-customer relationship continued between the company and the bank—

'became enforceable as soon as that relationship determined as it did on 12th June by reason of the resolution to wind up. At that moment the Girling cheque had already passed into the possession of the bank and, on the resolution to wind up, the bank's right of lien extended to that cheque and subsequently to its proceeds as well as to the whole balance on the no 2 account.'

The bank did not at the trial seek to rely on s 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914, as applied to companies by s 317 of the Companies Act 1948, so the effect of that section was not considered by Roskill J¹ who gave judgment for the bank.

On appeal² his decision was reversed by a majority (Lord Denning MR and Winn LJ; Buckley LJ dissenting). Lord Denning MR⁴ thought that the use of the word 'lien' in this context was misleading and that one should speak simply of a banker's right to combine accounts or a right to 'set-off' one account against the other. Buckley LJ said⁵:

'When that cheque was cleared, as it was on 14th June 1968, it ceased to be a negotiable instrument and also ceased to be in the possession of the bank. Any lien of the bank on the cheque must thereupon have come to an end . . . The money or credit which the bank obtained as a result of clearing the cheque became the property of the bank, not the property of the [company]. No man can have a lien on his own property, and consequently no lien can have arisen affecting that money or that credit.'

I agree with Buckley LJ. It was not contended in this House that the bank were entitled to set off one account against the other in the exercise of any lien and if the bank were entitled to do so, that must depend on other grounds.

In the Court of Appeal² and in this House the bank relied on the provisions of s 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 which so far as material is in the following terms:

'Where there have been mutual credits, mutual debts or other mutual dealings, between a debtor against whom a receiving order shall be made under this Act and any other person proving or claiming to prove a debt under the receiving order, an account shall be taken of what is due from the one party to the other in respect of such mutual dealings, and the sum due from the one party shall be set off against any sum due from the other party, and the balance of the account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively . . .'

The Companies Act 1948, s 317, provides:

'In the winding up of an insolvent company . . . the same rules shall prevail and be observed with regard to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors and to debts provable . . . as are in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy in England with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt . . .'

In the Court of Appeal² and in this House the company contended that s 31 did

² [1970] 3 All ER 473, [1970] 3 WLR 625

³ [1970] 1 All ER at 52, [1970] 2 WLR at 775

⁴ [1970] 3 All ER at 477, [1970] 3 WLR at 634

⁵ [1970] 3 All ER at 487, [1970] 3 WLR at 645

a not apply. They did so on two grounds: first, that the dealings were not mutual; and, secondly, that by the agreement made in April the bank had contracted out of their rights under the section. This second ground involves consideration of two separate questions: (1) could the bank contract out of s 31, and (2) had the bank by entering into the agreement purported to do so?

b There is a conflict of judicial opinion on whether it is possible to contract out of s 31. In *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*⁶ where the debtors alleged an agreement—

‘by the creditors to keep them upon their legs, if possible; and, in order to enable them to do so, to suspend their rights, and that all goods supplied on either side should be paid for in cash’

c Bacon CJ held⁸ that the agreement could not put an end to the pre-existing rights of creditors if the time came—

‘when those suspended rights must be enforced . . . But the Act of Parliament is plain, and it provides that when a man becomes bankrupt the accounts are to be taken in the manner stated by Lord Selborne in Ex parte Barnett, where he says⁹: “When there have been mutual credits, debts, or mutual dealings, and a proof is to be made in bankruptcy, there is to be a rule of set-off, not, as I understand it, at the option of either party, but an absolute statutory rule, ‘the balance of such account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively.’” The law of mutual credit, therefore, is an especial statutory law, and if there were such an agreement as alleged by the debtors, that law put an end to it.’

e In *Mersey Steel & Iron Co Ltd v Naylor, Benzon & Co*¹⁰ Lord Selborne said:

‘Your Lordships observe that it is not that it may be—it is not a thing which is optional, but it is a positive, absolute rule for the purpose of proof in bankruptcy, and nothing can be proved according to that rule in such cases except the balance of the account; that only is regarded as the claim which it is competent for the creditor to make when he comes in to prove under the bankruptcy.’

f In both *Re Devezé, ex parte Barnett*¹¹ and in the Mersey Steel case¹² the statutory provisions under consideration were similar in all material respects to s 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914. In both cases Lord Selborne said there was an absolute statutory rule. By that I understand him to have said that it was a rule the operation of which could not be avoided. In *Re Devezé, ex parte Barnett*¹³ he said that the rule was not ‘at the option of either party’; in the Mersey Steel case¹⁴ that it was ‘not a thing which is optional’. He did not seek to distinguish between an option exercised by one party and an agreement between debtor and creditor or an option sought to be exercised consequent on an agreement between the parties. I take him to have meant that the absolute statutory rule could not be waived either at the option of one party or at the option of both.

h Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher went to the Court of Appeal⁸. The report of the proceedings in that court is very brief. It shows that the point was taken that it was competent to exclude by special agreement the right of set off given by s 39 of the

6 (1877) 6 Ch D 350

7 (1877) 6 Ch D at 355

8 (1877) 6 Ch D at 356

9 Re Devezé, ex parte Barnett (1874) 9 Ch App 293 at 295

10 (1884) 9 App Cas 434 at 438, [1881-85] All ER Rep 365 at 367

11 (1874) 9 Ch App 293

12 (1884) 9 App Cas 434, [1881-85] All ER Rep 365

13 (1874) 9 Ch App at 295

14 (1884) 9 App Cas at 438, [1881-85] All ER Rep at 367

Bankruptcy Act 1869, but it does not indicate what arguments were advanced or whether any authorities were cited in support of that proposition. The judgments, if given as reported, were very brief. All three members of the court held that the agreement was not one to exclude the right of set-off but James and Baggallay LJ also indicated that such an agreement, if made, would have been effective. James LJ said¹⁵:

'The Respondents are entitled to the set-off which they claim unless there is some agreement binding at law or in equity which excludes their right.'

Baggallay LJ said¹⁵:

'The right to the set-off is clear unless the Respondents have precluded themselves from enforcing it by some special agreement.'

One cannot reconcile their statements with the observations of Bacon CJ and Lord Selborne. Neither James LJ nor Baggallay LJ are reported as having referred to the observations of Bacon CJ or to those of Lord Selborne which he cited. I think it is very odd that if they intended to disagree with him, they should not have said so and stated their reasons for doing so. The headnote of the report is clearly inaccurate and I think that the accuracy of the reports of the judgments in the Court of Appeal¹⁶ is open to question. In any event, the remarks of James and Baggallay LJ, if correctly reported, were clearly obiter.

In *Deering v Hyndman*¹⁷ May CJ and Johnson J followed the observations of James and Baggallay LJ and held that the statutory right of set-off of mutual debts and credits under s 251 of the Irish Bankrupt and Insolvent Act 1857 was excluded. Their decision was affirmed on appeal. And in *Watkins v Lindsay & Co*¹⁸ Wright J said:

'in order to prevent the set-off (which in bankruptcy is automatic and not dependent on the option of the party) there must be something equivalent to a binding agreement that there shall be no set-off.'

He thus appears to distinguish between the exercise of an option by one party to waive his rights under the section from its exercise pursuant to an agreement. I cannot think that this is a valid distinction. Why should a creditor be unable to waive the right to set-off of his own volition but able to do so if and only if he has made an agreement to do so.

The exclusion of the set-off was sought to be justified in *Deering v Hyndman*¹⁷ by the application of the principle 'quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto' but if this principle is to be applied, it would equally apply in relation to the exercise of an option by a claimant to waive the set-off.

In *Victoria Products Ltd v Tosh & Co Ltd*¹⁹ Hallett J considered the effect of *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*¹⁶. He expressed the view that it was impossible to find in the judgments of the Court of Appeal in that case 'any really clear indication whether the Lords Justices would or would not have upheld the decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy on the other point' (i.e. whether it is possible to contract out of the right to set-off). He thought that the true view was that expressed by Bacon CJ²⁰ and Lord Selborne¹ and said²:

'The object and effect of sect. 31 is . . . that all the mutual claims of the character there contemplated should be dealt with by the process there laid down in the course of the bankruptcy or the winding-up; and an attempt to leave outside that process some particular item is one which should be regarded as against the policy of the insolvency laws and, therefore, defeated.'

¹⁵ (1877) 6 Ch D at 357

¹⁶ (1877) 6 Ch D 350

¹⁷ (1886) 18 LR (Ir) 323, 467

¹⁸ (1898) 5 Mans 25 at 29

¹⁹ (1941) 165 LT 78 at 80

²⁰ (1877) 6 Ch D at 356

¹ (1874) 9 Ch App at 295

² (1941) 165 LT at 80

a In *Re City Life Assurance Co Ltd*³ Pollock MR⁴ said in relation to s 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914:

‘It is not merely permissive, but it is a direct statutory enactment that the balance only is to be claimed in bankruptcy.’

In Re Fenton (No 1), *ex parte Fenton Textile Association Ltd*⁵ he made similar observations.

b In *Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox*⁶ Lord Denning MR⁷ and Danckwerts LJ⁸ said that parties cannot contract out of s 31, a view repeated in this case⁹ by Lord Denning MR and accepted by Buckley LJ.

c The weight of opinion expressed in the cases to which I have referred appears to me to be in favour of the conclusion that it is not possible to contract out of s 31. The word used in that section is ‘shall’ not ‘may’, the word used in s 34 in relation to a trustee’s power to make a payment out of the bankrupt’s property for the use of an apprentice. Looking at the Act by itself, while recognising that it is sometimes right to interpret the word ‘shall’ in an Act as meaning ‘may’, I think that the terms of s 31 and of the sections that follow it show that ‘shall’ was used in all those sections in its directory and mandatory sense, prescribing the course to be followed in the administration of the bankrupt’s property.

d If, contrary to my view, it is possible to contract out of s 31, the agreement made in this case did not, in my opinion, purport to do so. It was an agreement similar in some respects to that in *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*¹⁰. It was to enable the company to carry on so that they might, if they could, sell the business as a going concern; an agreement whereby the bank agreed not to seek to secure payment of the amount owed to them for four months unless there was a material change of circumstance.

e It was not an agreement to provide what should happen in the event of liquidation. In *British Guiana Bank v Official Receiver*¹¹ the bank agreed with its customer that another current account, to be called the no 2 account, should be opened and that the bank would not appropriate any sum in credit on that account in reduction of the overdraft on the no 1 account without the customer’s knowledge and consent. Lord Macnaghten, delivering the judgment of the Board, said¹²:

f ‘The whole question in this case turns upon the real meaning of the agreement . . . In their Lordships’ opinion it is an ordinary business agreement, intended to be operative so long as the accounts are alive, and no longer. There is nothing in it to exclude the operation of the right of set off.’

g The Supreme Court of British Guiana had held that it was possible to contract out of the statutory obligation to set-off in a liquidation. I do not think that the fact that Lord Macnaghten did not refer to this justifies the conclusion that he accepted their view. As he held that there was nothing in the agreement to exclude the right to set-off, it was unnecessary for him to consider whether, if there had been, it would have been effective.

h The agreement in the British Guiana Bank case¹¹ is indistinguishable from that in this case where in my view there was nothing in the agreement to exclude the right of set-off. It follows that if the debit on the no 1 account and the credit on the no 2 account amounted to ‘mutual credits, mutual debits or other mutual dealings’ within the

3 [1926] Ch 191 at 203, [1925] All ER Rep 453 at 457

4 Subsequently Lord Hanworth MR

5 [1931] 1 Ch 85, [1930] All ER Rep 15

j 6 [1967] 1 All ER 397, [1967] 1 QB 552

7 [1967] 1 All ER at 403, [1967] 1 QB at 570

8 [1967] 1 All ER at 405, [1967] 1 QB at 573

9 [1970] 3 All ER 473, [1970] 3 WLR 625

10 (1877) 6 Ch D 350

11 (1911) 104 LT 754

12 (1911) 104 LT at 755

meaning to be given to those words in s 31, that section applies. Lord Denning MR and Winn LJ¹³ thought that there were not mutual dealings. Lord Denning MR thought that the arrangements were so special as to deprive them of mutuality and Winn LJ thought that the agreement provided that the balance on the frozen no 1 account should be treated as separated out from the future mutual dealings of the bank and customer 'all of which were expressly to be effected and recorded on the no 2 account'.

I do not myself think that the arrangements made by the agreement made in April were so special as to deprive them of mutuality. They do not seem to me more special than the arrangements made in the British Guiana Bank case¹⁴ which were said to constitute 'an ordinary business agreement'. The bank and the company could have achieved the same result by agreeing that the overdraft should remain at its then level for four months unless there was a material change of circumstances but that the bank would honour cheques drawn on that account if and only if amounts sufficient to cover the cheques had been credited to the account. It was, we were told, only because it was easier to secure that the overdraft did not increase that the no 2 account was opened and the existing debit frozen.

The account which became the no 1 account had been the company's current account. It did not change its character when the company ceased to use it; nor do I think that its character was changed when the bank and the company agreed that it should be frozen, i.e. that the company would continue not to use it, and when they agreed that no further transactions would take place on it for a limited period 'save for permanent reduction' of the overdraft. While it is true that after the agreement all future dealings save for the reduction of the debit were to take place on the no 2 account, I do not think that that fact and the agreement itself lead to the conclusion that the debit balance was to be separated out from mutual dealings and to be regarded as not having arisen therefrom. In my view Buckley LJ put the matter correctly when he said¹⁵:

'The effect of the agreement was to postpone the right of the bank to require payment of the amount due on the no 1 account during the currency of the agreement. The debit on the no 1 account remained a debt owing by the [company] to the bank, although it ceased to be presently payable. Each of the obligations on either side on the two banking accounts arose from the relationship between the parties as banker and customer . . . The agreement was intended to have a temporary effect only, at the end of which the parties contemplated that both accounts would become part of their general relationship as banker and customer. In my judgment, notwithstanding the fact that the agreement had the temporary effect of precluding the bank from appropriating any credit on the no 2 account towards discharging the debt on the no 1 account, the dealings giving rise to the obligations were "mutual" dealings within the meaning of s 31 and the credits were "mutual credits".'

I agree with Buckley LJ in thinking that s 31 applies and consequently that on this ground the appeal should be allowed.

The bank also contended that, quite apart from s 31, they were entitled to set-off one account against the other. That they would have been entitled, had they chosen to do so, to regard the receipt of the notice of the creditors' meeting as a material change of circumstances was not disputed, but in my opinion their letter of 28th May 1968 shows clearly that they did not wish to treat the agreement as terminated on that account. Considerable argument was directed to the question whether the agreement was only terminable by the bank by notice. It may be that if the bank

¹³ [1970] 3 All ER 473, [1970] 3 WLR 625

¹⁴ (1911) 104 LT 754

¹⁵ [1970] 3 All ER at 490, [1970] 3 WLR at 648

- a had decided to treat the agreement as brought to an end by the receipt of that notice, they would have been under an obligation to inform the company of that but I do not think it necessary to express an opinion on the matter as the bank did not so decide. The agreement was, to use the words of Lord Macnaghten in *British Guiana Bank v Official Receiver*¹⁶, only 'intended to be operative so long as the accounts are alive', that is to say, while the relationship of banker and customer existed and
- b the company was a going concern. In my opinion the agreement came to an end when the winding up resolution was passed. Could the bank then, the agreement being at an end, combine the two accounts? For the reasons very clearly stated by Roskill J¹⁷ in my opinion the answer is, Yes.

I would therefore allow the appeal on this ground also.

- c LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends. They are in agreement on every issue in this appeal save one—namely, whether s 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 (applicable in this case by reason of s 317 of the Companies Act 1948) can be the subject of an agreement to contract out of its terms. I concur with my noble and
- d learned friends on all their agreed conclusions and content myself with expressing such concurrence. I also agree with my noble and learned friends that, even if the section may be excluded by agreement, there was in the present case no agreement to exclude it; this appears both from an independent construction of the agreement of 4th April 1968, as evidenced by the letter of 17th April 1968, and because that agreement in all its circumstances is indistinguishable from the similar agreement in *British Guiana Bank v Official Receiver*¹⁸, in all the circumstances of that case. Any
- e further observations on s 31 are therefore liable to be taken as further obiter dicta, or at least to raise the question how far what is said is a concurrent ratio decidendi. But the matter was carefully argued before your Lordships, who were urged by both sides to express a view in the hope of providing some guidance to those engaged in preparing the promised bankruptcy legislation and to practitioners in the meantime. I follow your Lordships in acceding to the plea made to us.

- f But before I venture to indicate my own view on whether s 31 may be excluded by agreement, there is one subsidiary matter on that section with which I should like to deal. The section concerns the right or duty of set-off 'Where there have been mutual credits, mutual debts or other mutual dealings'. It was common ground that 'mutual dealings' would not cover a transaction in which property is made over for a 'special (or specific) purpose': see *Re Pollitt, ex parte Minor*¹⁹. *Re Mid-Kent Fruit Factory*²⁰ and *Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Co Ltd (No 2)*¹. But I regret that I cannot agree with the view of the majority of the Court of Appeal² on what meaning should be attached to this concept of 'special (or specific) purpose'. I prefer the view of Buckley LJ; and I agree with all that my noble and learned friend, Viscount Dilhorne, has said on this matter. Every payment of money, every contractual provision, is for a special or specific purpose in the ordinary sense of those words; something
- h more is required to take the transaction out of the concept of 'mutual dealings'. It was suggested on behalf of the bank that the situation only arises when the transaction gives rise to a payment on which a quasi-trust is imposed. My only quarrel with this way of putting it is that quasi-anything gives uncertain guidance in the law. I would prefer to say that money is paid for a special (or specific) purpose so as to exclude

j

16 (1911) 104 LT at 755
 17 [1970] 1 All ER at 51, 52, [1970] 2 WLR at 773, 774
 18 (1911) 104 LT 754
 19 [1893] 1 QB 455
 20 [1896] 1 Ch 567
 1 [1930] 2 Ch 293, [1930] All ER Rep 315
 2 [1970] 3 All ER 473, [1970] 3 WLR 625

mutuality of dealing within s 31 if the money is paid in such circumstances that it would be a misappropriation to use it for any other purpose than that for which it is paid. I think that all the cases cited on this point are explicable on this basis; but I cannot see anything in the instant case which amounts to such a special purpose so as to negative mutuality of dealing. a

I turn finally, then, to the question whether s 31 can be excluded by agreement. On this matter I concur in the reasoning and conclusions of my noble and learned friends, Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Kilbrandon. The maxim 'Quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto'³ begs the question whether the statutory provision in s 31 was introduced for the benefit of any particular person or body of persons or was prescribing a course of procedure to be followed in the administration of a bankrupt's property. I appreciate that the imposition of a duty on a public officer does not necessarily preclude a private right arising therefrom: *Ashby v White*⁴. But in *Broom*⁵ the maxim is, for good reason, translated 'Anyone may at his pleasure, renounce the benefit of a stipulation or other right introduced entirely in his own favour' (my italics). It is also significant that, in the discussion of this maxim, s 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 is nowhere mentioned. Having regard both to the terminology of s 31 and to its statutory context, it seems to me to be impossible so to construe the wording of the section as introducing a right entirely in favour of anyone. The change in terminology between the Bankruptcy Act 1849, s 171, and the Bankruptcy Act 1869, s 39 ('may' to 'shall') must have been, at the least, to avert doubts. This part of the Act is laying down a code of procedure whereby bankrupts' estates (and, by reference, insolvent companies) are to be administered in a proper and orderly way; this is a matter in which the commercial community generally has an interest; and the maxim has no application in a matter where the public have an interest (see *Broom*⁵, citing *Ayr Harbour Trustees v Oswald*⁶ and *Spurling v Bantoft*⁷). There is a clear preponderance of authority against there being a right to contract out of the section; and I agree with the analysis of the case law made by my noble and learned friend, Viscount Dilhorne. b

It was argued for the respondent company that, if there could be no contracting out of s 31, a very usual type of compromise between creditors, in their common interest to keep an insolvent afloat, would be impossible. To this there are, I think, two answers: first, there would be nothing to prevent any such agreement after an act of bankruptcy had been committed; and, secondly, so far as companies are concerned, s 206 of the Companies Act 1948 gives power, subject to the sanction of the court, for a compromise to be made in certain circumstances with creditors which will be binding on all creditors (or all creditors of the class involved). But the mere fact that this argument could be advanced at all in view of the conflict of dicta and what I cannot but regard as a clear preponderance of authority emphasises the desirability that the promised legislation in this field should not be unduly delayed. c

In view of the construction that I venture to put on s 31, as well as for the reasons stated by my noble and learned friends on the other issues in this case, I agree that the appeal should be allowed. d

LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. My Lords, the facts of this case have been stated by my noble and learned friend Viscount Dilhorne and I need not repeat them. If a banker permits his customer to have two accounts, one—sometimes called a 'loan account'—which records the indebtedness of the customer to the bank in respect of advances made to him, and the other a current account which the customer e

3 Broom's Legal Maxims (1929), 10th Edn, p 477

4 (1703), 1 Bro Parl Cas 62

5 Broom's Legal Maxims (1929), 10th Edn, p 481

6 (1883) 8 App Cas 623

7 [1891] 2 QB 384 f

h

j

a keeps in credit and uses for the purpose of his trade or business or ordinary expenditure, then, unless the bank makes it clear to the customer that it is retaining the right at any moment to apply the credit balance on the current account in reduction of the debt on the loan account, it will be an implied term of the arrangement that the bank will not, so long as it lasts, consolidate the two accounts. As Scrutton LJ pointed out in *Bradford Old Bank Ltd v Sutcliffe*⁸, unless such a term is implied no customer b could feel any security in drawing a cheque on his current account if he had a loan account greater than the credit balance on his current account. It was common ground that there was such an implied term in this case. It was also common ground that the sending out by the company on 20th May 1968 of the notice under s 293 of the Companies Act 1948 constituted a 'material change of circumstances' which entitled the bank to put an end to the agreement made on 4th April notwithstanding that the four months had not elapsed. In the Court of Appeal⁹ the question was c raised whether the bank had to give the company notice of its intention no longer to be bound by the agreement. To my mind that question does not really arise for even if one assumes in favour of the bank that it could there and then have consolidated the accounts without notice it is clear that it chose not to treat the service of the notice as an event entitling it to do so. In its letter of 28th May to the company it made it clear that notwithstanding the notice it was prepared to go on d honouring cheques on the no 2 account provided that it was kept in credit, and in fact between that date and 12th June the company made a number of payments into and drawings out of the account. But as the question whether notice was necessary was argued before us I ought perhaps to express a view on it.

I cannot agree with Lord Denning MR and Winn LJ that any period of notice was necessary, for on receipt of such a notice the company could have defeated the object
e with which it was given by at once drawing out the credit balance on the account. The choice as I see it lies between a notice taking immediate effect and no notice at all. On any footing the bank would be obliged to honour cheques drawn up to the limit of the apparent credit balance before the company became aware that the bank was consolidating the accounts and so it might be said that notification to the customer was not a condition precedent to the exercise by the bank of its right of consolidation f but only a measure of precaution which the bank might take to end its liability to honour cheques. But as counsel for the company pointed out, until the company knew that the bank was putting an end to the agreement they might go on paying cheques into the account which they would have paid into an account at some other bank if they were aware of the true position. So, for my part, I incline to the view favoured by Buckley LJ that the bank could not consolidate the accounts on a material g change of circumstances in the four months' period without notifying the company that it was doing so and also subject to a liability to honour any cheques drawn up to the limit of the credit balance before the company received the notification.

In the judgments below the question is raised whether the rights which the bank claims to exercise can be properly described as an aspect of the 'banker's lien'. No doubt the bank acquired a 'lien' on the cheque drawn by Messrs Girling on their bankers.
h But that cheque was duly honoured and any lien which the bank had on the piece of paper and the obligation of Messrs Girling created by their drawing the cheque was soon replaced by an increase in the bank's indebtedness to the company. I agree with Lord Denning MR and Buckley LJ that a debtor cannot sensibly be said to have a lien on his own indebtedness to his creditor. It may be that as a matter of history the recognition by the courts of the right of a banker to treat several accounts as one j was influenced by their earlier recognition that in the absence of agreement to the contrary a banker had a lien on all securities in his hands for the general balance owing to him on all accounts. But to describe the right to consolidate several accounts as an example of the banker's lien is, I think, a misuse of language.

It was common ground between the parties that the passing of the resolution to wind up the company in the afternoon of 12th June cancelled the mandates given by the company to the bank for the operation of the accounts and put an end to the existing relationship of banker and customer—although, of course, a fresh relationship was soon entered into between the bank and the company acting through their liquidator in place of the board of directors. This brings one to the crux of the case. Did the agreement entered into on 4th April come to an end on the passing of the resolution? To my mind it did. It was entered into in order to give the company time to dispose of their assets to advantage as a going concern and whatever may have been in the mind of the liquidator it was certainly not in the minds of the bank's representatives that it might affect the bank's rights on a liquidation. To adopt the language used by Lord Macnaghten of a similar arrangement in *British Guiana Bank v Official Receiver*¹⁰, the agreement was intended to be operative so long as the accounts were alive and no longer. After all, as the assistant general manager of the bank pointed out in evidence, what the parties wished to achieve could just as well have been effected without a second account being opened at all. The company could have agreed once more to pass all their business through the existing account and never to allow the overdraft on it to exceed the existing figure and the bank could have agreed not to call in any overdraft not exceeding that figure for four months if there was no material change of circumstances. Had the arrangement taken that form the bank would automatically have had the benefit of all cheques paid into the account before the winding-up. Indeed had the credit balance on the no 2 account at the date of the passing of the resolution been what it would have been apart from the Girling cheque—namely a few hundred pounds—I do not suppose that it would have occurred to anyone to challenge the bank's right to treat the company's indebtedness on the no 1 account as reduced by that amount. What has given rise to all the trouble is that the company without any intent to prefer the bank paid a large cheque into the no 2 account an hour or so before the resolution was passed. It is understandable that the liquidator with the interests of the other creditors in mind should think it wrong that the bank should retain this windfall; but the bank has chosen to insist on its legal rights and I think that Roskill J¹¹ was right in holding that it was entitled to consolidate the accounts, quite apart from the 'set-off' provisions in s 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914.

In the Court of Appeal¹² Lord Denning MR and Buckley LJ held that as no notice to determine it had been previously given, the agreement remained in operation after the liquidation. Winn LJ, on the other hand, agreed with counsel for the bank that the agreement came to an end on the passing of the resolution but held—for reasons which are not clear to me—that nevertheless the bank had no right to consolidate the accounts. It therefore became necessary for all three members of the court¹² to consider whether s 31 of the 1914 Act applied to the case and in deciding that question they had to proceed on the footing that it is not possible for the parties to exclude the operation of the section by agreement since that had been decided by the Court of Appeal itself in *Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox*¹³. Lord Denning MR and Winn LJ held that even so the section did not apply since the dealings between the company and the bank which gave rise to the debts on the two accounts respectively were not 'mutual dealings' within the meaning of those words as used in the section. Buckley LJ, on the other hand, held that the section applied and that the debts on the two accounts must be 'set off'. If, contrary to my opinion, the bank was not entitled to consolidate the accounts apart from the section, then I agree with Buckley LJ that the section applied. The view favoured by Lord Denning MR and

¹⁰ (1911) 104 LT 754 at 755

¹¹ [1970] 1 All ER 33, [1970] 2 WLR 754

¹² [1970] 3 All ER 473, [1970] 3 WLR 625

¹³ [1967] 1 All ER 397, [1967] 1 QB 552

- a Winn LJ places on the phrase 'mutual dealings' a meaning which in the light of the decided cases is far too narrow.

Before your Lordships counsel for the company sought to support the view of the majority of the Court of Appeal¹⁴ by reference to the so-called 'special purpose' cases (*Re Pollitt, ex parte Minor*¹⁵, *Re Mid-Kent Fruit Factory*¹⁶ and *Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Co Ltd (No 2)*¹⁷). These are all cases in which the bankrupt or the insolvent company had placed money in the hands of a person to whom it owed money on another account to be applied by him in a certain way and in the first and third cases the purpose had not been fully carried out at the time of the insolvency. Counsel for the bank submitted that the Mid-Kent case¹⁶ was wrongly decided since in it the purposes for which the money had been handed to the solicitors had been fully carried out and they were simply debtors of the bankrupt to the extent of the unexpended surplus and could set it off against his debt to them. It is, however, as I see it, unnecessary to consider any of these cases in detail since it is impossible to regard the opening of the no 2 account and the payment into it by the company from time to time of their customers' cheques against which they drew cheques for their trading expenses as being in any way analogous to the deposit by a debtor with his creditor of money to be applied by the creditor for a special purpose. Counsel for the company also submitted that this case was taken out of s 31 by the proviso since the serving of the notice of the creditors' meeting was equivalent to an act of bankruptcy and the bank by omitting to put an end to the agreement made on 4th April on receipt of this notice gave fresh credit to the company. This appears to me to be a hopeless contention. The bank gave credit to the company when it advanced the sums which made up the loan account. Not to enforce a debt as soon as one is entitled to do so cannot itself amount to giving fresh credit.

e Before your Lordships counsel for the company contended that the Court of Appeal¹⁴ was wrong in deciding as it did in the Rolls Razor case¹⁸ that the parties cannot contract out of s 31 and that the agreement made in this case excluded the operation of the section. As I have said I think that the agreement ceased to have any operation on the passing of the resolution to wind up and a fortiori it did not purport to exclude the operation of s 31. Therefore the question whether its operation can be excluded by contract does not, as I think, arise at all. However, in view of the unsatisfactory state of the authorities counsel on both sides joined in asking us to express our views on the point. The strength of the argument in favour of the view that the operation of the section cannot be excluded by agreement lies, of course, in the mandatory terms in which it is couched. The court is told that where there have been 'mutual dealings' between the debtor and someone who claims to prove as a creditor an account of the mutual dealings shall be taken, there shall be a 'set-off' of the sums mutually owing and it is only the balance that the creditor is to pay or prove for as the case may be. But on the other side one must bear in mind that the rule of 'set-off' in bankruptcy is a rule for the benefit of the man who has had mutual dealings with a bankrupt. It arose to prevent the injustice of such a man having to pay in full what he owed in respect of such dealings while only receiving a dividend on what the bankrupt owed him in respect of them (see per Mellish LJ in *Re Deveze, ex parte Barnett*¹⁹). It was a rule which was applied in practice by commissioners in bankruptcy before it received statutory sanction first in a temporary statute²⁰ and then in the series of Bankruptcy Acts stretching from 1732 to 1914. The wording of the relevant section in the successive Acts has varied slightly from time to time but I

j 14 [1970] 3 All ER 473, [1970] 3 WLR 625

15 [1893] 1 QB 455

16 [1896] 1 Ch 567

17 [1930] 2 Ch 293, [1930] All ER Rep 315

18 [1967] 1 All ER 397, [1967] 1 QB 552

19 (1874) 9 Ch App 293 at 297

20 4 & 5 Ann, c 17

do not think that any argument either way can be founded on these slight differences which do not affect the substance of the matter. I cannot see why in principle the person in whose interest it would be to invoke the rule of 'set-off' should not be entitled to agree in advance that in the event of the bankruptcy of the other party he will not invoke it. In general quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto. No doubt it would not be often that a single individual dealing with a prospective bankrupt would intend to give up his right for the benefit of the other party's general creditors. But when a trader is in difficulties a number of his creditors may well enter into an agreement between themselves and with him, a term of which is that none of them shall rely on the right. Indeed the Irish case¹ hereafter to be mentioned is an example of such an agreement. So, apart from authority, I would have thought that the section, although mandatory in its terms, should be read as being subject to any agreement to the contrary.

I proceed, therefore, to consider the authorities. The first is *Re Deveze, ex parte Barnett*². There the bankrupt owed B and Co £3,010 and B and Co owed the bankrupt £88 in respect of which the bankrupt had a lien on goods belonging to B and Co which were in his possession. The trustee in bankruptcy claimed the right to retain possession of the goods until B and Co paid him the £88. B and Co on the other hand claimed to have the £88 deducted from the £3,010 owing to them, to prove only for the balance and to have the goods returned to them on the footing that the £88 had been paid. The Court of Appeal in Chancery held that B and Co were right. In his judgment Lord Selborne used these words which are in truth the foundation of the argument that the parties cannot contract out of the section—which was then s 39 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869³:

'... it says, without noticing the subject of security at all, that when there have been mutual credits, debts, or mutual dealings . . . and a proof is to be made in bankruptcy, there is to be a rule of set-off, not, as I understand it, at the option of either party, but an absolute statutory rule—"The balance of such account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively."'

In that case the court was not concerned with an antecedent agreement by both parties that the section should not apply but with a claim by the debtor's trustee to be entitled to retain possession of the goods despite the provisions of the section which were being invoked by the creditor. No doubt it is possible to read the words 'not at the option of either party' as covering a mutual agreement made before the act of bankruptcy. But it is certainly not necessary so to read them, and I think it most unlikely that Lord Selborne had such a case in mind. If he had had it in mind and had wished to cover it by an obiter dictum I think that he would have expressed himself far more clearly.

The next case is *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*⁴. There V and Co, the bankrupts, owed J and Co £1,762 odd and J and Co owed the bankrupts £1,167. They claimed to set this off against the £1,762 owed to them but the trustee contended that when the bankrupts were getting into difficulties J and Co and other creditors agreed with them to transact business on a cash basis, that the £1,167 debt arose out of transactions subsequent to the agreement and that the agreement deprived J and Co of their right of set-off. Bacon CJ held in reliance on the words used by Lord Selborne in *Re Deveze, ex parte Barnett*³ which I have quoted that even if there was such an agreement as alleged by the trustee the law would not allow it to have effect. But the Court of Appeal dealt with the matter quite differently. Each member said that J and Co were entitled to the right of set-off unless it could be shown by the trustee that they had entered into a binding agreement to forego it, and that the evidence

1 Deering v Hyndman (1886) 18 LR (Ir) 323, 467

2 (1874) 9 Ch App 293

3 (1874) 9 Ch App at 295

4 (1877) 6 Ch D 350

a did not disclose any such binding agreement. It is true that counsel for J and Co was not called on to argue and therefore the case cannot be treated as a positive decision by the Court of Appeal that the section can be excluded by agreement, but at least it is clear that the members of the court saw no reason, prima facie, why it should not be excluded and so presumably they did not regard the words used by Lord Selborne as showing that he thought that it could not be excluded.

b The next case is *Mersey Steel & Iron Co v Naylor, Benzon & Co*⁵. Section 10 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875 provided:

‘... the same rules shall prevail and be observed ... as to debts and liabilities provable ... as may be in force for the time being under the Law of Bankruptcy with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt’.

c One question which arose in the case was whether the rules as to set-off contained in s 39 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 were rules ‘as to debts and liabilities provable’. In deciding that they were Lord Selborne said⁶:

d ‘Your Lordships observe that it is not that it may be—it is not a thing which is optional, but it is a positive, absolute rule for the purpose of proof in bankruptcy, and nothing can be proved according to that rule in such cases except the balance of the account; that only is regarded as the claim which it is competent for the creditor to make when he comes in to prove under the bankruptcy. That being so, how is it possible to say that this is not a rule, both within the general spirit and intention of the section and within the express words “as to debts and liabilities provable”?’

e With regard to those words I would say as I said of the similar language used by Lord Selborne in *Re Devezé, ex parte Barnett*⁷ that he was not considering the case of an agreement to exclude the section. Even if the section can be excluded it is obvious that the rules contained in it are rules ‘as to debts and liabilities provable’. In 1886 came the Irish case of *Deering v Hyndman*⁸. The headnote which states the facts sufficiently runs as follows⁹:

f ‘A. & Sons, a firm of flax spinners in Belfast, stopped payment in January, 1884, and called a meeting of their creditors, when a committee, of which the defendant was a member, was appointed to consider the best course to be pursued for the benefit of the creditors, and they reported in favour of continuing the business merely for the purpose of winding it up. At the time of the suspension the defendant was a creditor for over £2000. Immediately after the suspension, g A. & Sons opened what is known in Belfast as a No. 2 account with their bankers and customers; and the defendant subsequently sold goods to A. & Sons, for which he was paid in cash, and by cheques drawn on the No. 2 account, from which facts and the other evidence given in the case it appeared that the defendant was acquainted with the fact of the No. 2 account having been opened, and that h he was dealing on that account. In the month of June, 1884, the defendant purchased £1189 8s. 4d. worth of goods from A. & Sons, to be paid for in cash upon delivery. He did not, however, pay for these goods, and A. & Sons were adjudicated bankrupts on the 23rd December, 1885. In the proceedings in bankruptcy the defendant claimed to set off, under the 251st section of the Irish Bankrupt and Insolvent Act, 1857, against the debt of £1189 8s. 4d. due by him, so much of the debt due to him before the stoppage as would be sufficient i to meet it; to this the assignees objected, and brought this action to recover the sum of £1189 8s. 4d. and the defendant relied upon his right to set off.

5 (1884) 9 App Cas 434, [1881-85] All ER Rep 365

6 (1884) 9 App Cas at 438, [1881-85] All ER Rep at 367

7 (1874) 9 Ch App at 295

8 (1886) 18 LR (Ir) 323, 467

9 (1886) 18 LR (Ir) at 323, 324

Evidence, on behalf of the plaintiffs, was given, that the effect of opening a No. 2 account in Belfast was perfectly well understood by all the merchants and traders there, and that the effect was to exclude all right of set-off between transactions before and after the opening of the No. 2 account, whether bankruptcy ensued or not. The jury found, on this evidence—1st, that the committee of creditors, acting on their behalf, and with the assent of the creditors, including the defendant, had entered into an agreement with A. & Sons, that all goods thereafter sold by A. & Sons should be sold on the terms of cash payment on delivery, and that no creditor of the firm thereafter purchasing goods should have or claim any right of set-off; 2ndly, that the defendant purchased the goods in question on the terms that he would pay for them in cash, and would not set off against them the debt due by A. & Sons.

On those findings by the jury Palles CB gave judgment against the defendant for the £1,189 but the defendant applied to the Queen's Bench Division for an order to change the judgment against him into one in his favour on the ground (a) that the evidence did not support the finding that there was an agreement between the creditors to which the defendant was a party to exclude the right of 'set off' in the event of a bankruptcy and (b) that in any event the right of set-off could not be excluded by agreement. The majority of the court (May CJ and O'Brien J, Johnson J dissenting) held that there was evidence to support the verdict and all the members of the court having considered *Re Devege, ex parte Barnett*¹⁰ and *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*¹¹ held that the defendant could effectually waive by agreement the right of 'set off' given by the relevant section of the Irish Bankruptcy Act. The Irish Court of Appeal (Lord Ashbourne LC, Michael Morris CJ, Fitzgibbon and Barry LJJ) affirmed the decision of the Queen's Bench Division without calling on the respondents. In *Watkins v Lindsay & Co*¹² Wright J said:

'in order to prevent the set-off (which in bankruptcy is automatic and not dependent on the option of the party) there must be something equivalent to a binding agreement that there shall be no set-off.'

The use of the word 'option' suggests that the judge had in mind what Lord Selborne said in *Re Devege, ex parte Barnett*¹³ and interpreted his language as I would do. In 1910 in the British Guiana Bank case¹⁴—referred to above in connection with the construction of the agreement in this case—Bovell CJ after considering *Re Devege, ex parte Barnett*⁹, *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*¹⁰ and *Watkins v Lindsay*¹⁵ held that the 'set-off' provisions in the local insolvency ordinance, which corresponded to the current provisions in the English Act—s 38 of the 1883 Act—could be excluded by agreement and Hewick and Berkeley JJ were of the same opinion. The first reason in the appellant's case in the Privy Council¹⁴ was that this view was wrong but the Privy Council in allowing the appeal did so expressly on the ground that the construction placed on the agreement by the Chief Justice was to be preferred to that placed on it by his colleagues. Lord Macnaghten would hardly have said¹⁶, 'There is nothing in it to exclude the operation of the right of set off' if he had accepted the appellant's contention that whether or not it purported to exclude the right of 'set-off' made no difference.

¹⁰ (1874) 9 Ch App 293

¹¹ (1877) 6 Ch D 350

¹² (1898) 5 Mans 25 at 29

¹³ (1874) 9 Ch App at 295

¹⁴ (1911) 104 LT 754

¹⁵ (1898) 5 Mans 25

¹⁶ (1911) 104 LT at 755

a In *Re City Life Assurance Co Ltd*¹⁷, which was not a case dealing with an agreement purporting to exclude the operation of the section, Pollock MR¹⁸ said¹⁹:

‘It is to be observed that s. 31 is definite in its terms that where there is a mutual credit, mutual debt or other mutual dealings, the sums are to be set-off and the balance of the account and no more shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively. It is not merely permissive, but it is a direct statutory enactment that the balance only is to be claimed in bankruptcy.’

b I read those words as an echo of what was said by Lord Selborne in *Re Devezé, ex parte Barnett*²⁰ and in the Mersey Steel & Iron Co case¹. I do not think that Pollock MR, any more than Lord Selborne, had the question of an agreement to exclude the section in mind at all. The same may I think be said of the similar observation made by Lord Hanworth MR in *Re Fenton (No 1)*² where again there was no question of an agreement to exclude the operation of the section. In *Victoria Products Ltd v Tosh & Co Ltd*³ the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had agreed to abandon their right of set-off in the event of the plaintiffs going into liquidation. Hallett J held that on the true construction of the agreement they had not done so. He went on, however, to consider the question of law. Having referred to what Lord Selborne said in *Re Devezé, ex parte Barnett*²⁰ and to the judgment of Bacon CJ in *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*⁴ he said that the judgments of the members of the Court of Appeal in *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*⁴ could not be regarded as showing that they disagreed with Bacon CJ’s view that the section could not be excluded by agreement and that therefore the only real authorities on the point were *Re Devezé, ex parte Barnett*²⁰ and the view taken of *Re Devezé, ex parte Barnett*²⁰ by Bacon CJ in *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*⁴. Hallett J was not referred to the Irish case⁵ which is clear authority to the effect that the section can be excluded. Further the judgments of the Court of Appeal in *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*⁴, although not amounting to a decision that the section can be excluded by agreement, certainly indicate that the members of the court did not construe Lord Selborne’s remarks in *Re Devezé, ex parte Barnett*²⁰ as covering the case of an agreement.

e Finally one comes to *Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox*⁶ which is a decision of the Court of Appeal in England that the ‘set-off’ provisions cannot be excluded by agreement. Lord Denning MR said⁷:

‘the parties cannot contract out of the statute. Where there are mutual dealings, the statute says that “the balance of the account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side”. That is an absolute statutory rule which must be observed (see *Re Devezé, Ex p. Barnett*²⁰, by LORD SELBORNE, L.C.).’

g Danckwerts LJ said⁸:

‘A question was raised whether the statutory set-off could be excluded by the terms of the agreement between the parties. The authorities are meagre on this point and not very clear, but in my opinion the statutory set-off, being a matter of statute, cannot be excluded.’

h

17 [1926] Ch 191, [1925] All ER Rep 453

18 Subsequently Lord Hanworth MR

19 [1926] Ch at 203, [1925] All ER Rep at 457

20 (1874) 9 Ch App at 295

1 (1884) 9 App Cas 434, [1881-85] All ER Rep 365

2 [1931] 1 Ch 85 at 104, [1930] All ER Rep 15 at 18

3 (1941) 165 LT 78

4 (1877) 6 Ch D 350

5 Deering v Hyndman (1886) 18 LR (Ir) 323, 467

6 [1967] 1 All ER 397, [1967] 1 QB 552

7 [1967] 1 All ER at 403, 404, [1967] 1 QB at 570

8 [1967] 1 All ER at 405, [1967] 1 QB at 573

j

Winn LJ did not deal with the point specifically and it may be that he decided in favour of set-off rather on the ground that the agreement in question did not purport to exclude the section than on the ground that it could not do so. So far as appears the court was not referred to the Irish case⁹.

The position on the authorities seems to be as follows. The view that the operation of the set-off provisions cannot be excluded by agreement stems from some words used by Lord Selborne in *Re Devezze, ex parte Barnett*¹⁰, and in the Mersey Steel & Iron Co case¹¹, which several judges, i.e. Bacon CJ¹², Hallett J¹³, Lord Denning MR and Danckwerts LJ¹⁴, have construed as meaning that Lord Selborne considered that there could be no 'contracting out'. On the other hand, other judges, i.e. the members of the Court of Appeal in *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*¹⁵, the Irish judges in *Deering v Hyndman*⁹, Wright J¹⁶, and the local judges and the members of the Board in the British Guiana case¹⁷ appear not to have so read Lord Selborne's words. So far as decisions go we have the decision of the Irish Court of Appeal⁹ on the one side and the decision of the English Court of Appeal¹⁴ on the other. For my part, as I have said, I can see no reason in principle why the section should not be excluded by agreement; I do not think that Lord Selborne intended to indicate that the thought that it could not be excluded by agreement; and I prefer the decision in *Deering v Hyndman*⁹ to that in the Rolls Razor case¹⁸. Therefore if, contrary to my opinion, the agreement in this case did not determine on the winding up and was intended to exclude the operation of s 31 I would think that the company were entitled to succeed. As it is, however, I would allow the appeal.

LORD KILBRANDON. My Lords, the history of the last days of the respondent company as a going concern may be briefly summarised as follows. In February 1968 the company were substantially indebted, on current account, to the appellant bank. In order to protect their cash assets in the event of the bank demanding repayment, a trading account, which was always in credit, had been kept with Lloyds Bank. On 23rd February the bank formally warned the company that the position of the company's account was unacceptable to the bank. The position taken up by the company's then financial adviser, Mr Phillips, afterwards the liquidator, was that the company, while insolvent in the practical sense of being unable to meet their liabilities, including that to the bank, as they fell due, were solvent in the sense of their assets exceeding their liabilities on a 'proper' as opposed to a 'forced' realisation. This was the situation giving rise to the meeting of 4th April, at which the agreement between the bank and the company, the source of this litigation, was negotiated.

On 17th April the assistant general manager of the bank wrote to the company setting out his account of what was agreed at the meeting, and on 22nd April a director of the company replied: 'I herewith confirm that I accept the conditions and arrangements that have been laid out.' Nevertheless, at the trial before Roskill J¹⁹, an attempt was made in evidence for the company to prove an express oral agreement, said to have been arrived at at the meeting—

'that in the event of the [company] agreeing to open a no 2 account . . . the

⁹ Deering v Hyndman (1886) 18 LR (Ir) 323, 467

¹⁰ (1874) 9 Ch App at 295

¹¹ (1884) 9 App Cas 434, [1881-85] All ER Rep 365

¹² In Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher (1877) 6 Ch D 350

¹³ In Victoria Products Ltd v Tosh & Co Ltd (1941) 165 LT 78

¹⁴ In Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox [1967] 1 All ER 397, [1967] 1 QB 552

¹⁵ (1877) 6 Ch D 350

¹⁶ In Watkins v Lindsay & Co (1898) 5 Mans 25 at 29

¹⁷ (1911) 104 LT 754

¹⁸ [1967] 1 All ER 397, [1967] 1 QB 552

¹⁹ [1970] 1 All ER 33 at 36, [1970] 2 WLR 754 at 759

- a* bank would in no circumstances seek to set-off any balance on that no 2 account against the frozen overdraft on the no 1 account.'

The learned judge did not accept the evidence of such an oral agreement, but I pause to observe that that evidence seems to have offended against the principle, as laid down, for example by Lord Morris in *Bank of Australasia v Palmer*¹ that—

- b* 'parol testimony cannot be received to contradict, vary, add to or subtract from the terms of a written contract, or the terms in which the parties have deliberately agreed to record any part of their contract.'

I will also add that the subsequent conduct and attitudes of the company seem to be strongly coloured by their erroneous belief that such an agreement had in fact been concluded.

- c* The agreement had been, substantially, (a) that the company's current account should become a loan account (no 1 account) and become frozen at its then figure, no further transactions other than permanent reductions to take place thereon; (b) the Lloyds Bank account was to be closed and a new account (no 2 account) opened with the bank, to be maintained strictly in credit, and to bear the bank charges, including the interest due on the no 1 account; (c) the company's representatives undertook to come to a decision regarding a sale of the company, or failing that a disposal of their assets, 'within the next four months', while the bank stipulated that 'in the absence of materially changed circumstances in the meantime we for our part will adhere to the present scheme of arrangements for this period of time'.

- e* On 20th May the company gave notice, under s 293 of the Companies Act 1948, of a meeting of creditors to be held on 12th June. This notice was received by the bank on 24th May, and on 28th May the bank acknowledged it to the company in terms which, in my opinion, make it quite clear that the bank were not to rely on the notice as a change of circumstances within the meaning of the agreement, although it is common ground that they would have been entitled to treat the notice in that way.

- f* On 12th June the company received from one of their customers, in ordinary course, a cheque for £8,611 5s 10d, and at about noon passed this cheque to the bank for collection. At 2.30 pm the company resolved that they be wound up voluntarily. On 13th June the cheque was credited to the no 2 account, and on 14th June the cheque was cleared. The question is whether, having regard to the terms of the agreement between the bank and the company the proceeds of the cheque fall to be included in the assets of the company for distribution among the creditors, or whether the bank are entitled to apply them towards the discharge of the company's liability on the no 1 account.

- g* In the ordinary case, and in the absence of any agreement expressing or necessarily implying the contrary, where a customer has two current accounts, the bank is entitled to utilise the credit balance on one account to cover a debit on the other.
- h* I agree with the criticism by Lord Denning MR² of the dictum to the contrary by Swift J in *W P Greenhalgh & Sons v Union Bank of Manchester Ltd*³. The bank, however, cannot combine accounts where one of the accounts is a loan account and the other is a current account, as here: see *Bradford Old Bank Ltd v Sutcliffe*⁴. This exception was, naturally, founded on by the company. But the latter rule does not apply in bankruptcy. In *Re E J Morel (1934) Ltd*⁵ the principal question at issue related to the proper way of arriving at the sum of the bank's preferential claim arising out of

1 [1897] AC 540 at 545

2 [1970] 3 All ER at 478, [1970] 3 WLR at 635

3 [1924] 2 KB 153, [1924] All ER Rep 338

4 [1918] 2 KB 833 at 844

5 [1961] 1 All ER 796, [1962] Ch 21

advances for the payment of wages: see the analysis by Roskill J in the report of this case⁶. But in the course of considering whether the current account and the wages account were in the circumstances, to be treated as a single entity, Buckley J observed⁷:

'If it be right to regard all three accounts of the company as separate accounts, of course, there has to be a set-off of the credit on the No. 2 account against the debits on the No. 1 account and the wages account', the no 1 account being, as here, a frozen loan account. This right of set-off, in bankruptcy, between a loan and a current account is also implied in the judgment of Ungood-Thomas J in *Re Keever (a bankrupt)*⁸.

The main question in the case, and on one view the only question, is whether as a matter of construction the agreement between the bank and the company was intended to, and did, provide that in the event which happened, i.e. a winding-up of the company, the bank were to be deprived of the power, which they would in the absence of agreement have had, to combine the no 1 and the no 2 accounts. This depends on a construction of the agreement. I have formed the opinion that such was not the intention or the effect of the agreement.

The substratum of the agreement was that the company were to be kept on their feet as a going concern for the purpose of being sold as a going concern, or for the profitable disposal of their assets. I do not see how it can have been in the contemplation of parties that the agreement should continue in force after liquidation, which event would make either of its objectives unattainable. An alleged express stipulation which would have had that effect has been disproved, and I can see no grounds for inferring one. The terms of the agreement themselves are all against any such intention. The contemplated course of dealings, during the currency of the agreement, was to consist of permanent reductions of the balance on the no 1 account, and the continuance of current business on the no 2 account transferred from Lloyds Bank for the purpose. Neither of these were consistent with a winding-up. In my opinion the words of the judgment of the Privy Council in *British Guiana Bank v Official Receiver*⁹ are appropriate to this case: '... it is an ordinary business agreement, intended to be operative so long as the accounts are alive, and no longer.'

A subsidiary point was made, to the effect that, granted there was power to combine accounts, this could only be done on due notice. Normally a bank is not entitled to close a customer's account without due notice. This is at least mainly for the protection of outstanding cheques. Not only does that reason cease to operate on liquidation, but it is difficult to see, after liquidation, what relevant information notice by the bank could give to the company.

If, on a proper construction of the agreement, the arrangement between the parties was not intended to and did not in fact extend beyond the period of the company's active life, and therefore did not survive the winding-up, that is an end of the case in the bank's favour. But a great deal of the argument was directed to s 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914, as applied to liquidations by s 317 of the Companies Act 1948, and it is necessary to deal with the points which were raised. In the Court of Appeal¹⁰ Lord Denning MR held that the section did not apply because the 'dealings' between the parties were not 'mutual'. Buckley LJ took a different view, holding that there were here mutual dealings, and that s 31 applied. I agree with the reasoning of Buckley LJ and cannot express my own opinion in any more convincing way.

In holding that the section, for want of mutuality, did not apply, Winn LJ restated the position he had adopted in *Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox*¹¹ saying¹² that it is possible that persons dealing with one another on a running account—

6 [1970] 1 All ER at 51, [1970] 2 WLR at 774

7 [1961] 1 All ER at 804, [1962] 1 Ch at 33

8 [1966] 3 All ER 631, [1967] Ch 182

9 (1911) 104 LT at 755

10 [1970] 3 All ER 473, [1970] 3 WLR 625

11 [1967] 1 All ER 397, [1967] 1 QB 552

12 [1970] 3 All ER at 486, [1970] 3 WLR at 643

- a* 'may separate out from such mutual dealings and agree to make the subject of separate payment some particular transaction or transactions or some particular aspect of their relations.'

He goes on to give some examples of instances in which, with great respect, I cannot see on the authorities that set-off would not arise. The concept of 'separating out', except insofar as it resembles the topic I am next to discuss, is, in my view, of doubtful

- b* validity as a test of the applicability of the right of set-off; in any case I do not think that the present transaction, in the banker/customer relationship, could properly fall under such a description.

There are several cases in which set-off under s 31 has been held inapplicable where the bankrupt has supplied the creditor with funds for what has been called a 'special purpose'; the creditor is not entitled to set-off against that sum the debt in respect

- c* of which he is to prove in the bankruptcy. In *Re Pollitt*¹³ the creditor, a solicitor, held money entrusted to him by the bankrupt for future costs; he could not set this off against costs already incurred. In *Re Mid-Kent Fruit Factory*¹⁴ the fund which could not be set-off represented a surplus held by a solicitor out of a sum specially provided by the bankrupt for the satisfaction of claims made prior to bankruptcy.

- d* In *Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Co Ltd (No 2)*¹⁵ a fund held by way of guarantee against the carrying out of specific obligations was held to be 'special' in this sense. In all these cases the funds may be said to have been impressed with quasi-trust purposes and that is sufficient to destroy the mutuality which is a prerequisite of the right to set-off arising, since it is necessary that the debts were between the parties in the same right, a condition which the holding of a sum as trustee would destroy: see

- e* *Re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co, Lee & Chapman's Case*¹⁶. That there was a particular motive in the present case, not always discernible in the banker/customer relationship, is clear, but that does not mean that the sum sought to be set-off was due by the bank to the company in any different right of a fiduciary character. In my opinion, accordingly, there is nothing in the present agreement to take the dealings between the parties outside the range of s 31.

- f* The question to which I now turn is, on the view I have formed, really hypothetical, and not calling for decision, but we were urged on any contingency to give our opinions on it. The question is whether, if assumptions be made that the transactions between the parties were such that the provisions of s 31 would have been applicable on a winding-up, and that the terms of the agreement were such as to express an intention to 'contract out' of the requirements as to set-off contained in that section, the law permits the provisions of the section to be set aside by agreement of parties

- g* in such circumstances. As a preliminary to the examination of the authorities, some assistance can be gained from the history of the provision. The determining words are:

- h* 'an account shall be taken of what is due from the one party to the other in respect of such mutual dealings, and the sum due from the one party shall be set off against any sum due from the other party, and the balance of the account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively.'

We were referred to the relevant Acts of 1729, 1732, 1825, 1849, and 1869 (the Act immediately preceding that of 1914), all of which make provision for set-off. The language in its present form was first used in 1869; in previous Acts provisions of similar import, although narrower in scope, contained such phrases as 'one debt or demand may be set against another'. It is at least not improbable that the mandatory form of words was introduced as a matter of policy, in order to emphasise that the operation of set-off was not to be in the option of the parties or one of them; certainly there is an ample number of expressions of judicial opinion, whether obiter dicta or not seems immaterial, lending support to that view.

13 [1893] 1 QB 455

14 [1896] 1 Ch 567

15 [1930] 2 Ch 293, [1930] All ER Rep 315

16 (1885) 30 Ch D 216

An interesting feature of this controversy is that while by s 318 of the Companies Act 1948 the provisions of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1913 relating to ranking of claims are imported into the Scottish liquidation code, there is no equivalent to s 31 to be found in the latter Act. The right of set-off, or, as Bell¹⁷ calls it, the balancing of accounts in bankruptcy, stands on the common law of compensation or retention, expanded in cases of bankruptcy to include debts which would not be susceptible of set-off in the case of a solvent creditor. For example, in bankruptcy, the debts need not be of the same nature, or both due at the same time, or both liquid. Bell¹⁸ supplies an illuminating account of the parallel development of the law in England and Scotland respectively. It would hardly be possible to maintain in Scotland that set-off is mandatory, and independent of the act or agreement of parties, since 'it must be pleaded by the debtor who wishes to take advantage of it' and again¹⁹:

'Compensation may be pleaded not only by the primary debtor, but even illo tacente vel negante, by anyone having an interest, as a cautioner in a bond, or an indorser of a bill of exchange . . .'

So, if set-off be mandatory in England, this seems to be one of the fields in which the law relating to British companies varies according as they are registered in England or in Scotland.

The authorities are not in a condition entirely satisfactory for the drawing of a confident conclusion. Obiter dicta apart, I do not think that until *Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox*²⁰ there was any case in which it was decided that an actual agreement which purported to contract out of s 31 was pro tanto unenforceable, although there are cases, such as *British Guiana Bank v Official Receiver*¹ and *Watkins v Lindsay & Co*², in which it was held that an actual agreement did not in fact purport to contract out. In the latter case Wright J (if correctly reported) said³: 'there must be something equivalent to a binding agreement that there shall be no set-off'—an expression which, read literally, does not seem to be consistent with the proposition that such an agreement could never have legal effect. The same observation is true of the judgments in the Court of Appeal in *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*⁴.

In *Deering v Hyndman*⁵ a firm had committed an act of bankruptcy. A number of creditors agreed among themselves that the business should be continued for the purpose of its being wound up. They entered into a contract with the firm to the effect that thereafter the firm were to sell exclusively for cash on delivery, and on no other terms as to payment whatever, and that no creditor of the firm who thereafter purchased goods from the firm should have any right of set-off of the debt of the firm to himself as against the goods so purchased. Hyndman, who was a party to this contract, in defiance of its terms bought goods from the firm on credit, and claimed to set-off against the unpaid price the amount the firm owed him. It was in these circumstances that the Irish court held that 'the defendant is bound to pay for the goods which he purchased and pay for them in cash, not by setting up a set-off': per May CJ⁶. Although Johnson J decided the case on the maxim quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto, and his judgment therefore supports the company's case, May CJ⁶ expressly went on the ground that—'a special agreement was entered into in this case, not by any particular

¹⁷ Bell's Commentaries II, 119

¹⁸ Bell's Commentaries II, 119-121

¹⁹ Goudy on Bankruptcy (4th Edn) pp 551, 552

²⁰ [1967] 1 All ER 397, [1967] 1 QB 552

¹ (1911) 104 LT 754

² (1898) 5 Mans 25

³ (1898) 5 Mans at 29

⁴ (1877) 6 Ch D at 357

⁵ (1886) 18 LR (Ir) 323, 467

⁶ (1886) 18 LR (Ir) at 332

a creditor, but by the general body, to exclude a set-off . . . and . . . agreement not inconsistent with the Bankruptcy Code, but, on the contrary, in harmony with that Code, and in order to further and protect the rights of the general body of the creditors.’

The case of *Deering*⁷ is thus seen to be of a very special character, depending on an agreement far removed both in content and objective from that in the present case; it can in my opinion not be relied on as contradicting the general rule against contracting out which has so often been stated.

b Apart from the express decision of the Court of Appeal in *Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox*⁸, the proposition that the provisions for set-off in bankruptcy are mandatory, and cannot be contracted out of, depends on a number of dicta which I will not cite again but will merely refer to. I may observe that the plain statements by Lord Selborne LC in Re Deveze, *ex parte Barnett*⁹ and in *Mersey Steel & Iron Co v Naylor, Benzon & Co*¹⁰ appear not to have been cited in *Deering v Hyndman*¹¹. In *Re Vaughan, ex parte Fletcher*¹², the opinion of Bacon CJ after quoting Lord Selborne LC in *Re Deveze, ex parte Barnett*¹³ that ‘if there were such an agreement as alleged by the debtors, that law put an end to it’, was not touched on in the judgments of the Court of Appeal⁸. The rule was stated three times by Lord Hanworth MR in *Re City Life Assurance Co Ltd*¹⁴, *Re Fenton (No 1)*¹⁵ and *Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Co Ltd (No 2)*¹⁶. It was also referred to with approval by Hallett J in *Victoria Products Ltd v Tosh & Co Ltd*¹⁷.

In my opinion, accordingly, the rule now is that the terms of s 31 are mandatory in the sense that not only do they lay down statutory directives for the administration of claims in bankruptcy, but they also make it impossible for persons effectively to contract, either before or after an act of bankruptcy has occurred, with a view to the bankruptcy being administered otherwise than in accordance with the statutory directives. In other words, as Lord Denning MR said in *Rolls Razor Ltd v Cox*¹⁸, ‘the parties cannot contract out of the statute’. I must admit to having been impressed by the argument that such a rule—enunciated as it was for the first time in 1967, otherwise than by obiter dicta, albeit some of great weight—may be expected to form a serious embarrassment to those wishing to adopt the beneficial course of agreeing to moratoria for the assistance of business in financial difficulties. But if that be so, it seems to call for the intervention of the legislature. It is, in any event, generally agreed that a restatement of the law of bankruptcy, both for England and for Scotland, is overdue.

For these reasons, I would allow this appeal.

g Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Waltons & Co (for the bank); Landau & Co (for the company).

S A Hatteea Esq Barrister.

7 (1886) 18 LR (Ir) 323, 467
 8 [1967] 1 All ER 397, [1967] 1 QB 552
 h 9 (1874) 9 Ch App 293
 10 (1884) 9 App Cas 434, [1881-85] All ER Rep 365
 11 (1886) 18 LR (Ir) 323, 467
 12 (1877) 6 Ch D 350
 13 (1874) 9 Ch App at 295
 14 [1926] Ch at 202, [1925] All ER Rep at 457
 15 [1931] 1 Ch at 104, [1930] All ER Rep at 18, 19
 j 16 [1930] 2 Ch 293 at 310, [1930] All ER Rep 315 at 318, 319
 17 (1941) 165 LT at 80
 18 [1967] 1 All ER at 403, [1967] 1 QB at 570

Canada Safeway Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs ^a

CHANCERY DIVISION

MEGARRY J

25th, 26th NOVEMBER 1971

Stamp duty – Relief from duty – Transfer between associated companies – Associated companies – One company beneficial owner of not more than 90 per cent of issued share capital of the other – Meaning of issued share capital – Canadian company having two classes of share – American company owning less than 90 per cent of nominal issued share capital of Canadian company but more than 90 per cent in value of issued share capital of Canadian company – Transfer of shares held by American company in English company to Canadian company – Whether American company beneficial owner at time of not less than 90 per cent of issued share capital of Canadian company – Whether issued share capital meaning nominal issued share capital or value of issued share capital – Whether American and Canadian companies associated companies – Finance Act 1930, s 42, as amended by Finance Act 1967, s 27. ^b ^c

At 28th December 1967 the issued share capital of the taxpayer company ('the Canadian company') consisted of 62,387 cumulative redeemable preference shares of 100 Canadian dollars each, with a nominal value of 6,238,700 Canadian dollars, and 280,000 ordinary shares of 10 Canadian dollars each with a nominal value of 2,800,000 Canadian dollars. An American company owned the whole of the ordinary shares but none of the preference shares in the Canadian company. On nominal values the American company therefore owned less than one-third of the issued share capital of the Canadian company. The actual value of the ordinary shares, however, amounted to 195 million dollars, whereas the actual value of the preference shares was less than 7 million dollars. Accordingly, on an actual value basis, but not on a nominal value basis, the American company owned more than 90 per cent of the issued share capital of the Canadian company. On 28th December 1967 the American company sold and transferred to the Canadian company 2,770,000 'A' ordinary shares in an English company for nearly 18 million US dollars. The consideration for the transfer of the shares was stated in the form of transfer to be 10s, but the Stamp Duty Office claimed ad valorem duty amounting to £23,080 under the head 'Conveyance or Transfer on Sale' in the First Schedule to the Stamp Act 1891. The Canadian company claimed relief from duty under s 42^a of the Finance Act 1930, as amended by s 27 of the Finance Act 1967, on the ground that, at the relevant date, the American company was the beneficial owner of not less than 90 per cent of the 'issued share capital' of the Canadian company so that the two companies were associated companies. ^d ^e ^f ^g

Held – The transfer was liable to ad valorem duty because—

(i) prima facie the phrase 'issued share capital' meant issued nominal share capital; the words 'share capital' . . . [divided] into shares of a fixed amount' in s 2 (4)^b of the Companies Act 1948 presupposed a context wholly removed from whatever fluctuating value might be put on shares from time to time, and s 42 (2) of the Finance Act 1930, in referring to 'issued share capital', used language which was entirely consonant with that of the 1948 Act; the word 'capital' in s 42 (2) was inept if it was intended to convey the idea of actual value, for the capital of a company might remain wholly unchanged while estimates of the value of the company's assets or its undertaking or its shares might fluctuate greatly on the stock exchange or elsewhere; to proffer a percentage of the value of the issued share capital was no compliance with a statutory demand for a percentage of the issued share capital (see p 671 b to f, post); ^h ^j

^a Section 42, as amended and so far as material, is set out at p 669 h and j to p 670 b, post

^b Section 2 (4), so far as material, is set out at p 671 b, post

- a (ii) there was no good reason for ousting the prima facie construction of the phrase; the test of nominal value, in contrast to actual value, was simple, workable and, above all, related to the words 'share capital' (see p 671 j, post).

Notes

For relief from transfer stamp duty in the case of transfers of property as between associated companies, see 6 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 786, para 1585.

- b For the Finance Act 1930, s 42, see 32 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 237.
For the Companies Act 1948, s 2, see 5 ibid 123.

Cases referred to in judgment

Curzon Offices Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs [1944] 1 All ER 606; affg [1944] 1 All ER 163, 9 Digest (Repl) 709, 4703.

- c Escoigne Properties Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs [1958] 1 All ER 406, [1958] AC 549, [1958] 2 WLR 336, Digest (Cont Vol A) 178, 4703a.
Lever Bros Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs [1938] 2 All ER 808, [1938] 2 KB 518, 107 LJKB 669, 159 LT 136, 9 Digest (Repl) 420, 2720.

Case stated

- d 1. The opinion of the court was desired as to the stamp duty chargeable on a transfer dated 28th December 1967 ('the transfer') being a transfer to the appellant, Canada Safeway Ltd ('the Canadian company') of 2,770,000 'A' ordinary shares in Safeway Food Stores Ltd ('the English company') which had been presented by the Canadian company to the commissioners under s 12 of the Stamp Act 1891 for the opinion of the commissioners as to the stamp duty with which it was chargeable.
- e 2. Safeway Stores Inc ('the American company') was a body corporate which was incorporated with limited liability in 1926 under the laws of the State of Maryland.
3. The Canadian company was a body corporate which was incorporated in Canada with limited liability on 14th January 1929 by letters patent under the Companies Act of Canada under the name of Safeway Stores Ltd. The Canadian company's name was changed to its present name on 23rd June 1947. At all relevant times its authorised share capital was 14,038,700 Canadian dollars divided into 112,387 cumulative redeemable preferred shares of 100 Canadian dollars each ('the preferred shares'), of which 62,387 were issued, and 280,000 common shares of 10 Canadian dollars each ('the common shares') all of which were issued and fully paid. All of the common shares were in the beneficial ownership of the American company and carried the right to one vote per share at all general meetings of the Canadian company. None of the preferred shares was in the beneficial ownership of the American company.
- g The preferred shares carried no right to vote at any meeting of the shareholders of the Canadian company unless and until the Canadian company from time to time should fail to pay in the aggregate six quarterly dividends on the preferred shares of any series on the dates on which the same should have been paid according to the terms thereof. At all relevant times no such failure had occurred. The preferred shares were quoted on the Montreal and Toronto stock exchanges. They were redeemable at any time by the Canadian company on 30 days' notice at a price varying in accordance with the date of redemption from 104 Canadian dollars to 100½ Canadian dollars and the Canadian company had the right to purchase preferred shares in the open market for cancellation, but at all relevant times the 62,387 preferred shares had not been redeemed nor purchased for cancellation.
- h
- j 4. The consolidated balance sheet of the Canadian company as at 30th December 1967 showed what was therein described as 'shareholders' equity' to be 95,907,431 Canadian dollars. The 'shareholders' equity' comprised the par value of the preferred shares (6,238,700 Canadian dollars), the par value of the common shares (2,800,000 Canadian dollars) and retained earnings (86,868,731 Canadian dollars). At all relevant times the actual value of the preferred shares (as ascertained from the stock market quotations) was below par value and the actual value of the common shares (as ascertained from the balance sheet) exceeded 90 per cent of the aggregate actual values of the 62,387 preferred shares and of the common shares. a

5. The English company was a private company incorporated in England with limited liability on 3rd June 1954 under the Companies Act 1948. At all relevant times its authorised share capital was £4,000,000 and its issued share capital consisted of 2,770,000 'A' ordinary shares of £1 each credited as fully paid up and of 250,000 'B' ordinary shares of £1 each credited as fully paid up. Prior to the date of the transfer the 2,770,000 'A' ordinary shares were in the beneficial ownership and registered in the name of the American company. b

6. By an agreement ('the agreement') executed on 27th December 1967 but expressed to be dated and entered into as of 30th September 1967 and made between the American company and the Canadian company the American company agreed to sell and transfer to the Canadian company and the Canadian company agreed to purchase and acquire from the American company 'effective immediately after the close of business on 30th September 1967', inter alia, the 2,770,000 'A' ordinary shares owned by the American company in the English company for an aggregate purchase price of 17,827,876.40 US dollars, of which 5,539,187.36 US dollars represented the proportion payable in respect of the ordinary shares. c

7. The agreement was duly completed on 28th December 1967 when the American company executed and delivered to the Canadian company, inter alia, the transfer and received in return the aggregate consideration of 17,827,876.40 US dollars. d

8. It was contended by the Canadian company that the transfer was relieved from liability to ad valorem 'Conveyance or Transfer on Sale' duty by s 42 of the Finance Act 1930 (as amended by s 27 of the Finance Act 1967) because the effect of the transfer was to convey or transfer a beneficial interest in property from one body corporate (namely the American company) to another (namely the Canadian company) and that the bodies in question were associated in that the American company was at the relevant time the beneficial owner of not less than 90 per cent of the issued share capital of the Canadian company, as it owned not less than 90 per cent of the actual value of the said issued share capital. e

9. The commissioners were of the opinion that relief under s 42 (as amended) was not appropriate because the American company and the Canadian company were not associated at the relevant time in that the American company was beneficial owner of less than 90 per cent of the issued share capital of the Canadian company, as it owned less than 90 per cent of the nominal value of the issued share capital. f

10. It was common ground that if the contention of the Canadian company was correct and relief under s 42 (as amended) was appropriate where one body corporate was beneficial owner of not less than 90 per cent of the actual value of the issued share capital of the other, although not beneficial owner of not less than 90 per cent of the nominal value of the issued share capital of the other, the Canadian company would be entitled to the relief which it claimed. g

11. The commissioners therefore refused relief under s 42 and assessed the transfer with ad valorem 'Conveyance or Transfer on Sale' duty at the rate of 10s for every £50 or part of £50 on the amount or value of the consideration expressed in the agreement, i.e. 5,539,187.36 US dollars converted at the rate of 2.4 US dollars to £1, namely £2,307,994. The duty thus assessed amounted to £23,080. h

12. Being dissatisfied with the assessment made and having paid the duty in accordance therewith the Canadian company for the purposes of an appeal against the assessment to the High Court required the commissioners to state and sign a case. i

J G Monroe for the Canadian company.

Michael Wheeler QC and P L Gibson for the Crown.

MEGARRY J. This case involves a short point on the law of stamp duty. It arises on a case stated for the opinion of the court by the Commissioners of Inland

- a* Revenue under the Stamp Act 1891, s 13. The question is whether or not a transfer of shares is liable to stamp duty of £23,080 as assessed by the commissioners. The shares are in an English company called Safeway Food Stores Ltd, and the transfer is dated 28th December 1967. The transferor is a company incorporated in Maryland called Safeway Stores Inc, and the transferee is a company called Canada Safeway Ltd, incorporated in Canada. I shall call the two companies 'the American company' and 'the Canadian company' respectively. It is the Canadian company which is the appellant before me, the commissioners being the respondents. The consideration for the transfer of the shares is stated in the transfer to be 10s, but the transfer was made pursuant to an agreement under seal executed on 27th December 1967; and it is not disputed that the consideration under that agreement that is appropriate to transfer is 5,539,187·36 US dollars. This, converted at the rate of 2·40 US dollars to the £1, is equivalent to £2,307,994. The ad valorem duty on this under the head 'Conveyance or Transfer on Sale', at the rate of 10s for every £50 or part of £50, comes to the £23,080 in dispute.

- b* One question alone arises for decision, and that is whether or not the Canadian company is entitled to relief from stamp duty under the Finance Act 1930, s 42, as amended by the Finance Act 1967, s 27. Stated broadly, s 42 exempts an instrument from stamp duty when it is shown that the instrument transfers a beneficial interest from one body corporate to another body corporate, and the two bodies corporate are 'associated' in the sense that, inter alia, one is the beneficial owner of not less than 90 per cent of the issued share capital of the other. Here, the position at the date of the transfer was that the issued share capital in the Canadian company had a total nominal value of 9,038,700 Canadian dollars. This falls into two classes. There were 62,387 cumulative redeemable preference shares of 100 Canadian dollars each, with a nominal value of 6,238,700 Canadian dollars: and of these the American company owned none. The rest of the issued share capital in the Canadian company consisted of 280,000 ordinary shares of 10 Canadian dollars each; and the American company owned all of these. It had a nominal value of 2,800,000 Canadian dollars. On nominal values, the American company accordingly owned less than one-third of the issued share capital, and thus fell far short of the requisite 90 per cent for exemption from stamp duty. On the other hand, it is agreed that the actual value of the shares owned by the American company was over 195 million dollars, while the shares not owned by that company were worth less than 7 million dollars. If the test is actual value and not nominal value, the American company thus easily satisfies the 90 per cent requirement. It is accordingly common ground that the whole question in dispute turns on whether the percentage to be taken is to be based on actual value or on nominal value: if the former, the exemption applies and the appeal succeeds; if the latter, the exemption does not apply and the appeal fails.

- c* I turn to the Act. By s 42 (1):

- d* 'Stamp duty under the heading "Conveyance or Transfer on Sale" in the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, shall not be chargeable on an instrument to which this section applies.'

- e* There is then a proviso relating to the formalities of exemption which has not been relied on and which I need not read. The original sub-s (2) was, by the Finance Act 1967, s 27 (2), replaced by a new sub-s (2) and sub-s (3), and these were in force before the execution of the transfer in question. The two new subsections read as follows:

- f* '(2) This section applies to any instrument as respects which it is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioners that the effect thereof is to convey or transfer a beneficial interest in property from one body corporate to another, and that the bodies in question are associated, that is to say, one is beneficial owner of not less than ninety per cent. of the issued share capital of the other, or a third such body is beneficial owner of not less than ninety per cent. of the issued share capital of each. a

(3) The ownership referred to in subsection (2) above is ownership either directly or through another body corporate or other bodies corporate, or partly directly and partly through another body corporate or other bodies corporate, and Part I of Schedule 4 to the Finance Act 1938 (determination of amount of capital held through other bodies corporate) shall apply for the purposes of this section with the substitution of references to issued share capital for references to ordinary share capital.' b

The argument, of course, centred round the phrase 'ninety per cent. of the issued share capital' in sub-s (2). For the Canadian company counsel accepted that the phrase admitted of either construction, namely, nominal value or actual value. He also accepted that one might well start with an initial idea of the nominal value being the right construction. But, he said, one must consider the purpose of the section, and adopt the construction which best effectuated that purpose. By way of example he guided me to some sections in the Companies Act 1948 which used phrases which made it clear, or at least rather clearer, which meaning was intended; and, on behalf of the commissioners, counsel for the Crown matched counsel for the Canadian company by guiding me to other sections in the same Act to a similar effect: see ss 141 (2) and 209 (1), (2), and ss 5 (2) (a) and 134 (b). Counsel for the Canadian company also pointed to the difficulty of applying the nominal value test to the shares of no par value that are to be found in some unlimited companies and some foreign companies; and he took me to some general statements of the purpose of this legislation that had been made in *Curzon Offices Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹, per Goddard LJ, and in *Escoigne Properties Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs*², per Lord Denning. Counsel for the Canadian company's broad submission was that to make sense one had to bring in the idea of actual value rather than nominal value. Where, as here, one company has, by actual value, what in substance is the overwhelming ownership of another company, it was unreasonable that effect should be denied to that overwhelming ownership merely because the nominal value of the shares fell short of the requisite percentage. Where there was only one class of shares, either test would naturally produce the same result; but where, as here, there were two classes, and the two tests produced different results, effect should be given to the test of actual value, thus preferring substance to form. c
d
e
f

The legislature could, of course, have adopted any test it wished. The percentage might have been in terms based on nominal values, actual values, number of shares, control, or, indeed, anything else. One may subscribe wholeheartedly, as I do, to Lord Denning's views in the Escoigne case² as to the value of examples as showing how a complicated statutory provision works, and the need to 'get the feel' of the provision before interpreting it; but ultimately, as Lord Denning pointed out, one is driven back to the actual words used in the Act. In giving instances of how s 42 worked, Lord Denning³ used the phrases 'holds more than ninety per cent. of the shares' and 'a ninety per cent. shareholding'. For the purpose of the examples these no doubt were convenient phrases; but they cannot be applied literally to a case where, for example, there are 950 shares of 5p each and 50 shares of £1 each. The owner of the 950 shares owns more than 90 per cent of the shares, but holds far less than 90 per cent of the nominal value of the shares. Rightly, nobody has suggested to me that the test could be the number of shares, rather than the nominal value or the actual g
h
i

¹ [1944] 1 All ER 606 at 607

² [1958] 1 All ER 406 at 413-415, [1958] AC 549 at 564-567

³ [1958] 1 All ER at 414, 415, [1958] AC at 566, 567

a value. A similar comment applies to the phrase of Goddard LJ in the Curzon case⁴, where he spoke of 'the whole or practically the whole of the shares'. In the statutory phrase (which is identical in both the original and the revised versions of s 42 (2)) the percentage relates to the 'issued share capital', and not the 'issued shares'.

b Now it seems to me that the prima facie meaning of the phrase 'ninety per cent. of the issued share capital' is 90 per cent of the nominal or face value of the issued share capital, rather than 90 per cent of its market value. The Companies Act 1948, s 2 (4), provides that:

'In the case of a company having a share capital—(a) the memorandum must also, unless the company is an unlimited company, state the amount of share capital with which the company proposes to be registered and the division thereof into shares of a fixed amount . . .'

c The concept is that of a 'share capital' which is 'divided into shares of a fixed amount'. This is a concept wholly removed from whatever fluctuating value may be put on those shares from time to time. When the Finance Act 1930, s 42 (2), refers to 'issued share capital', it uses language which, as might be expected, is entirely consonant with that of the Companies Act 1948. The 90 per cent in s 42 (2) is a percentage of the d 'capital' of the company, as qualified by the adjectival words 'issued share'. The word 'capital' seems to me to be a word which in this context is inept if it is intended to convey the idea of actual values. The capital of a company may remain wholly unchanged while estimates of the value of the company's assets or its undertaking or its shares fluctuate greatly on the stock exchange and elsewhere. To proffer a percentage of the value of the issued share capital is no compliance with a statutory e demand for a percentage of the issued share capital itself. Furthermore, the phrase 'actual value', as with most phrases relating to value, is capable of a variety of meanings. Is one speaking of the market value of the shares, of the business as a going concern, or of the assets? Is one speaking of the value on the information in fact known to the world, or is one assuming that all is known and that no secret information remains unrevealed? Various express statutory phrases relating to value have f proved difficult enough to construe, but here what is in effect sought to be done is to imply some reference to 'actual value': and the process of first ascertaining and then construing an unexpressed formula is unlikely to be easier than that of construing a formula set out in express terms.

I accept, of course, that there may be cases which seem to fall within the general object or purpose of s 42 but fail to satisfy its terms. However, that cannot alter the g effect of the words used. Given a general object, the draftsman, in looking for a simple and workable test, may hit on a formula which gives substantial effect to the general purpose, but nevertheless is liable to include some marginal cases that ought to be excluded, or exclude some marginal cases that ought to be included. It may be possible to achieve an exact coincidence between the purpose and the test only at the expense of deplorable complexity; and so in the end the simpler test may remain, h with whatever marginal faults it may have. In such cases, the duty of the court is to put a fair meaning on the language actually used, and not to adopt a procrustean distortion in order to fit what may be thought to be the overriding purpose of the section. The reasons for laying down a rule must not be confounded with the rule itself.

j In the present case, I can see no good reason for ousting the prima facie construction of the phrase in question, and good reason for adhering to it. The test of nominal value is simple, workable and, above all, related to the words 'share capital'. Counsel for the Crown also prayed in aid the minimum of departmental bother that it would occasion the commissioners; but I doubt whether experience is sufficiently uniform to demonstrate that this is an object that Parliament has invariably sought to achieve.

Counsel for the Crown also relied to some extent on *Lever Bros Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs*⁵, a stamp duty case in which the phrase 'ninety per cent. of the issued share capital' in the Finance Act 1927, s 55 (1), was apparently assumed by all concerned to refer to nominal value. Counsel engaged were most distinguished, and the decision was by the Court of Appeal; but at best it is an authority sub silentio in a case in which the issue before me does not seem to have been even mentioned. I can therefore give it little weight, beyond saying that it shows that the statutory phrase readily and easily induces an assumption that nominal values are to be applied. a

I also bear in mind that the state of shareholding between associated companies is normally a matter between those companies, and where two companies find themselves linked by a percentage which is sufficient by actual value but not by nominal amount, the matter will usually not be beyond cure if proper advice is taken in time. Nor do I forget that s 42 (3) makes the Finance Act 1938, Sch 4, Part I, applicable, with modifications, and the phrase that I am construing may have repercussions in other spheres. I do not think I need read the six lengthy paragraphs in that Part of that Schedule; I refer to them because I should not like it to be thought that after the discussion before me I had left out of account provisions evidently framed with so thoroughgoing a zeal. I say no more than that I can see nothing in those provisions which provides any impetus towards a basis of actual value. b

The case is one in which the exemption applies only where it 'is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioners' that the provisions of the subsection are satisfied. I can only say that, despite the gallant endeavours of counsel for the Canadian company, in my judgment the commissioners were quite right not to be satisfied in this case. Accordingly, to the first question in the case stated for the opinion of the court, namely, whether the transfer is liable to duty as assessed by the commissioners, I give the answer 'Yes'; and on that answer the second question does not arise. c

Appeal dismissed. d

Solicitors: Lawrence Jones & Co (for the Canadian company); Solicitor of Inland Revenue. e

K Buckley Edwards Esq Barrister. f

⁵ [1938] 2 All ER 808, [1938] 2 KB 518

a Knipe v British Railways Board

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, SACHS AND STAMP LJJ

4th, 5th NOVEMBER 1971

- b* Limitation of action – Extension of time limit – Material fact outside knowledge of plaintiff – Material fact of decisive character – Lack of knowledge of extent of injury – Plaintiff injured on employers' premises in 1948 – Full extent of injury not realised until after six year limitation period expired – Plaintiff receiving offer of workmen's compensation in settlement in 1968 when became redundant – Plaintiff's union advising him throughout no common law claim – Plaintiff only seeking legal advice after became redundant – Plaintiff bringing negligence action within 12 months of receiving legal advice – Whether claim statute-barred – Limitation Act 1939, s 2 (1) – Limitation Act 1963, ss 1, 7.

- The plaintiff was an engine-driver employed by the defendants. In March 1948 he was injured when he fell on a faulty step on the defendants' premises. His injury was diagnosed as a 'strained knee'. He was off work for several weeks and was paid d some £13 workmen's compensation. In 1958 his knee began to give him serious trouble. He saw a consultant who informed him that he had a ruptured tendon and that he would have to wear a caliper. Had the ruptured tendon been diagnosed in 1948 when the accident occurred it could have been remedied by an operation. The plaintiff then told his union, of which he had been a member from the age of 13, that he wished to file a claim against the defendants. They informed him that he e could only claim workmen's compensation and that it was the defendants' practice to wait until an employee retired and then to pay a lump sum in settlement of any workmen's compensation for partial incapacity. The plaintiff was dismissed by reason of redundancy in 1968 and he forthwith asked his union to institute a claim for damages in respect of the accident in 1948. The union still took the view that it was only a matter for a lump sum settlement under the Workmen's Compensation f Act 1925. The plaintiff was offered £75 by the defendants in settlement of any claim which he might have under the 1925 Act. He rejected the offer and on 20th January 1969 consulted a firm of solicitors. Within a year of that date he issued a writ against the defendants claiming damages for personal injuries, having been given leave under the Limitation Act 1963. The defendants contended that the plaintiff could not pursue his action at common law because (i) by accepting the workmen's g compensation payments in 1948 he had exercised his option under s 29 (1)^a of the 1925 Act and (ii) his action having been barred by s 2 (1)^b of the Limitation Act 1939 in 1954, he was not entitled to take advantage of the Limitation Act 1963.

Held – (i) The plaintiff was not barred by s 29 of the 1925 Act from pursuing his claim at common law since the defendants had failed to establish that the plaintiff knew

- h* a Section 29 (1), so far as material, provides: 'When the injury was caused by the personal negligence ... of the employer or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible ... the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this Act or take proceedings independently of this Act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this Act. . .'
- j* b Section 2 (1), so far as material, provides: 'The following actions shall not be brought after the expiration of six years from the date on which the cause of action accrued . . . (a) actions founded on . . . tort . . .' The proviso to s 2 (1) added by s 2 (1) of the Law Reform (Limitation of Actions, etc) Act 1954 provides: 'Provided that, in the case of actions for damages for negligence . . . where the damages claimed by the plaintiff for the negligence . . . consist of or include damages in respect of personal injuries to any person, this subsection shall have effect as if for the reference to six years there were substituted a reference to three years.'

when he accepted the £13 that he had an option under s 29 and a person could not be held to have exercised an option unless he knew that he had one to exercise (see p 676 j to p 677 b, p 678 g and h and p 681 a, post). a Young v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd [1946] 1 All ER 98 and Leathley v John Fowler & Co Ltd [1946] 2 All ER 326 applied.

(ii) Although the plaintiff could not, by virtue of the 1939 Act, have brought a common law action after 1954, he was entitled to take advantage of the 1963 Act and pursue his claim for the following reasons— b

(a) by the time his action became statute-barred by the 1939 Act he could not have known that he had a worthwhile cause of action since he did not then know the extent of his injuries (see p 677 j to p 678 a, p 679 h to p 680 a and p 681 a, post).

(b) he did not have actual or constructive knowledge of the material fact that he had a worthwhile cause of action until he saw his solicitor in January 1969 and in the circumstances he could not reasonably be expected to have sought advice from a solicitor earlier; accordingly he fulfilled the requirements of ss 1 (3)^c and 7^d of the 1963 Act (see p 677 g and h, p 678 c, p 679 d, p 680 a d and f and p 681 a, post); Smith v Central Asbestos Co Ltd [1971] 3 All ER 204 applied. c c Section 1, so far as material, provides:

‘(1) Section 2 (1) of the Limitation Act 1939 (which, in the case of certain actions, imposes a time limit of three years for bringing the action) shall not afford any defence to an action to which this section applies, in so far as the action relates to any cause of action in respect of which—(a) the court has . . . granted leave for the purposes of this section, and (b) the requirements of subsection (3), of this section are fulfilled. d

‘(2) This section applies to any action for damages for negligence . . . where the damages claimed by the plaintiff for negligence . . . consist of or include damages in respect of personal injuries to the plaintiff . . . e

‘(3) The requirements of this subsection are fulfilled in relation to a cause of action if it is proved that the material facts relating to that cause of action were or included facts of a decisive character which were at all times outside the knowledge (actual or constructive) of the plaintiff until a date which—(a) either was after the end of the three-year period relating to that cause of action or was not earlier than twelve months before the end of that period, and (b) in either case, was a date not earlier than twelve months before the date on which the action was brought . . .’ f d Section 7, so far as material, provides:

‘(3) In this Part of this Act any reference to the material facts relating to a cause of action is a reference to any one or more of the following, that is to say—(a) the fact that personal injuries resulted from the negligence . . . constituting that cause of action; (b) the nature or extent of the personal injuries resulting from that negligence . . . (c) the fact that the personal injuries so resulting were attributable to that negligence . . . or the extent to which any of those personal injuries were so attributable. g

‘(4) For the purposes of this Part of this Act any of the material facts relating to a cause of action shall be taken, at any particular time, to have been facts of a decisive character if they were facts which a reasonable person, knowing those facts and having obtained appropriate advice with respect to them, would have regarded at that time as determining, in relation to that cause of action, that (apart from any defence under section 2 (1) of the Limitation Act 1939) an action would have a reasonable prospect of succeeding and of resulting in the award of damages sufficient to justify the bringing of the action. h

‘(5) . . . for the purposes of this Part of this Act a fact shall, at any time, be taken to have been outside the knowledge (actual or constructive) of a person if, but only if,—(a) he did not then know that fact; (b) in so far as that fact was capable of being ascertained by him, he had taken all such action (if any) as it was reasonable for him to have taken before that time for the purpose of ascertaining it; and (c) in so far as there existed, and were known to him, circumstances from which, with appropriate advice, that fact might have been ascertained or inferred, he had taken all such action (if any) as it was reasonable for him to have taken before that time for the purpose of obtaining appropriate advice with respect to those circumstances . . . i

‘(8) In this section “appropriate advice”, in relation to any fact or circumstances, means the advice of competent persons qualified, in their respective spheres, to advise on the medical, legal and other aspects of that fact or those circumstances, as the case may be.’

Notes

- a For the extending of the limitation period, see Supplement to 24 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) para 381, and for cases on the subject, see Digest (Cont Vol B) 500-502, 1933a-2022Aa and Digest (Cont Vol C) 641-644, 1933b-2022Ad.
- For repeals and savings under the Industrial Injuries Acts, see 27 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 665, 666, para 1204.
- b For the Limitation Act 1939, s 2, see 19 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 61, and for the Limitation Act 1963, ss 1 and 7, see ibid 103, 108.

Cases referred to in judgments

- Leathley v John Fowler & Co Ltd* [1946] 2 All ER 326, [1946] KB 579, 115 LJKB 424, 175 LT 212, 34 Digest (Repl) 705, 4835.
- c Newton v Cammell Laird & Co (Shipbuilders and Engineers) Ltd [1969] 1 All ER 708, [1969] 1 WLR 415, Digest (Cont Vol C) 644, 2022Ac.
- Pickles v National Coal Board* [1968] 2 All ER 598, [1968] 1 WLR 997, Digest (Cont Vol C) 641, 1933c.
- Smith v Central Asbestos Co Ltd* [1971] 3 All ER 204, [1971] 3 WLR 206.
- Young v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd* [1946] 1 All ER 98, [1946] AC 163, 115 LJKB 63, 174 LT 39, 34 Digest (Repl) 705, 4834.
- d

Appeal

- This was an appeal by the defendants, the British Railways Board, from the judgment of Cusack J given on 6th May 1971 at Carlisle Assizes awarding the plaintiff, John Knife, an employee of the defendants, £2,134.63 damages for personal injuries sustained in an accident at the defendants' locomotive depot at Moor Row, Whitehaven, in the county of Cumberland, on 2nd March 1948. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.
- e

Tudor Evans QC and Hart Jackson for the defendants.

I H Morris-Jones QC and A W Bell for the plaintiff.

- f LORD DENNING MR. This is a most unusual case. Mr John Knife was an engine-driver employed by the London Midland and Scottish Railway Company in Cumberland. Over 23 years ago, on 2nd March 1948 he was going to work. He was walking down some steps to the depot at Moor Road, Whitehaven. One of the steps gave way. He fell and injured his knee. He says that those steps were dangerous; that they had been a subject of complaint by a works council; and that his employers were at fault because they had not repaired them.
- g

- The records show that that injury was described at the time as 'strained knee, left leg' and that Mr Knife was paid workmen's compensation by his employers from 2nd March to 19th April 1948, a total sum of £13 13s 4d. After some weeks he went back to his work as an engine-driver. He was aware of weakness in the knee all the time, but he managed reasonably well for many years. Then, in 1958, ten years after the accident, his knee gave him serious trouble. It often gave way, and he could not walk over rough ground. He went to his doctor, and then to a consultant. It was then discovered that his injury was far more serious than had originally been thought. He had a ruptured tendon. The consultant said: 'It is obvious in retrospect that the injury must have gone undiagnosed.' The original doctors did not realise how bad it was. They thought it was just a strained knee, and let him go back to work. If they had realised that it was a ruptured tendon, it could have been remedied by an operation. But, after ten years, it was too late to do anything. In 1958 the doctors told him that he would have to wear a caliper, i.e. an iron support for his leg. From that time onwards he has had to wear it, but he has carried on with his work as an engine-driver all the way through.
- h
- i

On 16th November 1958 Mr Knife wrote to his union in these words:

'I wish to file a claim against British Railways. On March 2nd 1948 on my way to duty some steps belonging to British Railways collapsed and this resulted in the tendon of my left knee to become ruptured. In latter years there has been wasting of the muscles which forced me to consult my doctor, who transferred me to the specialist, the result being I now have to wear a caliper, the injury has impeded my walking.'

The union advised him that he had no claim for damages. It was, they said, a workmen's compensation case, and nothing else. That advice was quite correct—at that time. The statute of limitations barred any action for damages. The union told him that he could only claim workmen's compensation, and only then if he was not earning his full wages. They told him that the practice of the railway company was to wait until he retired, and then the company would pay him a lump sum in settlement of any workmen's compensation for partial incapacity. Mr Knipe was dissatisfied with this advice, but he did not think he could go against it. He acquiesced in what they said, and went on working for another ten years. Then in 1968 diesel engines were introduced, and he became redundant. On 4th May 1968 he left the service and received redundancy money.

At once Mr Knipe said to himself: 'Now is the time when the union told me I should get my compensation for my accident.' So, on the very next day, 5th May 1968, he approached his union and asked them to institute a claim for damages in respect of his accident in 1948. The union still took the view that it was not a case for common law damages at all; it was only a matter for a lump sum settlement under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1925. They put it before British Railways. Eventually, on 30th September 1968, British Railways wrote to the union, saying:

'I have enquired into this case and am prepared to offer your member, on the usual terms, a lump sum of £75 in final settlement of any claim which he may have under the Workmen's Compensation Acts . . .'

Mr Knipe thought that £75 was quite ridiculous. In November 1968 he tried again to get his union to take up the case. He told the union that he rejected the £75 and asked the union for their reasons for turning down the case. He said:

'I would also like to know if the NUR have obtained the opinion of a lawyer in this case.'

But he got no further with the union. In December 1968 the union simply said that he misunderstood the position. They still thought that he had no claim save under the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

Eventually Mr Knipe became so dissatisfied with the union that on about 20th January 1969 he went to solicitors on his own account. They took up the case for him. His solicitors wrote to the union, but got no satisfaction. So his solicitors determined to take action against British Railways. They went to a judge and obtained ex parte leave for purposes of the Limitation Act 1963. Then, on 15th January 1970, they issued a writ against the British Railways Board for damages for personal injuries. The judge found in favour of Mr Knipe. He assessed the damages at £2,134.63. British Railways appeal to this court.

The first point arises under the old Workmen's Compensation Act. In March 1948 the Workmen's Compensation Act 1925 was in force. (The National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1946 did not come into force until 5th July 1948.) British Railways said that, under s 29 of the 1925 Act, Mr Knipe had an option either to take workmen's compensation or to claim damages at common law. They said that he had received five weeks' workmen's compensation, and thereby exercised his option. I think the answer to this point is afforded by the opinion of the majority of the House of Lords in *Young v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd*¹, which was adopted by this court in

¹ [1946] 1 All ER 98, [1946] AC 163

- a* *Leathley v John Fowler & Co Ltd*². It was there held that a man is not to be held to have exercised his option unless he knew that he had an option. If he did not know that he had a claim at common law, he was not to be barred by taking workmen's compensation. The judge has found here that, although Mr Knipe received payments, he did not know they were workmen's compensation payments. He thought they were sickness benefit. In any case, it is plain that he did not know he had an option of claiming one or the other. He is, therefore, not barred by s 29 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1925.

- The second point arises under the Limitation Act 1963. This Act is a jungle of words; but the decisions of this court have trodden out a path through it. We have held that time does not count against a man until he knows, actually or constructively, that he has a worthwhile cause of action. Once he does know it, actually or constructively, he must bring his action within twelve months of knowledge of it.
- c* The proposition was so stated in *Smith v Central Asbestos Co Ltd*³, and Stamp LJ⁴ analysed the section. (Since August 1971 it is sufficient if he brings it within three years of knowledge of it: see the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971.) The present case has a fresh complication. Here we have an intervening time bar. This accident happened in 1948. At that time the Limitation Act 1939 gave six years in which to bring a common law claim. Mr Knipe did not bring an action within those six years. So by March 1954 his common law claim was barred. It remained barred from that time forward, unless and until the bar was removed by the 1963 Act.
- d*

- What is the effect of an intervening time bar? That is to say, what is the position when the man's claim was already statute-barred when the Limitation Act 1963 was passed? Take a simple illustration. Two men are exposed to injurious dust in 1955. It is due to the employer's breach of regulations. One of them is found suffering from pneumoconiosis in 1961. The other man is found suffering from it in 1964. The second man can clearly take advantage of the 1963 Act so as to overcome the time bar. But, cannot the first man do likewise? I am sure that Parliament intended that he should be able to do so. Both men were affected by this insidious disease owing to the employer's breach of duty. The first man should not be deprived of compensation simply because his disease was discovered before the Act was passed.
- e*

- Strangely enough, however, the Act nowhere deals with the position. But I think that it implicitly gives both men a cause of action. Section 1 (3) (a) shows that, even though a claim is barred by the three year period of limitation, nevertheless the plaintiff can bring an action so long as he does so within 12 months of getting to know the material facts. What are the material facts for this purpose? Here I draw on our previous decisions. One of the most material facts is the knowledge that he has a cause of action. Time does not run against a man until he gets to know, actually or constructively, that he has a worthwhile cause of action. The first man in my illustration (although he knew in 1961 that he had the disease) nevertheless he did not get to know that he had a cause of action—he cannot possibly have known it—until the 1963 Act was passed. He must bring his action within 12 months of getting that knowledge. The second man got to know it in 1964 as soon as he found that he had pneumoconiosis. He must bring his action within the next 12 months. So each man gets the benefit of the 1963 Act so as to avoid the time bar. That is as it should be.
- g*
- h*

- Such is the implication in cases coming within the three year period of limitation (after 1954). A like implication arises in cases coming within the six year period of limitation (before 1954). That appears from s 15 of the Limitation Act 1963.
- i*

I turn to apply this interpretation to the present case. The period of limitation was the six years from 1948 to 1954. During that time Mr Knipe did not know the material facts. He knew he had hurt his knee, but he thought it was a trivial hurt, a mere sprain. He did not know that it was a serious injury until 1958. He was then told that it was a ruptured tendon, and he had to wear a caliper for the rest of his life. But by that time the period of limitation had passed. Any action was statute-barred. So, he could not, by any possibility, have known that he had a worthwhile cause of action. He could not conceivably have known it until the Limitation Act 1963 was passed. But, by this time he had been to his trade union, and they had told him—reasonably enough—that he would have to wait until he retired. So, he waited until that time. Then, when he did retire in May 1968, he straightaway went to his union again and asked them to make a claim on his behalf. The union put him off, saying that he had no claim at common law but only under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1925. Eventually he was offered £75, which was quite unacceptable. It was only then that he went to his solicitor. I do not think he could reasonably be expected to go to a solicitor any sooner than he did. He went on 20th January 1969. It was only at that time that he knew, actually or constructively, that he had a worthwhile cause of action. And he brought his action on 15th January 1970, that is, within the 12 months permitted by the Act. I think he has satisfied all the requirements. He is not barred by time.

² [1946] 2 All ER 326, [1946] KB 579

³ [1971] 3 All ER 204 at 210, 211, [1971] 3 WLR 206 at 214, 215

⁴ [1971] 3 All ER at 219, 220, [1971] 3 WLR at 224, 225

This is a most unusual case, but I think it falls well within the intentions of the legislature. Here is a man who has served the railway company for his lifetime as an engine-driver. Some 23 years ago he was injured at work owing to his employers' negligence. The only compensation that he received was £13 13s 4d for workmen's compensation for the time he was off work—but no wages. Ten years later, the injury turned out to be much worse than anyone thought. He had to wear an iron caliper to support his leg. He was told that he would get compensation when he retired. But he was offered £75 only. It does not seem fair to me that, for so serious an injury, he should be put off with such a trifling sum. I think the 1963 Act does enable the court to hold that his claim is not barred by the statute of limitations.

I would add that the argument before us has ranged far more widely than the argument before the judge. Many of the points were not raised before him. But, in the end, I think his decision was correct. I would dismiss the appeal.

SACHS LJ. A number of questions have been raised in the course of this appeal, and of these it is convenient first to deal with two. In the first place, I am far from being prepared to hold that the trial judge was wrong when he decided that the plaintiff was not at the time he received the relevant payments aware that they were made under the Workmen's Compensation Acts. He said: 'I accept the plaintiff's evidence that he considered the payments he received to be some sort of insurance benefit.' That finding was challenged here, but the challenge fails. Secondly, even if I were wrong in holding that this challenge was unsuccessful, in my judgment the defendants were very far indeed from establishing that the plaintiff had exercised an option under s 29 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1925 on which they rely. In this behalf I most willingly follow the decision of this court in *Leathley v John Fowler & Co Ltd*⁵, as to the effect of the decision in the House of Lords in *Young v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd*⁶.

From there I turn to the points arising under the Limitation Act 1963—points which were very strongly pressed by both parties. With Lord Denning MR and others who have adverted to this matter, I deeply regret that an Act of such importance to so many men who suffer personal injuries should be so difficult to interpret and the subject of so much obscurity that one case after another comes up to these courts.

In the instant case I naturally start any examination of the problems before us by a adopting the basis laid down in previous decisions of this court as to how one should interpret s 7 (3) (c) and the other relevant provisions of that section. The judgments of Lord Denning MR and Russell LJ in the case of *Pickles v National Coal Board*⁷, as to the meaning of the words 'the fact that the personal injuries . . . were attributable to that negligence' provided the basis of the phraseology adopted by Widgery LJ in *Newton v Cammell Laird & Co (Shipbuilders and Engineers) Ltd*⁸, where he says⁹:

5 [1946] 2 All ER 326, [1946] KB 579

6 [1946] 1 All ER 98, [1946] AC 163

b 'The missing fact which a man in his position could not know without being advised was that those circumstances would point to his having a worthwhile cause of action against the defendants.'

That phrase 'worthwhile cause of action' has been used in more than one subsequent judgment. In *Smith v Central Asbestos Co Ltd*¹⁰ Edmund Davies LJ pinpointed the c crucial question and the answer of this court as follows¹¹:

'In the result, is it the case that an injured party has 12 months from the time when he first discovers that his injury not only resulted in fact from the act or omission of another but also that his injury is or may well be attributable in law to the wrongful act or omission of the other party?'

d The answer to that question, according to the decisions of this court is Yes.

Edmund Davies LJ, it is to be observed, said¹¹ that if he had been left in that matter as of breaking entirely fresh ground, he would have come to the opposite conclusion and commented¹² a little later:

e 'Can that [answer] be right? If it is, the Limitation Act 1963, presumably passed in order to deal with a special set of circumstances, has rendered possible the wide evasion of the statutory limitations in a large variety of cases.'

That is a view with which I for my part have some sympathy and it is illustrated in this particular case by the fact that the courts have been asked to try questions of fact that arose as long ago as 1948. That, however, does not, of course, derogate f from the need for this court to follow the tests which I have already said have been adopted by it on the question of the construction of s 7 (3) (c).

It is clear that on the law as it at present stands the plaintiff must show that at the material time he had neither knowledge nor constructive knowledge that he had a worthwhile cause of action. The onus of showing that lies on him. He can also g seek to establish as an alternative or additional ground for obtaining the benefit of the 1963 Act that he falls within s 7 (3) (b). To succeed he must, of course, establish that he did not at the material time know the extent of the personal injuries resulting from the relevant negligence.

One has accordingly to consider what is the material time in relation to which a plaintiff must establish one or other, or, if he can, both, of the requisite grounds for exemption from the natural results of the older Limitation Act. It is clear to my h mind that one must first address oneself to the situation obtaining while the relevant statute of limitations touching the particular cause of action was running before the 1963 Act came into force. That is because the relevant knowledge must, of course, be knowledge that one has a cause of action that is worth pursuing, as opposed to knowledge that one once had a cause of action that is not any longer worth pursuing

j

⁷ [1968] 2 All ER 598, [1968] 1 WLR 997

⁸ [1969] 1 All ER 708, [1969] 1 WLR 415

⁹ [1969] 1 All ER at 720, [1969] 1 WLR at 421

¹⁰ [1971] 3 All ER 204, [1971] 3 WLR 206

¹¹ [1971] 3 All ER at 216, [1971] 3 WLR at 221

¹² [1971] 3 All ER at 217, [1971] 3 WLR at 222

because of some statute of limitations. In this particular case one has first to look at the period commencing March 1948 and ending March 1954. a

Here the plaintiff puts forward his case, as he is entitled to do, relying on the grounds both under heads (b) and (c) of s 7 (3). Taking first head (b), which relates to the extent of the injuries—that extent to my judgment means an extent sufficient to give him a worthwhile cause of action. That extent of which he must have knowledge is one which depends on the facts of each case, and the extent known to the plaintiff must be such as would, if properly advised, lead him to take an action. In this particular case there is a complication that the extent would have had to be such that it would be more to his benefit to rely on a common law action rather than on the Workmen's Compensation Act 1925. Approaching the matter on that basis, he has to my mind shown that he did not before March 1954 have the requisite knowledge as to the extent of his injuries, for the reasons already given by Lord Denning MR. b

Turning now to the facts that needed to be established to bring the plaintiff within head (c), the trial judge has evaluated the plaintiff's evidence on both material points, that is to say, the question of knowledge and whether further steps should have been taken by the plaintiff because of the provisions of s 7 (5) (b) and (c), which relate to taking reasonable steps to obtain appropriate advice. So far as knowledge is concerned, the trial judge found that the plaintiff had no actual knowledge of a possible action in negligence before January 1969. Next the learned trial judge found in effect that he had in effect done everything that a reasonable man could have been expected to do—taking account of this particular plaintiff's position. Those findings have been challenged by reference to passages in the cross-examination of the plaintiff, and particular reference has been made to certain passages which one has to look at as a whole. It appears that in successive answers the plaintiff said: 'I was depending on my union'; and next 'I did not disagree with them'; and next 'I was not satisfied'; and next 'I had to believe they were right'. It appears to me that the trial judge had, having regard to those answers and the evidence as a whole, ample material on which, having due regard to the plaintiff's mental capacity (which the judge was able to observe), to his training on the railways, to the fact that he had been a union man since he was 13, to his position on the union, and to his training to depend on the union, he could come to the conclusion which he reached. As regards the suggestion that the plaintiff should have gone earlier to obtain legal aid, counsel for the plaintiff has rightly pointed out that those were early days for legal aid, and that there are provisions in the legal aid regulations which seemed to discourage applications by union men. c

Finally, at the very last moment there was raised a point which was not taken at first instance. It is the point that the plaintiff should some time between October 1968 and before 27th January 1969 have sought to consult a solicitor. It is a point to which no cross-examination of the plaintiff was directed at the trial and a point which had no consideration by the trial judge. It is not to be found in any recognisable form in the notice of appeal, and it was not mentioned in the opening of this case in this court. It would suffice to say that it would be quite impossible to allow that point to prevail so as to upset the judgment of the court below without there being an opportunity for the plaintiff to give his answers about it, and that the notice of appeal does not ask for a new trial. But I would go further; as the matter stands, it seems to me that he was wholly reasonable in the attitude which he took in asking the trade union which had made itself responsible for advising him on this case for further information in order to find out what were the snags which might face him if any claim other than that under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1925 were pursued. If subjected to cross-examination on the point he would I think have answered any questions in the same tenor as the four questions already cited and such answers would have been accepted. d

I have ventured to review the circumstances of this case in some detail, in view of the undoubtedly unusual effects of allowing a man to pursue a claim related to a e

- a single occurrence as long ago as 1948. In the upshot in my judgment the appeal should indeed be dismissed.

STAMP LJ. I agree.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords granted.

- b Solicitors: Evan Harding (for the defendants); Barlow, Lyde & Gilbert, agents for Milburn & Co, Whitehaven (for the plaintiff).

L J Kovats Esq Barrister.

c Odeon Associated Theatres Ltd v Jones (Inspector of Taxes)

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SALMON, BUCKLEY AND ORR LJJ

- d 18th, 19th, 20th OCTOBER, 3rd NOVEMBER 1971

Income tax – Deduction in computing profits – Trade expenses – Repairs – Deferred repairs – Acquisition of cinema in poor repair – Cinema fully capable of commercial use – Vendor's failure to repair before acquisition – Vendor precluded by war time restrictions from carrying out repairs – No diminution in price in respect of disrepair – Deferred repairs begun two years after acquisition – Repairs spread over several years – No indication of extra cost over and above cost of ordinary repairs – Expenditure on deferred repairs charged to revenue account as separate item from expenditure on current repairs – Expert evidence on accountancy practice – Finding that charging to revenue according with accountancy practice – No conflict with statute – Conclusiveness of finding – Whether expenditure on deferred repairs capital or revenue expenditure for income tax purposes – Whether deductible in computing profits – Income Tax Act 1952, s 137.

- f The taxpayer company were members of one of the biggest groups of companies engaged in the cinema industry and carried on a substantial business as exhibitors of films. In 1945 they bought a cinema, one of a large number which they acquired in the immediate post-war period. Owing to war time restrictions it had been impossible for the vendors, in common with other cinema owners, to spend more than comparatively small sums on keeping the cinema in repair. During the previous five years therefore many repairs and replacements which would normally have been effected had been deferred. However at the date of its acquisition the cinema was a fully effective profit earning asset and the price paid by the taxpayer company was not affected by reason of the lack of repair. From 1945 to 1954 the taxpayer company spent substantial sums of money on repairs and renewals at the cinema. For the purposes of excess profits tax the taxpayer company treated part of that expenditure in their accounts as revenue expenditure on current repairs and, from 1947 on, treated the remaining part as revenue expenditure on deferred repairs and renewals, i.e. as constituting the expenditure necessitated by the failure to carry out repairs during the war time period. It was contended by the Crown that the expenditure on deferred repairs and renewals was not revenue but capital expenditure and was therefore not deductible in ascertaining the taxpayer company's profits for income tax purposes. On appeal to the Special Commissioners the taxpayer company called expert evidence of accountants, which the commissioners accepted, that the items were properly chargeable to revenue in accordance with established principles of sound commercial accounting.

Held – (i) The money expended by the taxpayer company on the deferred repairs was laid out wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the taxpayer company's trade within s 137 (a)^a of the Income Tax Act 1952 and not partly for the purposes of the trade of the company from which the cinema had been acquired; for the same reason the money had been 'actually expended' on repairs for the purposes of the taxpayer company's trade within s 137 (d) (see p 690 b to d, p 696 a and p 697 f, post);

(ii) The expenditure was not capital expenditure within s 137 (f) and (g) for the following reasons—

(a) the expenditure was by nature revenue and not capital expenditure and would have been deductible as such if the original owner of the cinema had remained the owner and had incurred it (see p 688 h, p 692 j to p 693 a and p 698 b, post);

(b) as the commissioners had held that it was in accordance with established principles of sound commercial practice to charge the disputed items to revenue expenditure and not capital and as those principles in no way conflicted with any statute the court would, in the absence of any rule of law to the contrary, adopt and apply those principles in deciding the case (see p 691 b, p 692 a, p 696 g and p 698 h, post);

(c) owing to the inability of the vendors, in common with all other owners, lawfully to execute the repairs in the period before acquisition, the purchase price of the cinema had in no way been affected by its disrepair at the date of acquisition (see p 691 g, p 693 a and p 698 g, post);

(d) the cinema was a profit-earning asset at the date of its acquisition in spite of its disrepair and remained so for several years thereafter although no money was spent (or could be spent) on deferred repairs during some of those years (see p 691 h, p 693 b and p 695 b, post);

(e) (per Buckley and Orr LJ) it had not been established that the taxpayer company had been put to any greater expense in the way of repairs and redecoration by reason of the deferred repairs than would have been the case if there had been no deferred repairs (see p 695 g and h, and p 698 j to p 699 b, post);

Law Shipping Co Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs (1923) 12 Tax Cas 621 distinguished.

Per Curiam. If the deferred repairs on the cinema had been properly chargeable as capital expenditure, such repairs would have been so chargeable in respect of cinemas acquired (a) from an outside vendor with succession, and (b) as the result of a transfer within the taxpayer company's group of companies without succession or (c) with succession; the source from which the taxpayer company acquired the cinemas, and whether with or without succession, was not relevant to the question (see p 692 d f and g, p 696 g and p 699 e and f, post).

Decision of Pennycuik V-C [1971] 2 All ER 407 affirmed.

Notes

For the deduction of trade expenses in computing profits generally, see 20 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 158-170, paras 277-292, and for cases on the subject, see 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 141-158, 421-505.

For deductions for the cost of repairs, see 20 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 173, 174, paras 300-302 and for cases on the subject, see 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 169-171, 515-520.

For the application of accountancy principles in computing profits, see 20 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 139, 140, para 247.

For the Income Tax Act 1952, s 137, see 31 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn) 134. Section 137 has been replaced by s 130 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970.

Cases referred to in judgments

Bidwell v Gardiner (1960) 39 Tax Cas 31, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 194, 603.

British Insulated and Helsby Cables Ltd v Atherton [1926] AC 205, [1925] All ER Rep 623, 95 LJKB 336, 134 LT 289, 10 Tax Cas 155; affg CA sub nom Atherton v British Insulated and Helsby Cables Ltd [1925] 1 KB 421, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 211, 627.

^a Section 137, so far as material, is set out at p 689 h to p 690 b, post

- a* BSC Footwear Ltd (formerly Freeman, Hardy & Willis Ltd) v Ridgway (Inspector of Taxes) [1971] 2 All ER 534, [1971] 2 WLR 1313, Digest Supp.
Comr of Taxes v Nchanga Consolidated Copper Mines Ltd [1964] 1 All ER 208, [1964] AC 948, [1964] 2 WLR 339, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 204, *677.
Highland Railway Co v Balderston (Surveyor of Taxes) (1889) 2 Tax Cas 485, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 201, *652.
- b* Inland Revenue Comrs v Granite City Steamship Co Ltd 1927 SC 705, 13 Tax Cas 1, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 202, *658.
Jackson (Inspector of Taxes) v Laskers Home Furnishers Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 891, [1957] 1 WLR 69, 37 Tax Cas 69, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 192, 594.
Law Shipping Co Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs 1924 SC 74, (1923) 12 Tax Cas 621, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 599, *1480.
- c* Lothian Chemical Co Ltd v Rogers (Inspector of Taxes) (1926) 11 Tax Cas 508, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 202, *657.
Ostime (Inspector of Taxes) v Duple Motor Bodies Ltd [1961] 2 All ER 167, [1961] 1 WLR 739, 39 Tax Cas 537; affg CA sub nom Duple Motor Bodies Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs [1960] 2 All ER 110, [1960] 1 WLR 510, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 125, 371.
Regent Oil Co Ltd v Strick (Inspector of Taxes) [1965] 3 All ER 174, [1966] AC 295, [1965] 3 WLR 636, 43 Tax Cas 1; affg CA sub nom Strick (Inspector of Taxes) v Regent Oil Co Ltd [1964] 3 All ER 23, [1964] 1 WLR 116, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 183, 552.
- d* Roebank Printing Co Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs 1928 SC 701, (1927) 13 Tax Cas 864, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 207, *685.
Royal Insurance Co v Watson [1897] AC 1, 66 LJQB 1, 75 LT 334, 3 Tax Cas 500, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 185, 562.
Stott v Hoddinott (1916) 7 Tax Cas 85, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 180, 542.
- e* Sun Insurance Office v Clark [1912] AC 443, [1911-13] All ER Rep 495, 81 LJKB 488, 106 LT 438, 6 Tax Cas 69, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 134, 398.
United Steel Cos Ltd v Cullington [1940] 2 All ER 170, [1940] AC 812, 109 LJKB 342, 163 LT 42, 23 Tax Cas 91, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 460, 1658.
Usher's Wiltshire Brewery Ltd v Bruce [1915] AC 433, 84 LJKB 417, 112 LT 651, 6 Tax Cas 418, 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 130, 383.
- f*

Appeal

The taxpayer company, Odeon Associated Theatres Ltd, appealed to the Special Commissioners against assessments to income tax made on them as cinema proprietors under Sch D to the Income Tax Acts 1918 and 1952 in the following sums: 1946-47, £75,000; 1947-48, £150,000; 1948-49, £328,000; 1949-50, £587,600; 1950-51, £370,000; 1951-52, £510,000; 1952-53, £340,000; 1953-54, £350,000; 1954-55 £375,000; and 1955-56, £400,000. The grounds of appeal were that in computing for income tax purposes the profits or gains of the taxpayer company for the accounting periods relevant to the assessments there should be allowed as an expense sums expended by the taxpayer company as repairs to certain cinemas owned by them which could be related to the condition of the cinemas at the time of their acquisition by the taxpayer company. The taxpayer company appealed by way of case stated against the commissioners' decision. The following facts are taken from those found by the commissioners in the case stated (the paragraph numbers being those of the case):

- i* '5. Odeon Theatres Limited had achieved its position as the third largest circuit during the 1930's, both by building new theatres and buying existing theatres and theatre owning companies. War time restrictions put an end to building and the only way the circuit could be expanded was by buying theatres and theatre owning companies . . .

'6. Where the directors were considering acquiring a theatre otherwise than from within the Group, the normal procedure was that Mr. Davis would ask the firm of Messrs. Goddard & Smith to prepare a valuation. Mr. Davis would then have discussions with the partner responsible and in the light of these discussions would subsequently conduct negotiations with the theatre's owner, for its possible acquisition. Mr. Davis understood that a valuation was made as between a willing buyer and a willing seller and related purely to the circumstances affecting the particular theatre. Mr. Davis expected Messrs. Goddard & Smith in making these valuations to take account of the general factors affecting the profitability of the theatre such as its location, capacity and facilities. Although Messrs. Goddard & Smith had acted for the Odeon Group for a considerable number of years and attended meetings at which operating policy decisions were taken on acquisitions, Mr. Davis did not expect them to advise in the light of all the various considerations on which the operating policy was based and indeed they were not in a position to do so. Mr. Davis naturally used the valuation as a base price in the course of negotiations but as a commercial operator he had to take into account those factors which were peculiar to the Group's needs and the overriding factor of the prospective increase in booking strength. The result was that the purchase price was sometimes more and sometimes less than the valuation. In particular, if a capital deduction was made in the valuer's report because of a theatre's poor state of repair, it would not have had a material effect on the price the Group was prepared to pay for the following reasons:—(a) The overall necessity to expand the number of theatres owned, particularly those in London and other urban areas, and consequently to improve the Group's booking strength. (b) During the second world war there was a complete prohibition on building, decorating and repair work of any kind except for essential maintenance and even then the consent of the Ministry of Works was required. Each theatre was granted an annual permit to carry out essential maintenance work up to a stated amount. The amounts varied from as little as £75 to £800 per annum but in any event were totally inadequate to keep the theatres in a proper state of repair. In addition a Supplemental Licence was required to carry out any specific work costing more than £100. Theatres rightly had a low priority in securing Supplemental Licences. The result was that no one in the industry was in a position to carry out work of this type apart from such minor essential repairs as could be covered by the annual permit. If a theatre was in a poor state of repair on acquisition, the effect on public attendance was minimal, since all competing theatres were in a similar state. (c) For the most part the deficiencies were not of a nature requiring immediate remedy. There was no question of danger to the public or of any theatre having to be closed for repairs. (d) Building restrictions continued in force until the early nineteen-fifties. During the war, when negotiations for the acquisition of the Odeons, Accrington and Marble Arch and other theatres were taking place Mr. Davis foresaw this was likely to happen and as a result did not pay so much attention to a theatre's state of repair as might otherwise have been the case. The type of work necessary to put these theatres into a first class state of repair was maintenance and repair work, which in normal circumstances is carried out continuously. Mr. Davis's attitude was that in the normal course the theatres would be redecorated when the restrictions were removed, but that the same work would not be done twice merely because the period since maintenance work was last carried out was much longer than normal. As a result the deduction from purchase price, which might otherwise have been made, was ignored. If the directors had not bought others would have bought on a similar basis . . .

'8. During the immediate post-war period there was a financial rationalisation programme for the Odeon Group . . . It was necessary to approach the market in stages so the theatres owned or controlled by the Odeon Group were divided amongst three companies, Odeon Theatres Limited, Odeon Properties Limited and Odeon Freehold and Ground Rents Limited now called Odeon Associated a Theatres Limited [“(the taxpayer company”) which was a wholly-owned subsidiary of Odeon Theatres Ltd] . . .

‘12. In the period under review the consideration payable on inter-group transfers was computed by reference to the transferor company’s books of account . . .

b ‘15. Expenditure classified as capital in the Statements of Fact [annexed to the case stated] represented additions or improvements to the condition of the theatre. The whole of such expenditure was charged to capital, no deductions being made from the companies’ profits for tax purposes.

c ‘16. Expenditure classified as current repairs and renewals in the said Statements of Fact were such as could not be treated as attributable to user of the theatre during the E.P.T. [i.e. excess profits tax] period and accordingly no relief was allowed against this tax [i.e. EPT]. These repairs and renewals were charged in their entirety to trading account and were deducted from profits in income tax computations.

d ‘17. All items of expenditure listed in the Statements of Fact as charged to deferred repairs account were to some extent attributable to user of the theatre during the E.P.T. period. Deferred repairs and renewals were treated in the same way as current repairs and renewals and were charged in their entirety to trading account.

e ‘18. According to standard practice of commercial accounting in relation to groups of companies, where a theatre with outstanding deferred repairs is transferred from one member of the group to another the best method would be to take it out of the transferor company’s balance sheet at its written down book value irrespective of the amount of the deferred repairs and to take it into the balance sheet of the transferee company at the same value, thus the consolidated group balance sheet would show no increase in total assets . . .

f ‘19. It was contended on behalf of the [taxpayer company]:—(i) that in computing for income tax purposes the profits or gains of the [taxpayer company] for the accounting periods relevant to the assessments under appeal there should be allowed as an expense sums expended by the [taxpayer company] on repairs (hereinbefore referred to as “deferred repairs”) to cinemas owned by it, notwithstanding that such expenditure could be related to the condition of the cinemas at the time of their acquisition by the [taxpayer company] . . .

g ‘20. It was contended by the [Crown]:—(i) that in computing for income tax purposes the profits or gains of the [taxpayer company] for the accounting periods relevant to the assessments under appeal no allowance fell to be made for sums expended by the [taxpayer company] on repairs (hereinbefore referred to as “deferred repairs”) to cinemas owned by it which related to user prior to the acquisition of such cinemas by the [taxpayer company] . . .

h ‘21. We, the Commissioners who heard the appeal, gave our decision in the following terms:—(1) [Having set out the nature of the appeal they continued:] The grounds of the appeal are that in computing for Income Tax purposes the profits or gains of the [taxpayer company] for the accounting periods relevant to the assessments under appeal, there should be allowed as an expense sums expended by the [taxpayer company] on repairs to certain cinemas owned by it which related to user prior to the acquisition of such cinemas by the [taxpayer company] . . .

i ‘(3) The [taxpayer company] and associated companies owned a large number of cinemas which have been divided for purposes of this appeal into four categories^b . . . After acquisition the [taxpayer company] carried out repairs to each b Agreed statements of fact annexed to the case stated related to four different cinemas which were taken as examples of the four different categories: (i) an inter-group transaction with succession, (ii) an inter-group transaction without succession, (iii) an outside acquisition with succession, and (iv) an outside acquisition without succession. On appeal no point was taken on the distinction between the four types of case: see p 692 c to e, post.

of these cinemas some of which repairs it is admitted properly related to user prior to the acquisition of the property by the [taxpayer company] and for convenience these are referred to as deferred repairs.

'(4) The evidence given in chief by the witnesses is not really controverted by the Crown and it seems to us, therefore, that there is no real dispute as to the facts in this case. The parties are agreed that in the hands of the vendors there was no capital element in the deferred repairs and so far as the [taxpayer company] was concerned there was no diminution in price on account of the deferred repairs which are in issue in this appeal.

'(5) The real dispute in this appeal seems to us to be whether expenditure on assets which, if it had been incurred by the vendor, would have been allowable in computing the profit or gain of a trade carried on by the vendor for the purpose of arriving at his liability to tax would, if in fact incurred by a purchaser of that asset, be allowed in computing the profit or gain of a trade carried on by the purchaser for the purposes of arriving at his liability to tax and if not, whether it makes any difference if the purchaser in addition to buying the asset, also succeeds to the trade carried on by the vendor in which that asset was used, or that there is no allowance in respect of such expenditure in the purchase price.

'(6) It is not a trade which is assessed to tax, it is a person. If a person carries on a trade, the measure of his liability to tax is the profit or gain derived by him from carrying on such trade. Expenses of a trade which accrued prior to the carrying on of that trade by the person presently to be taxed cannot be taken into account in determining the profit or gain derived by him for the purpose of ascertaining his liability to tax. Such expenses did not accrue in the process of earning his profit or gain and if paid by him they are not revenue expenses, but something over and above, and therefore capital. It is nothing to the point that had such expenses been incurred in earning somebody else's profit or gain they might have been allowed as a revenue expense. It seems to us that this is the proposition which stems from the Law Shipping case^c upon which all the judges in the Court of Session were unanimous, and also the Granite City Steamship Co. case^d which cases are binding on us. Furthermore, in the light of the cases cited it seems to us that it makes no difference if there is a succession or if there is no allowance from the price of the asset purchased.

'(7) It was also put to us that since the Companies Act of 1948 the consolidated accounts required in the case of a group of companies, by the provisions of Sections 150, 151 and 152 of the Companies Act, 1948, would, if produced on sound commercial principles, necessarily involve that the cost of deferred repairs should be eliminated from the Balance Sheet by charging such cost to revenue accounts. This may be so, but we do not think that a form of accounts required for the purposes of the Companies Act, 1948, is conclusive as to what items may be properly charged to revenue in computing profits or gains for Income Tax purposes.

'(8) Our decision is, therefore, that this appeal fails in principle and we adjourn the appeal for the agreement of the amounts of the assessments between the parties on the basis of our decision set forth above.'

On 26th November 1969 the case was remitted by the Chancery Division to the commissioners as follows:

'THIS COURT ORDERS that the said Case be remitted to the Special Commissioners for them to make and state in a Supplemental Case a finding on the following question, viz:—

^c See Law Shipping Co Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs (1923) 12 Tax Cas 621

^d See Inland Revenue Comrs v Granite City Steamship Co Ltd (1927) 13 Tax Cas 1

a 'On the assumption that all theatres with which this Case is concerned were acquired from vendors outside the group but that all other facts were as found in the existing Case Stated, how, in accordance with the principles of sound commercial accounting would the disputed expenditure be dealt with in the purchasers accounts?'

By the supplemental case the commissioners gave the following decision:

b 'Upon consideration of the evidence adduced at the Meeting and the arguments addressed to us on behalf of the parties and the publication "Practical Auditing" by Spicer and Pegler (15th Edition), which was cited to us, we found that on the assumption that all theatres with which this case is concerned were acquired from vendors outside the Group but that all other facts were as found in the principal case stated, in accordance with the principles of sound commercial accounting c at the present time the disputed expenditure referred to in the principal case as the "deferred repairs" would be dealt with as a charge to revenue in the purchasers accounts.'

On 12th November 1970, as reported at [1971] 2 All ER 407, Pennycuik V-C allowed the taxpayer company's appeal against the commissioners' decision, holding that the taxpayer company were entitled to deduct the cost of the deferred repairs in computing its profits for income tax purposes. The Crown appealed to the Court of Appeal.

d

The Solicitor-General (Sir Geoffrey Howe QC), R A Watson QC and P W Medd for the Crown.

Heyworth Talbot QC, M P Nolan QC and Denis Carey for the taxpayer company.

e Cur adv vult
3rd November. The following judgments were read.

SALMON LJ. The relevant extracts from the case stated are all set out in Pennycuik V-C's lucid judgment¹ and I need not repeat them. I wish, however, to draw attention to certain salient facts affecting this appeal. The taxpayer company, Odeon f Associated Theatres Ltd, carry on business as exhibitors of films. They are, and have been since the 1930's, one of the largest exhibitors of films in England and own very many cinemas throughout the country. They are now members of one of the biggest groups of companies engaged in the cinema industry in England. In the immediate post-war years, the taxpayer company bought a large number of cinemas and cinema-owning companies. The object of these purchases was (a) to prevent this branch of g the industry from falling under American domination, (b) to strengthen the taxpayer company's negotiating power in booking films, and, of course, (c) to enlarge their profits.

On 8th January 1945 the taxpayer company bought what had formerly been called the Regal Cinema at Marble Arch for £240,000. During the war years, owing to the then current restrictions, it had been impossible to spend more than comparatively h small sums on keeping cinemas in repair. Accordingly in 1945 the cinema at Marble Arch, like all cinemas in this country, was somewhat run down. During the previous five years many repairs and replacements which would normally have been effected had necessarily been deferred, because it had been impossible to obtain licences to carry them out. Nevertheless, the Marble Arch cinema at the date of its acquisition was a fully effective profit-earning asset, and the price which the taxpayer company i paid for it had not been diminished nor in any way affected by reason of its lack of repair.

During the period 1945-54 the taxpayer company spent considerable sums of money in making additions to building plant and equipment at this cinema. All these items were charged as capital expenditure by the taxpayer company in their accounts.

¹ [1971] 2 All ER 407, [1971] 1 WLR 442; see pp 683-686, ante

In each year from 1945 to 1954 the taxpayer company also spent substantial sums of money on repairs and renewals at this cinema. Some of this money was charged in their accounts as revenue expenditure spent on current repairs and renewals; it was allowed without question by the Inland Revenue as a charge against the taxpayer company's profits. On the other hand, some of the money spent during this period on repairs and renewals was charged in the taxpayer company's accounts as revenue expenditure spent on deferred repairs and renewals.

The reason for the taxpayer company distinguishing in their accounts between current and deferred repairs and renewals was to avail themselves of the concessions relating to their liability for excess profits tax made by s 37 of the Finance Act 1946. This tax had been in existence from about the middle of 1940 until the end of 1946. Section 37 provided in effect that any money spent after 1946 relating to repairs and renewals which had been necessarily deferred during the period when excess profits tax was exigible should be credited against liability for that tax. Between 1947 and 1954 the taxpayer company charged £17,708 as their expenditure on deferred repairs and renewals. The amount spent during this period on deferred repairs and renewals obviously could not be precisely measured. The Inland Revenue challenged the figure of £17,708. Negotiations took place and the amount attributable to deferred repairs and renewals was eventually agreed with the Inland Revenue at £11,510. It was also agreed that £7,969 of that sum related to the period prior to the acquisition of the cinema by the taxpayer company on 8th January 1945 and the balance of £3,541 to the period from 8th January 1945 until 1st January 1947.

The Crown contends that the several sums amounting in all to £7,969 are not revenue expenditure but capital expenditure and therefore cannot be taken into account in assessing the taxpayer company's liability for income tax in respect of any of the fiscal years in question. It is, I think, worth noting from the case stated how the expenditure of £7,969 was allocated over the years.

	£
1948/49	151
1949/50	752
1950/51	352
1951/52	1,602
1952/53	1,118
1953/54	2,701
1954/55	317
1955/56	976
	<hr/>
Total	£7,969

It is also perhaps worth noting that the work comprised in these items includes, for example, renewing carpets, decorating, rewiring, etc. It does not seem to me that any of this expenditure can, prima facie, properly be regarded as being in the nature of capital expenditure. It appears to me to be obviously revenue expenditure. Moreover, the first item of this expenditure was not incurred until two years after the acquisition of the cinema and the last not less than nine years after the acquisition. £7,969 may be a comparatively small sum of money, but the group of which the taxpayer company is a member owns 564 cinemas. In many of these, the same questions arise as in the present case. The total amount of tax liability depending on the result of this appeal is accordingly very large.

The evidence of a number of exceptionally distinguished accountants, accepted by the Special Commissioners, was that in accordance with the established principles of sound commercial accounting the disputed items of expenditure were a charge to a revenue. Pennycuik V-C² held that in law these items were properly chargeable to revenue and that the profits for the years in question should be assessed for tax on that basis. Against that judgment² the Crown now appeals.

b Few commercial questions have been responsible for so much litigation as: what is the true profit in a particular year? Sometimes this question depends, as in *Ostime (Inspector of Taxes) v Duple Motor Bodies Ltd*³, on the correct method of assessing work in progress; sometimes, as in *BSC Footwear Ltd v Ridgway (Inspector of Taxes)*⁴, on the correct method of assessing stock in trade; and sometimes, as in the present case and many others, on deciding which items of expenditure are to be attributed to capital and which to revenue. In solving this question as to what is the true profit—

c ‘... first, ... the ordinary principles of commercial accounting must, as far as practicable, be observed and, secondly, ... the law relating to income tax must not be violated ... that is to say, by one means or another the full amount of the profits or gains of the trade must be determined.’

See Viscount Simonds’s speech in the Duple Motor Bodies case⁵. In *Lothian Chemical Co Ltd v Rogers (Inspector of Taxes)*⁶, Lord Clyde observed:

d ‘My Lords, it has been said time without number ... you deal in the main with ordinary principles of commercial accounting. They do expressly exclude a number of deductions and allowances, some of which according to the ordinary principles of commercial accounting might be allowable. But where these ordinary principles are not invaded by Statute they must be allowed to prevail. It is according to the legitimate principles of commercial practice to draw distinctions, and sharp distinctions, between capital and revenue expenditure, and it is e no use criticising these, as it is easy to do, upon the ground that if you apply logic to them they become more or less indefensible. They are matters of practical convenience, but practical convenience which is undoubtedly embodied in the generally understood principles of commercial accounting.’

f I confess that in the present case I find it difficult to discern any conflict between logic and the established principles of sound commercial accounting. Lord Clyde was merely restating a principle of law which has been laid down in countless other authorities: see, for example, *Stott v Hoddinot*⁷ per Atkin J; *Sun Insurance Office v Clark*⁸ per Viscount Haldane and *Roebank Printing Co v Inland Revenue Comrs*⁹ per Lord Clyde. In my judgment, the true proposition of law is well established, namely that in determining what is capital expenditure and what is revenue expenditure in g order to arrive at the profit for tax purposes in any particular year, the courts will follow the established principles of sound commercial accounting unless they conflict with the law as laid down in any statute.

In the present case, it is argued on behalf of the Crown that to charge the items in question to revenue is contrary to the following provisions of s 137 of the Income Tax Act 1952:

h ‘Subject to the provisions of this Act, in computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged under Case I or Case II of Schedule D, no sum shall be deducted in respect of—(a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade,

j 2 [1971] 2 All ER 407, [1971] 1 WLR 442

3 [1961] 2 All ER 167, [1961] 1 WLR 739

4 [1971] 2 All ER 534, [1971] 2 WLR 1313

5 [1961] 2 All ER at 169, [1961] 1 WLR at 746, 747

6 (1926) 11 Tax Cas 508 at 520, 521

7 (1916) 7 Tax Cas 85 at 91

8 [1912] AC 443 at 455, [1911-13] All ER Rep 495 at 499

9 (1927) 13 Tax Cas 864 at 874

profession or vocation . . . (d) any sum expended for repairs of premises occupied, or for the supply, repairs or alterations of any implements, utensils or articles employed, for the purposes of the trade, profession or vocation, beyond the sum actually expended for those purposes . . . (f) any capital withdrawn from, or any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in, such trade, profession or vocation; (g) any capital employed in improvements of premises occupied for the purposes of the trade, profession or vocation.'

In my view, the money laid out in respect of the disputed items was indubitably laid out by the taxpayer company wholly and exclusively for the purposes of their trade. I certainly cannot think of any other purpose for which the money was in reality expended. It was argued that this money was being laid out in the years 1947-54 partly for the purpose of a trade which had been carried on prior to 8th January 1945 by the company from which the taxpayer company bought the cinema. I am afraid that I cannot accept this argument. It seems to me to be unreal on the facts and to involve an altogether too artificial construction of s 137 (a). For the same reasons, I am equally satisfied that all the sums expended for repairs of the cinema occupied by the taxpayer company or for the supply, repairs or alterations of any implements, utensils or articles for the purposes of the taxpayer company's trade were actually expended for those purposes and therefore are not excluded by s 137 (d).

I of course accept that if any of the disputed items in truth constituted capital expenditure they would be excluded by s 137 (f) and (g). But no help can be derived from the Act in deciding the question of what is capital expenditure. The Act does not give even the faintest hint as to how this question should be answered. I am therefore wholly unable to accept the argument that the established commercial accounting practice (found by the Special Commissioners) of charging the disputed items to revenue and not to capital is in any way in conflict with the Act.

That, in my view, really disposes of this appeal. I must, however, deal with *Law Shipping Co Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹⁰, out of respect for the interesting arguments which have been addressed to us on it. In this connection, it must be remembered that in the present case the commissioners have found on ample evidence an established practice of sound commercial accounting. Sometimes, however there is no evidence of such a practice; sometimes there is conflicting evidence; and sometimes there is evidence of two parallel but conflicting principles of commercial accounting. In such cases, the courts must do the best they can without evidence, or choose between the conflicting evidence or decide which is the most appropriate principle of commercial accounting to adopt. Even in cases such as these, of which the Law Shipping case¹⁰ was one, the courts have never attempted to define 'capital expenditure' or 'revenue expenditure'. Such is the complexity of commerce and accountancy that no definition could be devised which would be appropriate in every case.

In the many cases in which the courts have had to determine 'What are the profits and gains?', they have often had to consider whether a certain item of expenditure is properly chargeable against capital or revenue without any evidence or with conflicting evidence of established commercial accounting practice. In such cases the courts have used illustrations or phrases which seemed helpful in solving the problem confronting them in the light of the particular facts being considered. As Viscount Radcliffe observed, in giving the judgment of the Board in *Comr of Taxes v Nchanga Consolidated Copper Mines Ltd*¹¹:

'... it has to be remembered that all these phrases ... are essentially descriptive rather than definitive, and, as each new case arises for adjudication and it is sought to reason by analogy from its facts to those of one previously decided,

¹⁰ (1923) 12 Tax Cas 621

¹¹ [1964] 1 All ER 208 at 212, [1964] AC 948 at 959

- a a court's primary duty is to inquire how far a description that was both relevant and significant in one set of circumstances is either significant or relevant in those which are presently before it.'

Where, however, there is evidence which is accepted by the court as establishing a sound commercial accounting practice conflicting with no Act, that normally is the end of the matter. The court adopts the practice, applies it and decides the case accordingly.

- b It seems to me important to keep these considerations well in mind when considering the Law Shipping case¹², which was the sheet anchor of the Crown's case in this court and which appeared to the Special Commissioners to be conclusive in the Crown's favour. In that case, the taxpayers had bought a ship for £97,000 which at the time of purchase was ready to sail with freight booked. The periodical Lloyd's survey was then considerably overdue. As a matter of grace, an exemption from survey was obtained until the completion of the voyage which the vessel was then about to commence. At the conclusion of the voyage about six months later £51,558 had to be spent on repairs in order for the vessel to pass its survey. £12,000 of this sum was in respect of repairs caused by deterioration during the voyage. The balance of £39,558 was spent to remedy the state of disrepair in which the vessel had been at the time of purchase. It was held that this latter sum was capital expenditure by the taxpayers and could not be charged against their profits. Before the taxpayers purchased the vessel they must have been aware that a large sum of money would have to be spent on repairs before the Lloyd's certificate could be renewed. It must have been apparent, as Lord Clyde pointed out, that if the vessel had been in a fit state of repair to pass survey at the time of purchase, its capital value, and therefore the price which the taxpayers would have had to pay, would have far exceeded the purchase price of £97,000.

- c There seem to me to be many important distinctions between that case and the present case. (1) In the Law Shipping case¹² the purchase price was substantially less than it would have been had the vessel been in a fit state of repair to pass the Lloyd's survey at the date of purchase. Lord Skerrington stressed¹³ that the taxpayers had bought a vessel which was out of repair to the extent of £39,558 and that they made good this defect at the first opportunity. He added¹³:

'The cost of these repairs was in my opinion just as much a capital expenditure from the point of view of the Appellants' business as it would have been if the work had been executed by the seller before the sale and the cost had been added by him to the price of the ship.'

- g In the present case, the purchase price paid by the taxpayer company was in no way affected by the fact that the cinema was in disrepair at the date of its acquisition. The sellers could not lawfully have executed the repairs prior to the acquisition since no licence to execute such work was then obtainable. (2) In the Law Shipping case¹² the vessel was not in a state to pass survey at the time of purchase, and in order to obtain a Lloyd's certificate and turn it into a profit-earning asset after the voyage on which it was then embarking it was necessary to spend a very large sum on deferred repairs immediately after the conclusion of that voyage. In the present case, the cinema was a profit-earning asset at the date of its acquisition in spite of its state of disrepair. It remained so, although no money was spent on deferred repairs for a number of years after its acquisition. (3) In the Law Shipping case¹² there was no evidence that on established principles of sound commercial accounting the £39,558 could properly be charged by the taxpayer as revenue expenditure. And I should have been very surprised if there had been any such evidence. Lord Clyde thought it would have been abnormal to charge this outlay against the taxpayers' revenue expenditure. Lord Sands said¹⁴: 'Upon ordinary business principles this outlay appears to me to be properly a capital charge.' In the present case, however, the commissioners held, on ample evidence, that it was in accordance with the established principles of sound commercial accounting to charge the disputed items to revenue expenditure, and these principles in no way conflict with any statute.

12 (1923) 12 Tax Cas 621

13 (1923) 12 Tax Cas at 627

To my mind, the facts of the Law Shipping case¹⁵ are so far removed from those of the present case that in spite of the most skilful arguments advanced on behalf of the Crown I am altogether unpersuaded that there is anything in that authority or any other which would make it permissible for us to hold in the present case that the sums spent on deferred repairs should be charged to capital expenditure in the teeth of sound commercial accountancy practice which conflicts with no statute. I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

Before parting with this case, I should mention, however, that when this case came before the commissioners and *Pennycuik V-C*¹⁶, the Marble Arch cinema was selected as an example of a class of transaction in which a cinema was acquired by the taxpayer company from an outside source without succession. Examples of three other classes of transaction were also considered, namely transactions in which a cinema was acquired from (a) an outside source with succession, (b) as the result of a transfer within the group without succession, and (c) as the result of a transfer within the group with succession. It was conceded that if deferred repairs in respect of the Marble Arch cinema were properly chargeable as revenue expenditure then they should also properly be so charged in respect of each of the other three classes of transaction. This no doubt was because the three other classes of transaction were even further away from the Law Shipping case¹⁵ than the Marble Arch transaction—if that be possible. Accordingly since I have come to the conclusion at which I have arrived in respect of the Marble Arch cinema, I find it unnecessary, as did *Pennycuik V-C*¹⁶, to deal with the other classes of transaction. I would only add that had I considered that deferred repairs in respect of the Marble Arch cinema were properly chargeable against capital I think, although I am expressing no concluded view on this point, that I should probably have held that they were equally chargeable against capital in the case of all the other three classes of transaction to which I have referred. The question in each type of transaction must always be the same: what were the profits earned by the taxpayer company for the fiscal years in question? The source from which the taxpayer company acquired the cinemas with which they earned their profits does not seem to me, as at present advised, to be relevant to this question. Nor does it seem to me to be relevant whether the taxpayer company acquired the cinemas with or without succession to the trade of the sellers or transferors.

BUCKLEY LJ. The question for decision in this case is whether substantial sums expended by the taxpayer company, Odeon Associated Theatres Ltd, in the accounting periods relevant to its assessment to income tax for the fiscal years 1946-47 to 1955-56, inclusive, which sums were expended in effecting repairs, redecoration and refurnishing of a number of cinema theatres acquired by the taxpayer company during and soon after the second world war, should, in computing for income tax purposes the profits of the taxpayer company for the relevant periods, be allowed as revenue expenditure, or whether so much of such expenditure as was attributable to dilapidations which occurred before the acquisition of those theatres respectively should be treated as capital expenditure.

I need not restate the facts, but these points need to be stressed. First, all the disputed expenditure was of a kind which, if the theatres had remained in the ownership of the owners from whom they were acquired by the taxpayer company and the

¹⁴ (1923) 12 Tax Cas at 629

¹⁵ (1923) 12 Tax Cas 621

¹⁶ [1971] 2 All ER 407, [1971] 1 WLR 442

a expenditure had been incurred by those owners, would have been deductible as revenue expenditure. Secondly, the amount of dilapidation which occurred before the acquisition by the taxpayer company of a theatre (in the case stated called 'deferred repairs') did not in any case significantly affect the price paid by the taxpayer company for the theatre. Thirdly, the deferred repairs were not for the most part such as to require immediate remedy, and there was no question of danger to the public or of b any theatre having to be closed for repairs. Fourthly, all cinema theatre owners were in a like position of being unable, on account of war time restrictions, to carry out any but the most urgent repairs, redecorations or refurnishing of their theatres; there was no competition in this respect; this state of affairs continued until the early 1950s.

c The cost of acquiring or creating a physical capital asset for use in a trade or business is clearly capital expenditure. The cost of improving such an asset by adding to it or modifying it may well be capital expenditure. On the other hand, the cost of works of recurrent repair or maintenance of such an asset attributable to the wear and tear occurring in the course of use of the asset in his trade or business by the person carrying out the works is revenue expenditure, and so constitutes a proper debit item in the profit and loss account of the business. Whether, where there has been a change of d ownership, the cost of works of repair or maintenance attributable to wear and tear which occurred before the change of ownership should be regarded as revenue expenditure or capital expenditure is a question the answer to which must, in my opinion, depend on the particular facts of each case. Counsel for the Crown has argued that any repair must improve the article repaired and, avoiding undue cynicism, I think that that proposition must be accepted. He says further that if the e state of the article, when repaired, is better than its state was when it was acquired by the person carrying out the repairs, the cost of repairs should pro tanto be regarded as capital expenditure. A tradesman, for example, who acquires a dilapidated shop in which to carry on his business, and, either before he commences business or as soon thereafter as he can afford to do so, put the shop into a state of repair and decoration suitable for his business, has incurred the cost not only of acquiring the shop but f also of repairing and decorating it in a suitable manner in order to provide himself with a capital asset of a character which he regards as appropriate to his business. The whole of this expenditure, it is said, is capital expenditure because it constitutes the cost of acquiring such a capital asset as the trader requires for the purpose of his business. The argument is an attractive one, but should not, in my opinion, be accepted without careful consideration.

g Counsel for the Crown contends that the expenditure on deferred repairs was what he described as 'a once for all jacking-up of the value of the principal asset', and so was non-recurrent expenditure by the taxpayer company for the enduring benefit of its trade. He says that the fact that the prices paid for theatres took no account of the circumstance that at the dates of purchase repairs had already been deferred is of no importance. He contends that the cost of doing the deferred repairs was an additional h cost to the taxpayer company of acquiring the capital assets, i.e. the theatres. Such expenditure, he says, should be regarded as capital expenditure. As Lord Reid observed in *Regent Oil Co Ltd v Strick (Inspector of Taxes)*¹⁷:

j 'The question [whether a particular outlay can be set against income or must be regarded as a capital outlay] is ultimately a question of law for the court, but it is a question which must be answered in light of all the circumstances which it is reasonable to take into account, and the weight which must be given to a particular circumstance in a particular case must depend rather on common sense than on a strict application of any single legal principle.'

In answering that question of law it is right that the court should pay regard to the ordinary principles of commercial accounting so far as applicable. Accountants are, after all, the persons best qualified by training and practical experience to suggest answers to the many difficult problems that can arise in this field. Nevertheless the question remains ultimately a question of law. a

No one, I think, would dispute that the cost of ordinary current repairs in the normal course of maintenance of a fixed capital asset employed in a business is revenue expenditure. Such cost arises out of the wear and tear of the asset in the course of earning the profits of the business and so is a proper debit to be set against the revenue of the business in its profit and loss account. I would myself think that, save in exceptional circumstances, this is true even in the case of the first repairs in the normal course of maintenance of an asset acquired in a part worn condition. A tradesman who acquires a shop, the outside painting of which was last done two years before his purchase, will have to repaint the shop earlier than if it had been redecorated immediately before acquisition, but this, I think, is something which, as a commercial matter, he will take into account in considering the prospective profitability of the shop during the early years of his ownership. In other words, he will regard it as a revenue expense. He will not say to himself: 'When I have to repaint the outside of the shop perhaps three years hence, only three-fifths of the cost will be chargeable against revenue in my profit and loss account: the balance will be a capital investment in my business.' This view is, I think, borne out by the finding of fact contained in the supplemental case stated by the Special Commissioners in the present proceedings. Any other view would lead to great difficulty and confusion. Whenever a taxpayer made a capital investment in the acquisition of a part worn capital asset for the purposes of his business it would be necessary to record the state of dilapidation of the asset at the date of acquisition in order to determine, when repairs were carried out at a later date, what proportion of the cost should be attributed to improvement on the state of repair at the date of acquisition. Although maybe in practice such a principle would be applied for fiscal purposes in relatively few cases, logically it would apply to every case of the acquisition for business purposes of a part worn capital asset, however long or short the time before any repairs came to be done to it. b
c
d
e

Such a principle should not, in my judgment, be accepted as of general application unless logic or law demand this. It is said that *Law Shipping Co Ltd v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹⁸ demonstrates that in Scotland the law has adopted and applied this principle. In my judgment, that case does not indicate that the Court of Session considered that there was any such principle of general application. The appellant company in that case had purchased a secondhand ship at a date when her periodical Lloyd's survey was overdue but had been deferred pending the completion of a voyage then in contemplation. On her return six months later the survey was made and the company was obliged to spend a large sum on repairs. The court held that except for such part of the cost of the repairs as was attributable to the period during which the ship was employed in the appellant company's trade the expenditure in question was in the nature of capital expenditure and was not an admissible deduction in computing the company's profits. In that case the capital asset which the appellant company acquired (i.e. the ship) was at the time of purchase burdened with the necessity for its owners to carry out at the earliest practicable moment the repairs required to satisfy the Lloyd's survey. Unless and until such repairs were done the ship could not be further used in the owner's business after the termination of the one voyage. It may be that those repairs could have been said to have been of a routine maintenance character, but, in my judgment, the case is clearly distinguishable on its facts from a case in which someone has acquired an asset which, although part worn at the date of acquisition, is not burdened with the necessity to carry out immediate or nearly immediate works of renovation. The Law Shipping case¹⁸ is, in my view, more nearly analogous to the case of a trader who has bought a capital asset which at the date f
g
h
i

a of acquisition was not in working order and has to put it into working order before being able to use it in his business. When the Law Shipping Co Ltd bought the ship they knew that in order to be able to use her in their business beyond the one voyage they would need to spend not only the purchase price of the ship but also the cost of the necessary repairs. The facts of the present case are quite different. All the theatres acquired by the taxpayer company were, when they were acquired, in a condition fully suitable for immediate profitable use in the taxpayer company's business and capable of continuing to be so used in the conditions then existing for some years.

b *Jackson (Inspector of Taxes) v Laskers Home Furnishers Ltd*¹⁹ is a case in which expenditure on repairs by a tenant of a building was, in my judgment, properly held to constitute capital expenditure. In that case the respondent company obtained a lease of the building which contained a covenant on their part to reinstate the demised property in a good state of repair. The cost of carrying out the repairs was part of the consideration for the grant of the lease; it was in truth part of the price paid by the company for the lease, notwithstanding that the expenditure was expenditure purely on repairs. *Royal Insurance Co v Watson*²⁰ was another case in which the sum under consideration was held to be a capital expenditure on the ground that it formed part of the consideration for the acquisition of an asset. Of the other authorities relied on c by the Crown on this appeal, it is perhaps sufficient if I say that *Highland Railway Co v Balderston (Surveyor of Taxes)*¹ was a case in which the expenditure there under consideration was clearly incurred in making physical alterations to and improvements to the assets of the appellant company, and that *Inland Revenue Comrs v Granite City Steamship Co Ltd*² was a case in which the expenditure there under consideration was incurred in making good damage suffered by a capital asset of the respondent company which had resulted during the respondent company's ownership from matters entirely foreign to the carrying on of that company's business. Neither of these cases appears to me to assist the Crown on this appeal.

d In consequence of the state of affairs existing during and immediately following the war, the taxpayer company's theatres remained unrepaired and unreddecorated for much longer than would have otherwise been the case, but the disputed expenditure, when it came to be made in the years 1947 to 1954, was all expenditure on works and matters of a kind which can properly be described as maintenance, and which would be bound to recur in later years. It seems to me to be misleading to describe this expenditure as 'once for all'. It was expenditure on maintenance which had then for the first time become possible and worthwhile for the taxpayer company to carry out. It was expenditure which, in the then existing altered conditions, was necessary to e preserve the profitability of the theatres. There is no indication in the case that the cost was greater than it would have been, having regard to the passage of time, if the theatres had been in a good state of decoration and repair when the taxpayer company acquired them. The facts as found do not, in my judgment, establish that the taxpayer company was put to any greater expense in the way of repairs and re-decoration by reason of the deferred repairs than would have been the case if there had been no deferred repairs.

f The taxpayer company did not, as the result of some non-recurring payment, acquire some new asset or benefit, and the present case appears to me to be distinguishable from *British Insulated and Helsby Cables Ltd v Atherton*³ relied on by the Crown.

g In my judgment, Pennycuik V-C⁴ was right in reaching the conclusion that, apart

i 19 [1956] 3 All ER 891, [1957] 1 WLR 69

20 [1897] AC 1, 3 Tax Cas 500

1 (1889) 2 Tax Cas 485

2 (1927) 13 Tax Cas 1

3 [1926] AC 205, [1925] All ER Rep 623

4 [1971] 2 All ER 407, [1971] 1 WLR 442

from the statutory prohibitions contained in the Income Tax Act 1952, s 137, the disputed expenditure was proper to be taken into consideration as a debit against revenue in arriving at the taxpayer company's profits in the relevant years. In my judgment, there is nothing in that section which requires any of the disputed expenditure to be excluded in the computation of the taxpayer company's profits. The expenditure was incurred wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the taxpayer company's trade, so that s 137 (a) and (d) do not apply. No capital was withdrawn from the taxpayer company's trade, nor, in my judgment, for reasons already indicated, was any part of the expenditure employed or intended to be employed as capital in the taxpayer company's trade, so that s 137 (f) does not apply. Nor, in my judgment, for reasons already given, can any part of the expenditure be said to constitute capital employed in the improvement of any premises occupied for the purposes of the taxpayer company's trade, so that s 137 (g) does not apply. It has not been suggested that any other paragraph could apply in the present case.

The Special Commissioners in their decision treated the disputed expenditure as expenses of operating the theatres which 'accrued' before the taxpayer company began to operate them. This is perhaps elliptical language. The deferred repairs—i.e. the pre-acquisition dilapidations—occurred before the taxpayer company acquired the theatres. No expenses were incurred or, in my opinion, can be accurately said to have accrued until the repairs were carried out. When those expenses were incurred, they were incurred by the taxpayer company in the course of carrying on its business and for the purposes of that business. The question whether they should be regarded as a proper charge against the taxpayer company's capital account or its revenue account cannot, in my judgment, be answered merely by saying that 'such expenses did not accrue in the process of earning the taxpayer company's profit or gain'. If this language means, as I think it must, that the expenditure was not occasioned by anything which happened in the process of earning the taxpayer company's profits, I would make two observations about this. First, this is not, I think, a satisfactory test. Many kinds of expenditure—for example, insurance premiums—are properly to be regarded as revenue expenditure without their having been occasioned by anything which has occurred in the process of earning profits. Secondly, as I have already pointed out, the case does not establish that the expenditure was any greater in consequence of the deferred repairs than it would have been if there had been none.

I find no reason in law for dissenting from the finding of fact in the supplemental case that on the assumption made for the purposes of that finding, namely, that all the theatres were acquired from vendors outside the Odeon Group but that all other facts were as found in the case, the disputed expenditure would, in accordance with principles of sound commercial accounting, be dealt with as a charge to revenue in the taxpayer company's accounts. No distinction, I think, is to be drawn in this respect between transfers of theatres within the group and purchases from vendors outside the group. Accordingly, I am of opinion that all the disputed expenditure was properly deductible in computing the taxpayer company's profits for income tax purposes in the relevant years.

For these reasons, which make it unnecessary to consider the point referred to in the taxpayer company's cross-notice relating only to acquisitions which involved succession to a trade, I would dismiss this appeal.

ORR LJ. In this appeal it has been common ground that, although the expenditure in question, if incurred by the previous owners of the theatres, would have been deductible in computing their profits for income tax purposes, it would have fallen to be treated as capital if incurred by the taxpayer company immediately after acquisition of the theatres, and it has been simply and attractively argued for the Crown that delay by the taxpayer company in incurring the expenditure cannot alter its essential character. The proposition advanced for the Crown is that, where a capital asset acquired by a trader for use in his trade was at the time of its acquisition a in need of repairs, any expenditure subsequently incurred by the trader which has the effect of improving the asset beyond the state in which it was at its acquisition is of necessity a capital expenditure. We are concerned with the application of this proposition, if it be correct, to the facts of the present case, but the proposition as formulated would, as I understand it, apply to expenditure incurred at whatever interval of time after the acquisition, and in whatever circumstances, and would apply not only, as in this case, to premises and their furnishings, but also to such capital assets of b a trader as lorries and cars and items of plant of all kinds. In the present case the information and material necessary to support the Crown's argument became available to the Revenue in a convenient form as a result of a claim made by the taxpayer company under s 37 of the Finance Act 1946 which relates to 'terminal expenses' for the purpose of excess profits tax. In other cases the application of the c Crown's proposition, if it be correct, would involve detailed investigation of the condition of the premises or other asset at the time of acquisition and thereafter a detailed comparison of that condition with items of expenditure subsequently incurred, and it seems to me that these difficulties would in many cases make it impossible to apply the proposition save perhaps on a very arbitrary basis, but the Crown are entitled to say that this is not an answer to their case if it is on principle and authority well founded.

d It has been sought for the Crown to support the proposition, as applied to the expenditure in question in this case, on the three grounds, first, that the expenditure was by its nature capital; secondly, that its deduction is expressly prohibited by one or other of the paras (a), (d), (f) and (g) of s 137 of the Income Tax Act 1952; and thirdly, that it is not a 'proper debit item' for the purpose of computing the income tax profits of the trade; but in my judgment the Crown's case must stand or fall on the e first of these grounds.

f As to s 137 (a), there is clear authority in all the speeches in the House of Lords in *British Insulated and Helsby Cables Ltd v Atherton*⁵ (a case in which the expenditure in question was held to be capital by a majority of three to two) for the proposition that expenditure does not, by reason of its being capital, fall within the prohibition contained in that paragraph, and the same reasoning, in my judgment, applies equally to para (d). As to paras (f) and (g), the position plainly is that if the expenditure in question was on general principles capital the Crown does not need to rely on these paragraphs, and if it was not capital they do not help the Crown. In my judgment, therefore, the Crown's case cannot derive any assistance from the express prohibitions contained in s 137.

g As to the third ground, it was argued for the Crown that, even if the expenditure was on general principles of a revenue nature, it is to be disallowed on the basis of the test laid down by Lord Sumner in *Usher's Wiltshire Brewery Ltd v Bruce*⁶ that a deduction—h 'is to be made or not to be made according as it is or is not, on the facts of the case, a proper debit item to be charged against incomings of the trade . . .'

i But this reference to a 'proper debit item' was in the context of an issue between capital and revenue expenditure. In my judgment it means no more than that, to be deductible, the expenditure must be of a revenue nature, and the passage was so understood by Lord Cave in the Atherton case⁷.

In support of this argument, however, the Crown also relied on a passage in the Law Shipping case⁸ in which Lord Clyde, before holding that the expenditure in question was by its nature capital, and alone amongst the members of the court, expressed

5 [1926] AC 205, [1925] All ER Rep 623

6 [1915] AC 433 at 468

7 [1926] AC at 211, [1925] All ER Rep at 628

8 (1923) 12 Tax Cas at 625

the view that the expenditure appeared to be prohibited by what is now para (a) of s 137 of the Income Tax Act 1952; and reliance is further placed on certain passages in the judgments in *Inland Revenue Comrs v Granite City Steamship Co Ltd*⁹, *Jackson (Inspector of Taxes) v Laskers Home Furnishers Ltd*¹⁰, and *Bidwell v Gardiner*¹¹. But in all these cases, save the last, the expenditure in question was clearly of a capital nature, and in the last, which involved expenditure in the first year after acquisition, and in which the argument was mainly on the 'succession' point, the question for the judge was whether the commissioners were entitled, on their view of the facts, to hold the expenditure to have been in part capital. If the Crown's proposition in the present case cannot be derived from general principles, the passages in these cases relied on by the Crown seem to me to provide too slender a basis to support it. I would add that if, as seems possible, Lord Clyde in the Law Shipping case¹² was taking the view that the expenditure was prohibited by what is now para (a) of s 137, on the ground that it was capital, his view was inconsistent with that taken in the House of Lords in the Atherton case¹³.

Finally, as regards this argument, the Crown's case involves that there is some third test of deductibility, additional to that of capital or revenue expenditure, and additional to that of specific statutory prohibition, but in my judgment the existence of any such third test would be inconsistent with the proposition contained in more than one decided case, and most recently repeated by Lord Reid in *BSC Footwear Ltd (formerly Freeman, Hardy & Willis Ltd) v Ridgway (Inspector of Taxes)*¹⁴, that in the framing of a profit and loss account for the purposes of income tax—

'it is well settled that the ordinary principles of commercial accounting must be used except insofar as any specific statutory provision requires otherwise.'

For all these reasons, I agree with the learned judge that there is no such third test.

If I am right in the above conclusions the question in this case is whether on general principles and on authority the expenditure in question was a capital or a revenue one. The Crown rely strongly on the Law Shipping case¹⁵. Counsel for the taxpayer company accepts the validity of that decision on its own particular facts, but claims that the present facts are distinguishable. In my judgment, there are a number of important differences between that case and this. One is that in that case the purchaser knew at the time of acquisition of the ship that after one further voyage a Lloyd's survey would be required and would involve very substantial expenditure if the ship were to continue to be used in the trade, whereas here what was in the purchaser's contemplation was that the theatres could be used profitably (as in the event they were) without making good the deferred repairs, and that substantial expenditure in making them good could not be lawfully incurred for an indefinite period of time. A second difference is that in the Law Shipping case¹⁵ the court drew, and in my judgment correctly drew, the inference that if the Lloyd's survey had not been overdue the seller would have exacted and the buyer would have paid a larger price, whereas here it has been found as a fact that the dilapidated state of the theatres did not materially affect the price. A third difference is that there was not in the Law Shipping case¹⁵ any accountancy evidence, whereas in the present case there was such evidence which was accepted by the commissioners.

A fourth difference is that in the Law Shipping case¹⁵ the repairs or replacements necessary to satisfy the Lloyd's survey were carried out after the first voyage of the ship, whereas in the present case the repairs and replacements in question were

9 (1927) 13 Tax Cas 1

10 [1956] 3 All ER 891, [1957] 1 WLR 69

11 (1960) 39 Tax Cas 31

12 (1923) 12 Tax Cas at 625

13 [1926] AC 205, [1925] All ER Rep 623

14 [1971] 2 All ER 534 at 536, [1971] 2 WLR 1313 at 1315

15 (1923) 12 Tax Cas 621

a carried out over a period beginning two years and ending ten years after the acquisition, and there is no evidence to indicate that (apart from inflation, which was taken into account in the percentage calculation or estimate) they cost any more than would have been incurred if the theatres had been acquired in good repair and subsequent dilapidations had been made good in the ordinary course of prudent maintenance. It has been pointed out to us, and is not in dispute, that the main items of the expenditure in question were carpets, decoration and upholstery, and that 60 per cent of the overall total of £17,000 represents carpets. In my judgment, it is a reasonable supposition that if dilapidations under these headings had been made good in 1945 they would in all probability have required further repair and replacement before the end of 1954. These facts pose the question why, if a trader has acquired capital assets for use in his trade and is commercially able, and desires, to continue to use these assets in a dilapidated state up to a time when, if he had acquired them new, c they would in any event have required repair or replacement, he is to be deemed, when he does effect repair or replacement, to have done so by way of capital rather than revenue expenditure; and if, as here, the position is that the trader is prohibited by law from effecting the repairs or replacements, why he should be treated as if he had elected to carry them out immediately.

d Because of these differences, which in my judgment are crucial and compelling, between the facts of the Law Shipping case¹⁶ and those of the present case, I would uphold the decision of the learned judge¹⁷ as to the expenditure incurred in relation to the Odeon Theatre, Marble Arch.

e Before this court additional points were taken on behalf of the taxpayer company as to the expenditure incurred in relation to certain other theatres on the ground that they were acquired from within the taxpayer company's group of companies, and/or that there was a succession to the trade carried on by the previous owner. These points do not arise in the light of the conclusion which this court has reached, but if that conclusion is wrong I would not have acceded to the argument of counsel for the taxpayer company on either of these points. As to the first, I cannot accept that the group accounts would present any insuperable difficulty. As to the second, counsel f for the taxpayer company based his argument on a difference between the wording in r 11 of Cases I and II of Sch D to the Income Tax Act 1918, as amended by s 32 of the Finance Act 1926, and the wording in the subsequent s 19 of the Finance Act 1953; but in my judgment the wording of r 11 as amended:

‘... the tax payable for all years of assessment by the person succeeding... shall be computed as if he had set up and commenced the trade at that time...’

g is amply wide enough to exclude deduction of the expenditure in question if, contrary to our conclusion, the corresponding expenditure incurred in respect of the Odeon Theatre, Marble Arch, is not deductible. I consider that this point is covered, adversely to the taxpayer company, by the reasoning of the House of Lords in *United Steel Cos Ltd v Cullington*¹⁸, although the particular subject-matter of that case was wear and tear allowances and the carry forward of losses, and not deduction of trade expenses. h

For these reasons, and those given by Salmon and Buckley LJJ, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Solicitors: Solicitor of Inland Revenue; Richards, Butler & Co (for the taxpayer company).

F A Amies Esq Barrister.

16 (1923) 12 Tax Cas 621

17 [1971] 2 All ER 407, [1971] 1 WLR 442

18 [1940] 2 All ER 170, [1940] AC 812

Crisp Malting Ltd v Bourne (Inspector of Taxes) ^a

CHANCERY DIVISION

MEGARRY J

24th, 25th NOVEMBER 1971

Income tax – Discontinuance of trade – Company – Sale of business by company to limited partnership consisting of individuals – Resale of business by individuals to same company and one individual – First sale before 6th April 1966 – Second sale after that date – No permanent discontinuance of trade after first sale – Statutory provision saving ‘subsequent change’ from effect of permanent discontinuance ceasing to have effect except as respects any relevant change occurring before 6th April 1966 – Whether permanent discontinuance of trade after second sale – Finance Act 1954, s 17 (1), (2) – Finance Act 1965, s 61 (9). ^b ^c

The taxpayer company was incorporated in 1952 and carried on business as maltsters and merchants until 31st March 1966 when it sold its business to a limited partnership consisting of C and E (the first change). On 12th April 1966 the limited partnership sold the business to another limited partnership consisting of the taxpayer company and E (the second change), the taxpayer company being the general partner and its interest in the trade exceeding a three-fourths share. For all relevant purposes the effect was the same as if the second change had restored the business to the taxpayer company alone. The reason for the two changes was that the change-over for companies from income tax to corporation tax brought about by the Finance Act 1965 was thought by some (however erroneously) to involve an element of double taxation and the object of the changes of ownership was to avoid this. Under the provisions of s 17 (1) and (2)^a of the Finance Act 1954 neither the first nor the second change would have operated as a discontinuance of the taxpayer company's trade since, immediately before the first change, the taxpayer company was engaged in carrying on the trade and, following the second change, which occurred within two years of the first change, the taxpayer company owned an interest in the trade exceeding a three-fourths share in it. However, by the Finance Act 1965, s 95 (7) and Sch 22, the relevant parts of s 17 were repealed ‘except as respects any relevant change occurring before the year 1966-67’. Section 61 (9) of the 1965 Act also provided that the relevant provisions of s 17 were to ‘cease to have effect’ with the same exception for ‘any relevant change occurring before the year 1966-67’. It was common ground that the first change, being a ‘relevant change’ which occurred before the year 1966-67, was prevented by s 17 (1) of the 1954 Act from operating as a permanent discontinuance and that the 1965 Act did not alter this. It was contended by the taxpayer company that the second change, although occurring after the beginning of the year 1966-67, was also prevented from operating as a permanent discontinuance; the taxpayer company's argument was that since s 17 (1) and (2) continued to have effect as regards the first change and since s 17 (2) related in terms to ‘some subsequent change’ occurring after ‘the first-mentioned change’, it followed that the effect of s 17 on the second change was also preserved. ^d ^e ^f ^g ^h

Held – Since s 17 of the 1954 Act had, for all relevant purposes, ceased to have effect and been repealed, it could not save the second change from operating as a permanent discontinuance of the trade. The second change in no way inevitably followed on the first change; the second change was one which might or might not have been made according to the volition of those concerned. The reference to the ‘first-mentioned’ change in s 17 (2) was merely part of the conditions which had to be satisfied if the subsequent change was to be saved from effecting a permanent discontinuance by virtue of s 17 (2); the status of the first change as one which satisfied the still ⁱ

^a Section 17, so far as material, is set out at p 704 f to h, post

- a effective s 17 (1) did not mean that the mere reference to it in s 17 (2) would keep that subsection alive in its application to a subsequent change (see p 703 h and p 701 a to c, post).

Notes

- b For succession to a trade for income tax purposes, see 20 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 130-132, para 231; for company reconstructions not treated as a discontinuance, see ibid, pp 135, 136, para 238, and for cases on the subject, see 28 (1) Digest (Reissue) 110-114, 312-329.

For the Finance Act 1954, s 17, see 34 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn) 296, and for the Finance Act 1965, ss 61, 97 and Sch 22, see 45 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn) 595, 648, 748.

- c For 1970-71 and subsequent years of assessment, the Finance Act 1954, s 17, so far as unrepealed, and the Finance Act 1965, s 61, have been repealed by the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970, s 538 (1) and Sch 16 and replaced by ss 252, 253 of that Act.

Case stated

- d At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on 16th and 17th October 1969 Crisp Malting Ltd ('the company') appealed against an assessment to income tax under Case I of Sch D for the year 1965-66 in an amount of £70,000 (less £70,000 capital allowances). The question for determination by the commissioners was whether the profits assessed should be computed on the basis that the trade had been permanently discontinued.

- e The company was incorporated in 1952 and carried on trade as maltsters and merchants until 31st March 1966, its accounts being made up to 30th September in each year. On 31st March 1966 the company sold its business as a going concern to a partnership firm ('Crisp Malting no 1'). Crisp Malting no 1 was a limited partnership formed by a partnership deed dated 30th March 1966 consisting of Mr J W M Crisp and Mr T C Eaton, OBE, TD. Crisp Malting no 1 carried on the business until 12th April 1966 when the partners sold the business as a going concern to a partnership firm ('Crisp Malting no 2'). Crisp Malting no 2 was a limited partnership formed by a partnership deed dated 12th April 1966 consisting of the company and Mr Eaton. The company was the general partner and it was not disputed that its interest in the trade exceeded a three-fourths share.

- g (1) The question in dispute was whether (as the Crown contended) the profits assessed should be computed on the basis that the trade was permanently discontinued and a new trade set up and commenced by reason of the changes in the persons carrying it on occurring on 31st March 1966 (the first change) or on 12th April 1966 (the second change) or either of them. This question turned on the interpretation of s 17 of the Finance Act 1954 as affected by s 61 of the Finance Act 1965 which, broadly, replaced s 17. Section 61 (9), after enacting that certain parts of s 17 should apply for certain purposes, continued 'but that section . . . shall cease to have effect for any other purpose, except as respects any relevant change occurring before the year 1966-67'. (2) It was common ground in the arguments addressed to the commissioners: (a) that for the purpose of s 61 (9) 'relevant change' had the meaning assigned to it in para 1 (1) (b) of Sch 3 to the Finance Act 1954, i.e. (briefly) a change to which sub-s (1) or (2) of s 17 applied; (b) that the first change was a relevant change occurring before 1966-67; that s 17 remained effective as respects it, and that a permanent discontinuance did not result from it; (c) that if the second change was a relevant change, the concluding words of s 17 (2) (i.e. 'the trade shall not be treated . . . as permanently discontinued, nor a new trade as set up and commenced, by reason of that subsequent change') would have no effect as respects it, by reason of s 61 (9), because it did not occur before the year 1966-67. In that event (by reason of various other provisions which were not in dispute) the trade would have to be treated as discontinued on the occasion of the second change, and the profits computed accordingly. a

As the matter was argued before the commissioners, the issue was whether the second change was a relevant change as defined in para 1 (1) (b) of Sch 3.

It was contended on behalf of the company: (1) that inasmuch as, by virtue of s 61 (9), s 17 continued to have effect as respects the first change, effect must be given to all the provisions of s 17, including the whole of sub-s (2) as respects that first change, unless the second change was itself a 'relevant change' for the purpose of s 61 (9); (2) that the second change was not a 'relevant change' for the purpose of s 61 (9); (3) that the trade did not fall to be treated as permanently discontinued by reason of either the first change or of the second change, and that the assessment should be adjusted accordingly. b

It was contended for the Crown: (1) that the second change was a 'relevant change' within the meaning of that expression in s 61 (9), which occurred after the beginning of the year 1966-67; (2) that accordingly the provision in s 17 (2) had no effect as respects the second change; (3) that by reason of the second change the trade fell to be treated as permanently discontinued on 12th April 1966. c

The commissioners gave their decision as follows:

'The question for our determination appears to be whether Section 17 (2) of the Finance Act 1954 applies to the change in the persons carrying on the business occurring on 12th April, 1966. It was not disputed that if Section 17 had not been affected by the Finance Act 1965, Section 17 (2) would have applied to that change, and the result would have been that it would not have been treated as giving rise to a permanent discontinuance. However, Section 61 (9) of the Finance Act 1965, after enacting that certain parts of Section 17 should apply for certain purposes, goes on to say that Section 17 shall cease to have effect for any other purpose, except as respects any relevant change occurring before the year 1966/67. As the matter was argued, if the change which occurred on 12th April, 1966, was a "relevant change", Section 17 (2) would not apply to it and the appeal would fail. d

'The expression "relevant change" is defined in paragraph 1 (1) (b) of the 3rd Schedule to the Finance Act, 1954. This refers to a change to which sub-section (1) or (2) of Section 17 applies. What is contemplated by a change to which sub-section (2) alone applies? Test it this way: if the paragraph had referred only to a change to which sub-section (1) applied we would have had no doubt that the change on 31st March would be a "relevant change"; sub-section (1) clearly applies to it and what sub-section (2) does in relation to it is to identify certain circumstances which result in sub-section (1) applying; where (as here) those circumstances exist the change is one to which sub-section (1) applies and in our view it would be wrong to say that it is a change to which sub-section (2) applies. e

'What, then, is a change to which sub-section (2) only applies, unless it be a subsequent change? A subsequent change is the only change as regards which it could be said that sub-section (2) could ever have had a positive application. In our view the change on 12th April is a "relevant change" within the definition in the Schedule, and as it did not occur before the year 1966/67, Section 17 has no effect in relation to it. f

'The appeal therefore fails in principle, and we leave the figures to be agreed.' g

Agreement of the figures being later reported to the commissioners, on 28th July 1970, they increased the assessment accordingly to £189,564 (subject to capital allowances of £137,865 and losses of £42,312). The company immediately after the determination of the appeal declared its dissatisfaction therewith as being erroneous in point of law and on 30th July 1970 required the commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to the Taxes Management Act 1970, s 56. h b MEGARRY J. I have before me a short point on the permanent discontinuance of a trade for income tax purposes. It takes a little while to get to the point, but, once there, I feel no doubt, and so I do not think I need reserve my judgment. The point arises on a case stated by the Special Commissioners, and the facts lie in a narrow compass. A company called Crisp Malting Ltd, which I shall refer to as 'the company', was incorporated in 1952, and traded as maltsters and merchants until 31st March 1966. On that date the company sold its business to a limited partnership: I shall call that change 'change no 1'. A few days later, the fiscal year 1965-66 came to an end; and after the end of that fiscal year, on 12th April 1966, change no 2 occurred. This consisted of the partnership selling the business to another partnership. This second partnership consisted of the company and one of the existing partners, with the company's interest in the trade exceeding a three-quarters share. For all practical purposes in respect of the point that I have to consider, the effect was the same as if change no 2 had restored the business to the company alone. No question of any subsequent change arises. There was thus within a fortnight a change from the company to the partnership and back to the company, with the end of the fiscal year coming between change no 1 and change no 2. Counsel for the company told me that the reason for these changes was that the change-over for companies from income tax to corporation tax which the Finance Act 1965 brought about was thought by some (however erroneously) to involve an element of double taxation. The object was to avoid this.

- a* H Major Allen QC and A L Potez for the company.
L J Bromley QC and P W Medd for the Crown.

c The contention of counsel for the Crown is that the second change, on 12th April 1966, brought about a permanent discontinuance of the trade for income tax purposes. On the other hand, the company contends that it did not. It is common ground that the first change was prevented from bringing about a permanent discontinuance of the trade by reason of the operation of the Finance Act 1954, s 17 (1). However, by the Finance Act 1965, with a limited exception all the relevant parts of s 17 of the Finance Act 1954 not only ceased to have effect but also were repealed: see the Finance Act 1965, ss 61 (9), 97 (5), and Sch 22, Part IV. Both forms of statutory death were subject to identical words of exception, namely, 'except as respects any relevant change occurring before the year 1966-67'; and that, of course, leads to the date 6th April 1966.

d Now, change no 1 occurred before that date, and change no 2 occurred after that date. Change no 1 therefore satisfied one of the requisite conditions, and if it satisfied the other condition by being a 'relevant change' (and there is no suggestion that it did not), then in relation to that change s 17 of the Finance Act 1954 continued to have effect and remained unrepealed. On the other hand, change no 2 was patently incapable of satisfying both conditions, in that it occurred on 12th April 1966 and that date is not before 6th April 1966 but after. Accordingly, it matters not to discover whether or not that change ranked as a 'relevant change'; for even if it did, the saving in the 1965 Act could not, by reason of the date, have any application to it.

e Before the commissioners there seems to have been a substantial argument whether or not the second change was a 'relevant change'. Indeed the commissioners said that:

f 'As the matter was argued before us, the issue was whether the second change was a "relevant change" as defined in Paragraph 1 (1) (b) of the said 3rd Schedule', that is, of the Finance Act 1954. The statement of the contentions of the parties displays, inter alia, the Crown as contending that the second change was a relevant change for the purpose of the saving words in the Finance Act 1965, s 61 (9), and the company on the other hand contending that it was not. The concluding words of the decision of the commissioners were as follows:

'In our view the change on 12th April is a "relevant change" within the definition in the Schedule, and as it did not occur before the year 1966/67, Section 17 has no effect in relation to it. The appeal therefore fails in principle, and we leave the figures to be agreed.'

The assessment, I may say, was under Case I of Sch D for 1965-66 in the amount of £70,000, less £70,000 capital allowance; and when the figures were subsequently agreed, they were substantially greater than the figures that I have mentioned.

Throughout the argument I remained unable to perceive why any question whether the second change was or was not a 'relevant change' needed to be argued or decided. Counsel for the Crown in terms accepted that it need not, and I think that in the end counsel for the company, at least in some respects, was not far from saying 'Nolo contendere'. I am not surprised that the commissioners should have decided the point, since it appears to have been strenuously argued before them; but in their phrase 'as the matter was argued before us' (a phrase in substance repeated in their decision) may perhaps be detected supervening doubts on this point. However that may be, I may mention that I was taken on a guided tour of a number of statutory provisions which included the Finance Act 1954, Sch 3, para 1; and this states what 'relevant change' means in that schedule to that Act. The phrase as it occurs in the saving words of the Finance Act 1965, s 61 (9), does not seem to be defined. It may indeed be that the definition in Sch 3 to the Finance Act 1954 applies to the later Act, faute de mieux, but I see no reason to decide more than is necessary for the proper disposal of the case before me. I therefore leave to others the pleasure of examining what is or is not a 'relevant change' in the Finance Act 1965, s 61 (9), pausing merely to wish them joy.

What I must turn to is the point which does arise for decision. This in the main depends on the language of the Finance Act 1954, s 17 (1) and (2). I shall read these subsections:

'(1) A trade carried on by a company, whether alone or in partnership, shall not be treated for any of the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as permanently discontinued, nor a new trade as set up and commenced, by reason of a change in the year 1954-55 or any subsequent year of assessment in the persons engaged in carrying on the trade, if the company is the person or one of the persons so engaged immediately before the change and on or at any time within two years after the change the trade or an interest amounting to not less than a three-fourths share in it belongs to the same persons as the trade or such an interest belonged to at some time within a year before the change.

'(2) The conditions for the foregoing subsection to apply to a change may be satisfied notwithstanding that some other change, prior or subsequent to the first-mentioned change, intervenes between the times taken for the comparison under that subsection, and if they are (or continue to be) satisfied by reference to a time after some subsequent change (but still within two years after the first-mentioned change) the trade shall not be treated for any of the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as permanently discontinued, nor a new trade as set up and commenced, by reason of that subsequent change.'

The subsections can hardly be said to yield their full sweetness at a reading; and I propose to apply the precept 'divide and conquer', a precept which has its lessons for lawyers (and not least draftsmen) as well as for soldiers and politicians. Put generally, s 17 (1) makes certain provisions for a trade carried on by a company. The subsection prevents that trade from being treated for any income tax purposes as being permanently discontinued (or a new trade set up and commenced) by reason of certain changes in that trade. This applies if specified conditions are satisfied; and I will set out the substance of these in tabular form. The conditions may be expressed as follows:

- a (a) The change is made in the year 1954-55 or any subsequent year of assessment.
(b) The change is in the persons engaged in carrying on the trade.
(c) The company is the person (or one of the persons) thus engaged immediately before the change.
(d) On the change, or at any time within two years after it, the trade (or an interest amounting to at least a three-fourths share in it) belongs to the same persons as the trade (or such an interest) belonged at some time within a year before the change.

- I pause merely for emphasis on two points. First, although I need not mention paras (a) and (b) further, para (c) is important; for it confines the subsection to cases where, immediately before the change, the company, with or without others, is the person carrying on the trade. A change from individuals to a company can never be within the subsection, whereas a change from a company to individuals may fall within it. Second, the question of an identity sufficient to invoke para (d) has to be resolved by a comparison of the states of affairs existing at two periods in time. One takes one's standpoint immediately before the moment of change and then looks backward for a year and forward for two years. If at any time during the one-year period there was any state of the trade belonging to persons which has a sufficient identity with any state of the trade belonging to persons existing at any time during the two years, condition (d) is satisfied. The process of looking backward can, of course, be done instanter when the change is made; but the process of looking forward, although it may yield a sufficient identity at once, may instead yield none until some or all of the two years has run. To its inherent Janus-like quality the subsection thus adds Mr Asquith's famous monition 'Wait and see'.
- e I turn to sub-s (2). This really falls into two somewhat disparate parts. The first part seems to me to do little or nothing more than make explicit what is already inherent in sub-s (1). There is nothing in sub-s (1) to suggest that its application will be affected by the occurrence of any other changes in addition to the changes being considered. If all the conditions are satisfied, there is nothing in para (d) in particular which implies that, when sufficient identity has been shown between a state of affairs in the one-year period and the state of affairs in the two-year period, the effect of that identity will or can be negated by other changes having also occurred. Every change is to be examined to see whether it satisfies the conditions of the subsection; and if it does, it has the effect of negating any permanent discontinuance attributed to it. The opening limb of sub-s (2) seems to me to do no more than spell out the irrelevance of any other changes when considering whether a particular change satisfied sub-s (1). The words are:

'The conditions for the foregoing subsection to apply to a change may be satisfied notwithstanding that some other change, prior or subsequent to the first-mentioned change, intervenes between the times taken for the comparison under that subsection'.

- h The second limb, however, is quite different. It is dealing not with the change that is under examination for compliance with sub-s (1), but with some subsequent change; and the subsection makes the substantive provision that where it applies—

- j 'the trade shall not be treated for any of the purposes of the Income Tax Acts as permanently discontinued, nor a new trade as set up and commenced, by reason of that subsequent change.'

To this extent the language is identical with that of sub-s (1). In other words, a change may take either of the two routes to the status of not bringing about a permanent discontinuance of a trade or the setting up of a new trade, one route under sub-s (1) and the other under the second limb of sub-s (2). For the latter to apply, only two conditions have to be satisfied. They may be expressed as follows:

- (i) The conditions for sub-s (1) to apply to a change are satisfied (or continue to be satisfied) by reference to a time after some subsequent change. a
- (ii) That time is still within two years after the change which satisfies sub-s (1).

It is implicit in para (i) that there have been two changes, an earlier change that satisfies sub-s (1) and a subsequent change.

Let me take an example. Suppose a first change from company to partnership; and suppose a second change within two years from partnership back to the same company. The first change satisfies sub-s (1), and so is prevented from working a permanent discontinuance. The second change, however, is incapable of satisfying sub-s (1), for the persons engaged in carrying on the trade immediately before the change were not the company but the partnership. Condition (c) is therefore not satisfied. However, the conditions for the second limb of sub-s (2) to apply are satisfied, and so, by force of that limb, the second change, too, is prevented from working any permanent discontinuance. b

Now in the case before me, the two changes there made are in essence the same as the two changes in the example which I have just mentioned. If the Finance Act 1954 had remained unaffected by the Finance Act 1965, the combined effect of sub-ss (1) and (2) of s 17 of the Finance Act 1954 would have been that each change would have been prevented from effecting any permanent discontinuance. However, the Finance Act 1965 was, of course, enacted, and the question is the effect of s 61 (9) on the second change. It is common ground that the first change, which occurred before the year 1966-67, was prevented by s 17 (1) from operating as a permanent discontinuance and that s 61 (9) of the Finance Act 1965 did not alter this. But the second change did not occur 'before the year 1966-67'; it occurred after that year had begun to run. Accordingly, apart from some subsections irrelevant to the case, s 17 of the Finance Act 1954 'ceased to have effect for any other purpose', and was repealed. No point, I may say, was taken on the date when the Finance Act 1965 was passed (it was 5th August 1965). Since s 17 thus has no effect and is repealed, how can it save the second change from operating as a permanent discontinuance? c

The essence of the company's argument, stripped of any irrelevant foliage relating to 'relevant change', was on the following lines. As s 17 continued to have effect as regards the first change, this meant that, quoad that change, both sub-s (1) and sub-s (2) continued to have effect. The second limb of sub-s (2) relates to 'some subsequent change' (that is, a change subsequent to the first change), and as a sort of appendage to the effect that s 17 had on the first change, its effect on the second change must be preserved. Where s 17 is brought into play by a change before 6th April 1966 the section must operate not only on that change, but also on any subsequent change that may have been made in consequence of that initial change. It would be unreasonable to read the Finance Act 1965 as permitting s 17 to apply to the first change and then, when that change plainly fell within the words 'first-mentioned change' in sub-s (2), preventing the reference in sub-s (2) to the 'subsequent change' from operating in respect of that change. d

Counsel for the company also put some emphasis on the Finance Act 1954, Sch 3, para 7 (3). In this, there is the phrase 'a relevant change to which subsection (1) of the principal section applies (whether or not by virtue of subsection (3))'. 'The principal section' is s 17, and for counsel for the company the significant feature of the phrase was the omission of any reference to sub-s (2). The result, he said, was that the reference to sub-s (1) must by implication embrace the first limb of sub-s (2), although not the second limb, since that took effect only for changes that were not 'relevant changes'. The result, he contended, was to emphasise that the first limb of sub-s (2) was really an appendage to sub-s (1), removing doubt, and that the second limb was needed to make the amplified sub-s (1) effective. In this way, sub-s (2) was to be regarded as continuing to operate in all cases in which sub-s (1) operated. e a I hope that I have not done counsel for the company any injustice in this attempt to state the general lines of his argument. In my judgment, such an argument must fail. The second change in no way inevitably followed on the first change; the second change was one which might or might not have been made, according to the volition of those concerned. The reference in the second limb of s 17 (2) to the 'first-mentioned change' is merely a part of the conditions which have to be satisfied if b the subsequent change is to receive its salvation from permanent discontinuance by virtue of the subsection; and I cannot see how the status of the first change as a change which satisfied the still effective s 17 (1) can mean that the mere reference to it in s 17 (2) will keep alive sub-s (2) in its application to a subsequent change. For all purposes relating to the first change, s 17 stays alive; but when it is sought to apply s 17 (2) to the second change, the Finance Act 1965 states that as respects that second change, s 17 (2) is no more. The second change can thus derive no comfort c from any argument that s 17 (2) can be treated as still alive in its reference to the first change; for in relation to the second change at least, the rest of the subsection is dead, including the operative words which negative a permanent discontinuance.

I should add that the argument based on Sch 3, para 7 (3), to the Finance Act 1954 had subtleties which I fear I may not have savoured to the full; but I am far from convinced that Parliament can have intended any such inferential incorporation as d counsel for the company's argument involved, even if (which I doubt) it produced the beneficial results for which he contended. Expressum facit cessare tacitum; and a draftsman who refers to a change to which sub-s (1) applies 'whether or not by virtue of subsection (3)' can hardly be pictured as having refrained from using the words 'subsections (2) or (3)' in place of 'subsection (3)' in this phrase merely because in his e view it is so obvious that a reference to sub-s (1) must silently include sub-s (2), or, worse still, part but not all of sub-s (2).

It follows that I have reached the same result as the commissioners, although by a somewhat different process of reasoning. Counsel for the company was critical of the grounds on which the commissioners had decided the case; and there seemed to be force in at least part of his criticism. However, I do not need to go into that. All f that I need say is that I dismiss the appeal; and this I do.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Cripps, Harries, Willis & Willis (for the company); Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

K Buckley Edwards Esq Barrister.

Re Armitage's Will Trusts Ellam and another v City and County of Norwich and others

CHANCERY DIVISION

GOULDING J

26th, 27th, 28th OCTOBER 1971

Charity – Charitable trust – Eleemosynary charity – Local authority – Power of authority to accept gifts of property – No power to accept property to be held in trust for an eleemosynary charity – Meaning of eleemosynary charity – Gift by will to local authority on trust to make payments to nursing homes for elderly women – Whether constituting a trust for an eleemosynary charity – Local Government Act 1933, s 268 (1), (3).

By her will the testatrix bequeathed her residuary estate to Sheringham Urban District Council ('the council') and Norwich Corporation instructing her executors to give to those bodies 'equal annual payments of £200 or £300 to nursing homes for elderly women. Preference to be given to those who can prove they saved for old age, but lost savings through natural catastrophes or national affairs beyond their control. Payments to continue as long as capital lasts'. The power of the council to accept and administer gifts of property was contained in s 268 (1)^a of the Local Government Act 1933. That power was however subject to the provision in s 268 (3)^a that the section 'shall not authorise the acceptance by a local authority of property which, when accepted, would be held in trust...for an eleemosynary charity'. It was contended that the council had power to receive the gift since it was not a gift for the relief of poverty and therefore did not constitute an eleemosynary charity within the meaning of s 268 (3).

Held – The expression 'eleemosynary charity' covered all charities directed to the relief of individual distress, whether due to poverty, age, sickness or other similar afflictions; accordingly the council had no power to accept the gift (see p 711 g, post).

Notes

For gifts of property to local authorities, see 18 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 373, 374, para 711.

For the Local Government Act 1933, s 268, see 19 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 551.

Cases referred to in judgment

A-G v Calvert (1857) 23 Beav 248, 26 LJCh 682, 29 LTOS 61, 21 JP 371, 8 Digest (Repl) 423, 1135.

A-G v St John's Hospital, Bath (1876) 2 ChD 554, 45 LJCh 420, 34 LT 563, 8 Digest (Repl) 490, 2021.

Re Lawton, Gartside v A-G [1936] 3 All ER 378, 8 Digest (Repl) 451, 1471.

Re Lysaght (decd), Hill v Royal College of Surgeons of England [1965] 2 All ER 888, [1966] Ch 191, [1965] 3 WLR 391, Digest (Cont Vol B) 77, 1240a.

Re Perry Almshouses, Re Ross' Charity [1899] 1 Ch 21, 68 LJCh 66, 79 LT 366, 8 Digest (Repl) 490, 2029.

Adjourned summons

By a summons dated 16th September 1969 the plaintiffs, Frank Edgar Armitage Ellam and Emily Rita Ellam, the executors of Lilian Armitage, deceased, sought, inter alia, the determination of the court, inter alia, whether, on the true construction of two paper writings marked 'A' and 'B' as admitted to probate ('the will') the first and

^a Section 268 is set out at p 710 g to j, post

- a* second defendants, the City and County of Norwich ('the corporation') and Sheringham Urban District Council respectively, were entitled to annuities under the provisions of the will and, if so, whether the corporation or the council had any statutory or other authority to hold and/or apply moneys on charitable trusts, and whether the trusts of the will constituted the trusts of an 'eleemosynary charity' within s 268 of the Local Government Act 1933. There were also joined, May Ellam, as third defendant, the next-of-kin entitled on intestacy, and the Attorney-General. The facts are set out in the judgment.

J H G Sunnucks for the plaintiffs.

Gavin Lightman for the corporation.

G C Raffety for the council.

C H McCall for the third defendant.

- c* N C H Browne-Wilkinson for the Attorney-General.

GOULDING J. I have previously given part of my judgment on the will of this testatrix, Lilian Armitage. The effect of what I have already said is that the whole residuary estate of the testatrix is bequeathed for the purposes set out in the following terms:

- d* 'From what money remains, my executors will give to Norwich and Sheringham Town Councils, equal annual payments of £200 or £300 to nursing homes for elderly women. Preference to be given to those who can prove they saved for old age, but lost savings through natural catastrophes or national affairs beyond their control. Payments to continue as long as capital lasts.'

- e* It is not disputed that the provision of nursing homes, or places in nursing homes, for elderly women is a charitable purpose in law.

As to the machinery of the gift, it is in my judgment clear that the testatrix did not intend the town councils to receive the whole capital of her residuary estate at once. She contemplated what she calls 'equal annual payments of £200 or £300' to them. Whether the word 'equal' is intended to indicate equality between the two f councils or equality as between one annual payment and that in the next or preceding year, or equality of grants for the benefit of individual elderly women is obscure.

I do not propose to attempt a choice between the possible expositions of the detailed intention of the testatrix. I think myself that she intended her executors to have some discretion as to the amounts of payments out of income, supplemented if necessary by capital. All this is very uncertain, but as the purpose is charitable g any uncertainty of machinery can if necessary be cured by a scheme.

- Questions arise, however, as to the power of the two councils to play the part assigned to them by the testatrix. I will take Norwich first. The expression 'Norwich Town Council' has been tacitly accepted by all parties as designating the Norwich Corp'n ('the corporation'). That body claims the necessary power to take and administer the annual payments given to it, first as a corporation incorporated by charter, and alternatively under the Norwich Corporation Act 1933, s 115. It will be convenient to read that section at once. It stands alone between sections dealing with quite different matters. It contains three subsections. The section reads:
- h*

- j* '(1) Subject to the provisions of this section the Corporation may accept hold and administer any gift of property whether real or personal for any public purpose connected with the city and may execute any works (including works of maintenance or improvement) incidental to or consequential on the exercise of the powers conferred by this section and where the purposes of the gift are purposes for which the Corporation are empowered to expend money out of the general rate fund or the general rate they may subject to any condition or restriction attaching to such power expend money out of the general rate fund or the general rate in the execution of such works in relation to the subject-matter of the gift.'

'(2) This section shall not extend to property relating to affairs of the church within the meaning of the Local Government Act 1894 or to an ecclesiastical charity within the meaning of that Act. a

'(3) Accounts of the income and expenditure of the Corporation under this section shall be kept by the chief financial officer and shall be made up and audited as part of the general accounts of the Corporation.'

As I have said, the corporation submits that it has power to accept and administer the gift of the testatrix either by virtue of its capacity as a chartered corporation or under the section which I have just read. b

The answer made by counsel for the third defendant is first of all that if the corporation had at common law unrestricted power to hold and administer trust property, most of the section in the local Act would not have been necessary. I do not think that he can say that the whole section would have been unnecessary because of the later part of sub-s (1) dealing with subventions from the general rate fund or the general rate. In relation to that contention of counsel it is important to remember that the preamble to the Act contains the recitals usually placed in local Acts. After dealing with a number of specific matters which do not affect s 115 the preamble continues: 'And whereas it is expedient that the other provisions contained in this Act be enacted: And whereas the purposes of this Act cannot be effected without the authority of Parliament . . .' So, says counsel, the Act itself makes one wonder very much whether the corporation previously had the powers given by s 115. c

Then as to the section itself, it is, counsel for the third defendant submits, that the purposes of the will of the testatrix are not within the phrase any public purpose connected with the city' contained in s 115. The testatrix's objects, it is submitted, are in the nature of a private charity and do not fall within the language of the local Act. I reject the latter contention. In my judgment a bequest by a testator for the benefit of a class of the inhabitants of the city, such as elderly women, at any rate if it is legally charitable, constitutes a public purpose within the meaning of the section. The corporation therefore has under the local Act of 1933 the necessary power to do what the testatrix contemplated, and it is unnecessary for me to pursue the question regarding its powers apart from statute. d

The Urban District Council of Sheringham ('the council') is in a more difficult position. Its powers can only be statutory, and it has found only one enactment at all in point, that is s 268 of the Local Government Act 1933. It contains four subsections. The section provides: e

'(1) Subject to the provisions of this section a local authority may accept, hold and administer any gift of property, whether real or personal, for any local public purpose, or for the benefit of the inhabitants of the area or of some part thereof, and may execute any works (including works of maintenance or improvement) incidental to or consequential on the exercise of the powers conferred by this section. f

'(2) Where the purposes of the gift are purposes for which the local authority are empowered to expend money raised from a rate, they may, subject to any condition or restriction attaching to the exercise of that power, defray expenditure incurred in the exercise of the powers conferred by the last preceding subsection out of money so raised. g

'(3) This section shall not authorise the acceptance by a local authority of property which, when accepted, would be held in trust for an ecclesiastical charity or for an eleemosynary charity. h

'(4) Nothing in this section shall affect any powers exercisable by a local authority under or by virtue of the Education Acts, 1921 to 1933.' i a The council relies on that subsection and says that the powers conferred by sub-s (1) are not taken away by sub-s (3). On the latter point two alternative arguments have been presented. First, it is submitted that sub-s (3) when it speaks of property which would be held in trust for certain types of charity is concerned only with the holding of permanent endowments and does not forbid the receipt and administration of annual payments intended for immediate or early application. That contention is in my judgment inconsistent with the literal meaning of the words employed by b Parliament and I find nothing in the context to justify a modified interpretation.

As far as sub-s (1) goes, that subsection would in my judgment if it stood alone empower an urban district council to accept a gift of the character here in question.

Secondly, counsel for the council says, with the vigorous support of counsel for the Attorney-General, that the trust in the present case is not an 'eleemosynary charity'. I have heard a great deal of able argument on the word 'eleemosynary'. As counsel have shown, that adjective has been used with a variety of meanings in different legal contexts. The particular term 'eleemosynary charity' is not a term of art with c a judicially established definition. Nor has any earlier legislation been discovered that might help to explain its meaning in the Local Government Act 1933.

I am urged to give the word the narrowest possible meaning because it is said s 268 (3) is a disabling subsection. The suggested narrowest meaning is charities for the relief of poverty. However, s 268 as a whole is an enabling not a disabling section d and I do not think I ought to strain the language of a particular subsection in either direction. It appears to me that the correct principle of construction is to read the whole of s 268 and then see what, on a fair interpretation of the language without pressing it either way, was the intention of Parliament. Subsection (3) itself shows that for the purposes of the Act not all charities are eleemosynary, nor in general are ecclesiastical charities, which are defined by the Act, eleemosynary, although e possibly some charities may have both attributes. However, the context does not help further towards the definition of eleemosynary.

How then am I to ascertain the proper and natural meaning of the adjective in its place? I must have regard to the etymological origin of the word. It is an adjective derived from the Greek word which, through Latin, has come into our language as 'alms'. I also have regard to the use of the word by learned judges in certain f charity cases which have been cited, namely, *A-G v Calvert*¹, *A-G v St John's Hospital, Bath*², and *Re Perry Almshouses*³. Can I also derive any assistance from the known or presumed intention of the legislature in inserting the words in the 1933 Act? Nothing has been adduced before me to show what the mischief to be corrected was. It is submitted that I am not at liberty to speculate on the point, and I do not propose to do so.

g Having, as I have said, had regard to the derivation of the word and to the way in which it has been used in the judgments that have been cited, and looking at the context, I come to the conclusion that the term 'eleemosynary charity' covers all charities directed to the relief of individual distress, whether due to poverty, age, sickness or other similar individual afflictions. Whether the term extends further it is not necessary for me to decide, and I express no opinion on the point.

h Even if I had agreed with counsel for the Attorney-General in confining the term to the relief of poverty, I should still have doubted his conclusion, for it seems to me that the gift as a whole, including the preference expressed, for women 'who can prove they saved for old age, but lost savings through' causes beyond their control, shows that the purpose of the testatrix was not merely to benefit elderly women but to help elderly women who need financial help. Even if the preference is merely i a preference and there is no implied requirement of poverty as regards candidates who do not get in under the preference, it would still seem to me that the object if not purely for the relief of poverty is at least in part for the relief of poverty, and therefore eleemosynary even on the construction adopted by counsel for the Attorney-General. Both on etymological grounds and on judicial authority an almshouse is an eleemosynary charity par excellence, and I think it would be arbitrary and fanciful to draw a line between an almshouse and the particular scheme of this testatrix. a

1 (1857) 23 Beav 248

2 (1876) 2 Ch D 554

3 [1899] 1 Ch D 21

What then is the consequence of the inability of the council to receive the payments intended by the testatrix and deal with them in accordance with her wishes? Counsel for the third defendant says with truth that in certain cases the personality of the chosen trustee is essential to a donor's charitable intention. In such cases if the trustee is dead, or disclaims the gift, or is incapable for any reason of acting, the gift fails, since there is no general, or no more general, charitable intention to justify application of the subject-matter cy-près. For that proposition counsel relied on *Re Lawton*⁴, and *Re Lysaght (decd)*⁵. I suppose, however, that so narrowly circumscribed an intention is unusual. Even in *Re Lysaght (decd)*⁵, where the facts were very strong, it was apparently only the existence of a special recital in the will which led the learned judge to his conclusion⁶. b

In my judgment the intention of the testatrix in the present case was not so restricted as counsel for the third defendant contends. I find from the language of document B, forming part of the will, that the mind of the testatrix was directed essentially to the relief of elderly women. Although she no doubt had much confidence in the local authorities, I cannot infer that her whole purpose was conditional on their co-operation. It follows that no part of the residuary gift fails. c

Determination accordingly. d

Solicitors: Wild, Collins & Crosse, agents for Hansell, Stevenson & Co, Norwich (for the plaintiffs); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co (for the corporation); Curwen, Carter & Evans (for the council); Theodore Goddard & Co (for the third defendant); Treasury Solicitor. e

Richard J Soper Esq Barrister.

Stevens v London Borough of Bromley

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION f

SALMON, EDMUND DAVIES AND STAMP LJ

11th, 15th, 16th NOVEMBER, 13th DECEMBER 1971

Town and country planning – Enforcement notice – Validity – Owner and occupier notices coming into effect at different dates – Occupier – Licensee as occupier – Owner of caravan site – Caravan dweller residing in caravan as permanent home – Weekly payments by caravan dweller to site owner for use of pitch – Caravan dweller licensee of pitch – Copies of notice served on site owner and caravan dweller on different dates – Whether caravan dweller occupier of part of site – Town and Country Planning Act 1962, s 45 (3) (a). g

In 1964 the plaintiff, whose business was that of operating caravan sites, purchased several acres of land, part of which was an authorised caravan site. The remainder of the land ('the site') had no planning permission for caravans. The plaintiff, apparently under the impression that the site had existing user rights, began to develop it as a caravan site. He put down a road and hard standings and, in February 1965, the first caravan arrived. W took up residence in it. Before the end of September 1965 there were 10 or 11 large caravans on the site. The caravans were the permanent homes of their owners and many of them made gardens on the small plots of land surrounding their caravans. W marked off the boundary of his plot with large rocks. Main water and electricity were laid on to each caravan and drains were connected which carried the sewage from each caravan to a common cesspool. The caravan h

⁴ [1936] 3 All ER 378

⁵ [1965] 2 All ER 888, [1966] Ch D 191

⁶ [1965] 2 All ER at 895, [1966] Ch D at 205 j

- a owners, who made weekly payments to the plaintiff for the use of their plots, were licensees not tenants of the plaintiff. Their licences could not be revoked nor could their caravans be removed from the site unless one month's notice in writing was given. On 24th September 1965 the defendants, the planning authority for the district, issued an enforcement notice requiring the plaintiff, pursuant to s 45^a of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962, to demolish the road and hard standings, to discontinue the use of the land as a caravan site, and to restore the land to its condition before the development took place. A copy of the notice was served on the plaintiff on 27th September. Copies were also served on W and a number of other caravan owners on other dates. The plaintiff claimed that the caravan owners were 'occupiers' of their pitches within the meaning of s 45 (3) (a) of the 1962 Act and that since copies of the enforcement notice had not been served on the plaintiff and the caravan owners on the same day the notice was, on the basis of the decision in Bambury v London Borough of Hounslow^b, invalid. (For present purposes it was accepted that Bambury's case was correctly decided.)
- c

Held (Stamp LJ dissenting) – The enforcement notice was invalid for the following reasons—

- (i) it was a fair inference from the provisions of ss 45-47^c of the 1962 Act that the intention of the legislature was to ensure that anyone who might be prejudiced by an enforcement notice should be served with it; the fact that the caravan owners were not tenants of the plaintiff but licensees did not necessarily preclude them from being entitled to receive an enforcement notice; in appropriate circumstances licensees were capable of being occupiers within the meaning of s 45 (3) (a) (see p 718 b c and f and p 722 c to e, post);
- d
- (ii) having regard, inter alia, to the length of time during which W had been on his plot on the site, and the nature of his licence to be there, W at least was an occupier within s 45 (3) (a) (see p 718 f, p 719 c, p 721 b and p 722 f, post).
- e

Dictum of Viscount Cave in Madrasa Anjuman Islamia of Kholwad v Municipal Council of Johannesburg [1922] 1 AC at 504 applied.

Munnich v Godstone Rural District Council [1966] 1 All ER 930 distinguished.

- f Decision of Plowman J [1971] 2 All ER 331 affirmed.

Per Salmon and Stamp LJ. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of s 45 (3) must be construed separately; accordingly for a person to be an occupier within the meaning of s 45 (3) (a) it is not necessary that he should have, within the meaning of s 45 (3) (b), an 'interest' (i.e. a legal or equitable interest) in land (see p 717 h and j and p 723 e to g, post).

g Notes

For validity of enforcement notices, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 344-347, paras 447, 448; 351, 352, para 453, and for cases on the subject, see 45 Digest (Repl) 350-354, 91-101.

For service of enforcement notices, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 332-334, para 438, and for cases on the subject, see 45 Digest (Repl) 349, 350, 87-90.

- h For the Town and Country Planning Act 1962, ss 45, 46 and 47, see 42 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn) 1015, 1017, 1019.

Section 45 has been repealed, and replaced by s 15 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1968.

Cases referred to in judgments

- j Bambury v London Borough of Hounslow [1966] 2 All ER 532, [1966] 2 QB 204, [1966] 2 WLR 1294, 130 JP 314, Digest (Cont Vol B) 693, 90a.
Field Place Caravan Park Ltd v Harding [1966] 3 All ER 247, [1966] 2 QB 484, [1966] 3 WLR 198, 130 JP 397, Digest (Cont Vol B) 611, 128b.

a Section 45, so far as material, is set out at p 716 e, post

b [1966] 2 All ER 532

c Sections 46 and 47, so far as material, are set out at p 716 g to p 717 a, post

Madrasa Anjuman Islamia of Kholwad v Municipal Council of Johannesburg [1922] 1 AC 500. a Munnich v Godstone Rural District Council [1966] 1 All ER 930, [1966] 1 WLR 427, 130 JP 202, Digest (Cont Vol B) 472, 292b.

Shell-Mex and BP Ltd v Manchester Garages Ltd [1971] 1 All ER 841, [1971] 1 WLR 612.

Appeal

This was an appeal by the defendants, the London Borough of Bromley, from the judgment of Plowman J, given on 8th March 1971 and reported [1971] 2 All ER 331, whereby he declared that the enforcement notice served on the plaintiff, Harry John Stevens, and on other persons requiring them to demolish certain roads and hard standings and to discontinue the use of land specified therein as a caravan site was invalid and of no effect. The facts are set out in the judgment of Salmon LJ. b

Graham Eyre QC and Anthony Dinkin for the defendants. c

Michael Albery QC and Michael Essayan for the plaintiff.

Cur adv vult

13th December. The following judgments were read.

SALMON LJ. The plaintiff's business consists of owning and operating a number of caravan sites. In 1964 he bought $7\frac{3}{4}$ acres of land at Berry's Green Road, Single Street, near Biggin Hill in Kent. Three acres of this land was admittedly an authorised caravan site. This case concerns the remaining $4\frac{3}{4}$ acres which I will call 'the site'. There is no planning permission in existence for its use as a caravan site. The plaintiff, however, apparently under the impression that it had existing user rights, began to develop it as a caravan site. He put down a road and hard standings, and in February 1965 the first caravan appeared. Mr Bernard Wicks took up residence in it and he still resides there. Before the end of September 1965 there were 10 or 11 caravans on the site all being used as residences by their occupants. These were large caravans each with about 400 square feet of floor space, comprising separate bedrooms, a living room, a bathroom and w.c. Main water and electricity was laid on to each caravan and drains were connected which carried the sewage from each caravan to a cesspool serving the whole site. Most of the caravan dwellers made gardens on the small plots of land in the middle of which their caravans stood. The caravans were all bought by their occupiers from the plaintiff. No caravan was ever moved from one plot on the site to another and it would have been difficult if not impossible for the owner of any caravan to find any place to accommodate it were he to move it from the site. d

It is now common ground that the caravan dwellers were not tenants but each was the licensee of the plot on which the caravan stood, that each paid the plaintiff £1.75 a week 'rent' and that his licence could not be revoked nor could he remove his caravan from the site save by one month's notice in writing. The caravans were all used as permanent homes. The plaintiff's policy was not to serve a notice to quit on a caravan dweller unless he failed to pay his rent or made a nuisance of himself. The evidence was that no such notice had been served on any caravan dweller on this site. e

The question which arises for decision in this appeal is whether the caravan dwellers were occupiers of their respective plots and in particular whether Mr Bernard Wicks was the 'occupier' of the plot on which his caravan stood within the meaning of that word as used in s 45 (3) (a) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962. If a local planning authority serves an enforcement notice under that section it must be served on all the occupiers as well as on the owner of the site to which it relates, otherwise the notice is invalid. f

The defendants, as the local planning authority, issued an enforcement notice dated 24th September 1965, the material particulars of which read as follows: g a . . . 2. It appears to the [defendants] who are the local planning authority that the land has been developed by: (a) the carrying out thereon of civil engineering operations, namely the construction of a road and hard standings for caravans, and (b) the making of a material change in the use of the land to use as a caravan site by the stationing thereon of caravans for the purposes of human habitation without the planning permission required in respect thereof under Part III of the Town & Country Planning Act 1962 3. The [defendants] consider it expedient b having regard to the provisions of the development plan and to all other material considerations to serve this notice. Now THEREFORE pursuant to Section 45 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962 the [defendants] HEREBY REQUIRE you within two calendar months from the date on which this notice takes effect: (1) To demolish the said road and hard standings and remove from the land all materials arising from such demolition (2) To discontinue the use of the land c as a caravan site (3) To restore the land to its condition before the development took place. THIS NOTICE SHALL TAKE EFFECT, subject to the Provisions of Section 46 (3) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962, at the expiration of a period of thirty days from the service thereof upon you DATED this 24th day of September 1965 [signed by the] Deputy Town Clerk, Town Hall, Bromley, Kent. NOTE: d Your attention is drawn to the rights of appeal against an enforcement notice contained in Section 46 of the Act, a copy of this Section and other relevant Sections of the Act are annexed hereto.'

A copy of this notice describing the plaintiff as the owner and occupier of land at the site was served on the plaintiff on 27th September. A copy of the notice describing Mr Bernard Wicks as the occupier of land at the site was served on him on 25th e September. These dates are important as will presently appear.

The plaintiff in pursuance of his rights under s 46 of the 1962 Act appealed to the Minister against the enforcement notice on a number of grounds but did not then suggest that the enforcement notice was invalid. On 5th October 1966, after a public f local inquiry had been held, the Minister dismissed the plaintiff's appeal save that he varied the enforcement notice by providing that it should be complied with within six instead of two calendar months from the date on which it became effective.

The plaintiff then started the present proceedings in the Chancery Division claiming a declaration that the enforcement notice was invalid. He relied on the fact that whilst the copy of the enforcement notice was served on him on 27th September, g copies were served on other caravan dwellers on different dates and, in particular, the copy served on Mr Bernard Wicks was served as early as two days before 27th September, so that that enforcement notice became effective on different dates so far as the plaintiff and Mr Wicks and the other caravan dwellers were concerned. This, he argued, made the enforcement notice invalid on the authority of *Bambury v h London Borough of Hounslow*¹. And so, strangely enough, it does. Indeed counsel for the defendants conceded that the enforcement notice would have been invalid had it been necessary to serve it on Mr Wicks and the other caravan dwellers. He contended, however, that since none of them was an occupier none had any right to have the notice served on him. The learned judge² held that Mr Wicks and the other caravan dwellers were occupiers entitled to have the enforcement notice served on them and that as copies of it were served on them on different dates the notice was invalid. He accordingly made the declaration for which the plaintiff prayed. From that decision the defendants now appeal.

i *Bambury's case*¹, being a decision of the Divisional Court, was binding on the learned judge² but it is not binding on this court. The defendants have, however, accepted it in this court as correctly stating the law. During the course of the hearing of this appeal I intimated that I should like to hear argument whether *Bambury's case*¹ ought to be followed. It is perhaps not a very compelling authority because the respondent there conceded the point that an enforcement notice in this form is invalid if copies of it are served on the owners and occupiers on different dates. Lord Parker CJ considered, as I do, that the point was highly technical and completely devoid of merit. He went no further than to express the view³ that 'it may, nevertheless, be a good point'. Since the point had been conceded, he proceeded on the basis that it was a good point and then disposed of the argument that the defect in the notice had been cured. Counsel for the defendants accepted the underlying assumption in *Bambury's case*⁴ as being correct in law. Counsel for the plaintiff told us that he had not come here prepared to argue the contrary, and that if he was to do so, he would need an adjournment. Counsel for the defendants did not want an adjournment nor wish to question *Bambury's case*⁴. He asked us to deal with this appeal on the basis that *Bambury's case*⁴ was unexceptionable. In those circumstances, we thought that we must for the purposes of this appeal, but only for those purposes, make the same assumption as did Lord Parker CJ in *Bambury's case*³ itself. Having heard no argument on the matter I express no view about that case. I am very anxious however that, should the point arise for consideration in the future, our decision in this case shall not be regarded as an authority approving the underlying assumption in *Bambury's case*⁴. The point so far as this court is concerned is still wide open.

1 [1966] 2 All ER 532, [1966] 2 QB 204.

2 [1971] 2 All ER 331, [1971] 2 WLR 1291.

I will now consider the point on which this appeal turns, namely, whether Mr Wicks and the other caravan dwellers were occupiers of the plots on which their caravans stood. It would be enough to support the learned judge's⁵ finding if only Mr Wicks were an occupier.

It is necessary to set out the relevant sections of the 1962 Act. Section 45 (3) provides as follows:

'Where the local planning authority serve an enforcement notice, the notice—(a) shall be served on the owner and occupier of the land to which it relates, and (b) may, if the authority think fit, also be served on any other person having an interest in that land, being an interest which in their opinion, is materially affected by the notice.'

Section 46, so far as material, provides as follows:

'(1) A person on whom an enforcement notice is served, or any other person having an interest in the land, may, at any time within the period specified in the notice as the period at the end of which it is to take effect, appeal to the Minister against the notice on any of the following grounds, that is to say [then the grounds are set out (which I need not read) on which an appeal may be brought] . . .

'(3) Where an appeal is brought under this section, the enforcement notice shall be of no effect pending the final determination or withdrawal of the appeal.'

Section 47 (1) deals with the penalties which may be imposed on an owner for non-compliance with the enforcement notice. Section 47 (5) provides for penalties which may be imposed on occupiers (amongst others) for non-compliance with an enforcement notice. It provides as follows:

'Where, by virtue of an enforcement notice, a use of land is required to be discontinued, or any conditions or limitations are required to be complied with in respect of a use of land or in respect of the carrying out of operations thereon, then if any person uses the land or causes or permits it to be used, or carries out those operations or causes or permits them to be carried out, in contravention

³ [1966] 2 All ER at 535, [1966] 2 QB at 213

⁴ [1966] 2 All ER 532, [1966] 2 QB 204

⁵ [1971] 2 All ER 331, [1971] 2 WLR 1291

a of the notice, he shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds; and if the use is continued after the conviction, he shall be guilty of a further offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds for every day on which the use is so continued.'

Section 177 provides as follows:

b '(1) Subject to the next following subsection, the validity of an enforcement notice which has been served under Part IV of this Act on the owner and occupier of the land shall not, except by way of an appeal under Part IV of this Act, be questioned in any proceedings whatsoever on any of the grounds specified in paragraphs (b) to (e) of subsection (1) of section forty-six of this Act.

c '(2) The preceding subsection shall not apply to proceedings brought under subsection (5) of section forty-seven of this Act against a person who—(a) has held an interest in the land since before the enforcement notice was served under Part IV of this Act, and (b) did not have the enforcement notice served on him thereunder, and (c) did not appeal against that notice under Part IV of this Act.

d '(3) The validity of a notice which has been served under section fifty-two of this Act on the owner and occupier of the building to which the notice relates shall not, except by way of an appeal under Part IV of this Act, be questioned in any proceedings whatsoever on the grounds that the works to which the notice relates were not, or were not wholly, works in contravention of subsection (1) of section thirty-three of this Act.

e '(4) Subject to the next following subsection, the validity of a notice which has been served under section thirty-six of this Act on the owner and occupier of the land shall not, except by way of an appeal under Part IV of this Act, be questioned in any proceedings whatsoever on any of the grounds specified in paragraphs (a) to (c) of subsection (1) of section fifty-seven of this Act.

f '(5) The last preceding subsection shall not apply to proceedings brought under section fifty-six of this Act against a person on whom the notice referred to in that subsection was not served, but who has held an interest in the land since before that notice was served on the owner and occupier of the land, if he did not appeal against the notice under Part IV of this Act.

g '(6) The validity of a notice purporting to be an enforcement notice shall not depend on whether any non-compliance to which the notice relates was a non-compliance with conditions, or with limitations, or with both; and any reference in such a notice to non-compliance with conditions or limitations (whether both expressions are used in the notice or only one of them) shall be construed as a reference to non-compliance with conditions, or with limitations, or both with conditions and limitations, as the case may require.'

h Counsel for the defendants has argued (1) that the interest referred to in s 45 (3) (b) is a legal or equitable interest in land and (2) that it follows, by necessary inference, that the occupiers referred to in s 45 (3) (a) must also have a legal or equitable interest in the land. I agree that the interest referred to in s 45 (3) (b) is confined to a legal or equitable interest and does not include an interest in the loose or colloquial sense of someone being interested in the land. I think that this view is underlined by the language of s 177 which speaks about a person 'who has held an interest in the land'—language which in my view is appropriate only in relation to a legal or equitable interest. There can be no doubt that the kind of interest referred to in s 177 is the same as that referred to in s 45 (3) (b). I cannot, however, accept the argument that it follows from this that a person to be an occupier within the meaning of that word in s 45 (3) (a) must also have a legal or equitable interest in the land. The substance of s 45 (3) (b) was first incorporated into the town and country planning legislation by s 35 (2) of the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960 which added to s 23 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1947 the words now appearing in s 45 (3) (b) of the 1962 Act. Had the legislature intended to alter the meaning of the word 'occupier' as it appeared in s 23 (1) of the 1947 Act, surely it would have done so in far plainer language. Accordingly in my judgment the word 'occupier' in the 1962 Act means what it meant in the 1947 Act and its meaning cannot be affected by the reference to a legal or equitable interest in s 45 (3) (b).

Counsel for the plaintiff rightly concedes that there are many circumstances in which a licensee would not be an 'occupier' within the meaning of s 45 (3) (a). On the other hand he contends that the fact that a man is a licensee does not necessarily preclude him from also being an occupier entitled to be served with an enforcement notice under that section; whether or not he is an occupier depends not on his status vis-à-vis the landlord but on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. I agree with that contention. On the facts of this case which I have recited at the beginning of this judgment, it would, in my view be an affront to common sense no less than to ordinary justice to hold that Mr Wicks was not occupying the plot of land on which his caravan stood. No one, except, perhaps, a lawyer could doubt that he was in occupation of that land. Nor is there anything in the town and country planning legislation which suggests that the law points to any contrary conclusion.

'The word "occupy" is a word of uncertain meaning. Sometimes it denotes legal possession in the technical sense . . . At other times "occupation" denotes nothing more than physical presence in a place for a substantial period of time . . . Its precise meaning in any particular statute . . . must depend on the purpose for which, and the context in which, it is used.'

The town and country planning legislation makes anyone guilty of a criminal offence who fails to comply with the requirements of an enforcement notice. Compliance with such a notice may also, in some cases (as I shall show) involve abandoning home and business. The legislation, however, clearly intended to afford a measure of protection to an occupier by ensuring that he should be given adequate warning of the enforcement notice and the opportunity of appealing against it before he could be convicted of a failure to comply with it. I can find no ground for supposing that the legislature intended to deny that protection to anyone in Mr Wicks's position by excluding him from the category of occupier. His occupation of his caravan and the plot on which it stood was far from transient; they were his permanent home. In my view his occupation was exclusive. Even if the plaintiff had some measure of occupation in relation to the unit, Mr Wicks's occupation was clearly paramount. These are all factors to be taken into account in deciding whether or not a licensee is an 'occupier' within the meaning of that word in s 45 (3) (a). In each case it is a question of fact and degree. There may well be many cases in which it is difficult to decide on which side of the line it falls. On the present facts I have no doubt but that Mr Wicks is well on the right side of the line.

There can be no doubt that the caravan and the plot on which it stood together formed one unit of which Mr Wicks was in occupation and in respect of which he was therefore liable to pay rates: *Field Place Caravan Park Ltd v Harding*⁷. This last factor may not be of much importance but it would, at any rate, be odd if Mr Wicks enjoyed a sufficient degree of occupation to make him liable as a ratepayer and yet not enough to make him an occupier entitled to the protection to which I have referred. Counsel for the defendants concedes, as he must, that had there been a tenancy agreement in the same terms as the licence, Mr Wicks would have been an occupier within the meaning of s 45 (3) (a) (ibid). If that tenancy agreement had contained, as it might have done, an absolute prohibition against assigning or sub-letting a there would have been no practical difference between Mr Wicks's position as it might then have been, and as it is now. I cannot accept that the legislature can have intended to give protection in the one case and not in the other. Nor can I see any incongruity in an occupier who has no legal or equitable interest being entitled to be served with an enforcement notice whilst there is no obligation to serve such a notice say on a mortgagee who does enjoy such an interest. An enforcement notice has a much more intimate connection with and impact on a person in the position of b Mr Wicks than it would have on a mortgagee. I of course recognise that since Mr Wicks and the other caravan dwellers were in fact served with copies of the enforcement notice they have not been prejudiced and have no complaint. I recognise too that the plaintiff has no merit since the case rests solely on the highly technical point arising out of *Bambury's case*⁸, which in turn depends on whether Mr Wicks was entitled to be served with the enforcement notice. The general importance, c however, of the principle that the licensee in the position of Mr Wicks is entitled to be served, in my view, far transcends the importance of the impact which it happens to have on the merits of this particular case.

⁶ Madrasa Anjuman Islamia of Kholwad v Municipal Council of Johannesburg [1922] 1 AC 500 at 504 per Viscount Cave

⁷ [1966] 3 All ER 247, [1966] 2 QB 484

It has been pointed out that of course a caravan dweller is only a solitary example of a great multitude of different kinds of people to whom the town and country planning legislation applies. Take the case of A who carries on business in a shop d and lives with his family in a flat above it. He has a licence to do so, in precisely the same terms as Mr Wicks's licence, from B, the owner of the whole premises. The agreement between A and B makes it plain that it is not a tenancy agreement and that A is being granted no legal or equitable title in the premises but only a licence to occupy them at a weekly rent, determinable by one month's notice in writing. Assuming it was possible, as it might be, to persuade the court that this was in truth e a licence, then if the defendants' contentions are correct it follows that the local planning authority could serve an effective notice in respect of those premises without being under any obligation to serve notice of it on A for A, being a licensee, could not be an occupier within the meaning of that word in the 1962 Act. He could thus be forced to leave his home and business and convicted of a criminal offence without f being given any opportunity of challenging the validity of the steps taken by the local authority to effect this end, and indeed without knowing anything about those steps.

Counsel for the defendants naturally relies strongly on *Munnich v Godstone Rural District Council*⁹. In that case the plaintiff with a man called Mr Taras bought 1½ g acres of land consisting of a field with a bungalow on it. He had unlawfully allowed four individuals to stand caravans in the field. The local planning authority issued an enforcement notice. One copy was served on the plaintiff and Mr Taras describing them as the owners of the site; one copy was served on each of the three remaining caravan owners (one of the four having departed) describing each of them as the 'occupier' of the land and these three copies were also served on the plaintiff and Mr Taras. The report does not state the degree of transience of the three so-called h occupiers in the field with their caravans, but I seem to recollect, and I am fortified in this recollection by the judgment of Danckwerts LJ¹⁰, that they were very much birds of passage. The point taken by the plaintiff was that the enforcement notice was invalid because the copy addressed to him and Mr Taras described them only as owners whilst the copy served on each of the three individuals was addressed to each as the occupier only of the piece of land on which his caravan was standing for the time being and therefore no notice had been served on the occupier or occupiers of j the whole site. This court decided that as the plaintiff and Mr Taras were the occupiers of the whole site and the notice had been served on them, it mattered not that it described them only as the owners. It still constituted a good notice on them as owners and occupiers. a

8 [1966] 2 All ER 532, [1966] 2 QB 204

9 [1966] 1 All ER 930, [1966] 1 WLR 427

10 [1966] 1 All ER at 935, [1966] 1 WLR at 437

This court also found that none of the four individuals to whom I have referred was an occupier within the meaning of that word in s 23 of the 1947 Act, and nor were they on the facts of that case. It is true that there is a passage in the judgment of Lord Denning MR¹¹ which if taken literally could be read as meaning what I believe was never argued, namely that no caravan dweller who is a licensee can ever in any circumstances be an 'occupier' within the meaning of that word in s 23 of the 1947 Act. I do not think, however, that Lord Denning MR intended to lay down anything more than that a caravan dweller with a licence of the kind granted in that particular case could never be an 'occupier', indeed that a licensee could never be an 'occupier' unless the licence which he held put him, from a practical point of view, in much the same position as he would have been under a tenancy agreement. If, which I doubt, the judgment went further than that, then in my respectful view it went further than was necessary for deciding that case. I think it is plain from the report that both the other members of the court took the view that there can be circumstances in which a licensee is an occupier. I still hold that view and consider, for the reasons I have already indicated that the present is a classic example of such a case. b
c

It follows that I entirely agree with Plowman J's judgment¹² in the court below and would accordingly dismiss this appeal. d

EDMUND DAVIES LJ. Expressing himself as not satisfied that the relationship of landlord and tenant was ever created between the defendants and the caravan dwellers on the site with which we are concerned in this appeal, the learned trial judge¹² held that the latter were licensees. There was an abundance of evidence to justify this finding and it has been accepted before us. But what is in dispute is whether that finding concludes the matter in favour of the defendants. It is contended for the plaintiff that, even though the caravanners were licensees, they were also occupiers within the meaning of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962 and, as such, the provisions of s 45 (3) (a) had to be complied with. If that contention is right, it is common ground that, in the light of *Bambury v London Borough of Hounslow*¹³, the enforcement notice served by the defendants was invalid. Like Salmon LJ, I prefer to leave open the correctness of that decision, but, as this case has throughout been conducted on the basis that it is unexceptionable, I am content for present purposes to regard it in a like manner. e
f

The material facts and the legislation relevant thereto have already been set out by Salmon LJ and need now be referred to only incidentally. It is, I think, important to stress that counsel for the plaintiff accepts that not all licensee-caravanners are to be regarded as occupiers for the purposes of the 1962 Act. On the contrary, he accepts that the elements of (a) degree of control over and (b) duration of enjoyment of the premises concerned have direct relevance in this context, just as they have in relation to occupation for the purposes of rateability. For example, he does not contend that people who stay on a typical holiday caravan site for a short period would be occupiers of any part of it. On the contrary, he himself points to s 45 (7) and s 46 (1) (g) of the 1962 Act as indicating that the service of such notices is contemplated only on people who are regarded as likely to be on the site for a substantial period of time. Indeed, we know that all the notices in this case were expressed to take effect at the expiration of a period of 30 days from service, and called for the execution of works which, in the nature of things, involved a good deal more than simply clearing the site of a few caravans and which would probably require a not insubstantial period of time to complete. g
h
j

¹¹ [1966] 1 All ER at 934, [1966] 1 WLR at 436

¹² [1971] 2 All ER 331, [1971] 2 WLR 1291

¹³ [1966] 2 All ER 532, [1966] 2 QB 204

a For my part, I am prepared to apply the two tests of (a) degree of control and (b) duration, propounded by counsel for the plaintiff and to hold that, unless he can satisfy them, a person living on a caravan site has no legal right to have an enforcement notice served on him. But at least one of those served satisfied both tests, for Mr Wicks had been on the site some seven months when an enforcement notice (describing him as 'the occupier of land situate at Berry's Green Road') reached him on 25th September 1965. By that time he had marked off his boundary with big rocks and appears to have exercised a degree of control on his site indistinguishable from that of a tenant. Even disregarding the position of other caravanners on the site, if the proper inference from the foregoing facts is that Mr Wicks was an 'occupier' within the meaning of s 45 (3) (a), it follows that the notices served both on him and on the plaintiff were bad, being expressed to take effect from different dates: see *Bambury's case*¹⁴.

c On what grounds is it said that the act of the defendants in serving Mr Wicks was a superfluity which can and ought to be disregarded? In the last analysis, the assertion rests on an obiter dictum of Lord Denning MR in *Munnich v Godstone Rural District Council*¹⁵. Brushing aside the fact that in the enforcement notices served on certain caravan dwellers they were described as 'occupiers', Lord Denning MR said¹⁶:

d 'That was erroneous. They were not occupiers within the meaning of the Act. They were simply caravan dwellers. Caravan dwellers are only licensees and are never to be regarded as occupiers unless they are granted a tenancy. It was unnecessary to serve them at all.'

But Danckwerts and Salmon LJ were more guarded, the latter observing¹⁷, e 'As DANCKWERTS, L.J., has said, there may well be cases where those dwelling in caravans are occupiers.'

In *Shell-Mex and BP Ltd v Manchester Garages Ltd*¹⁸ Lord Denning MR said that, when considering whether what had been granted amounted to a licence or a tenancy, the determining point was not the label applied to it, but the nature of the transaction itself. Similarly, in the present case the issue has to be resolved not simply f by having regard to the evidence given by the plaintiff himself at the Ministerial inquiry and to the notice displayed in his site office to the effect that the caravanners were 'licensees', any more than by holding as conclusive against the defendants the fact that their own enforcement notices described each caravanner served as an 'occupier of land'. Instead, regard should be had to all the relevant circumstances.

g That no one can be regarded as the 'occupier' of land for any purpose unless he be either owner or tenant is an insupportable proposition: see the passages cited by the learned trial judge¹⁹ from the speech of Viscount Cave in *Madrassa Anjuman Islamia of Kholwad v Municipal Council of Johannesburg*²⁰. As to the term 'occupier', the learned lord concluded:

h 'Its precise meaning in any particular statute or document must depend on the purpose for which, and the context in which, it is used.'

In what context, then, is the word 'occupier' used in s 45 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962? It must be borne in mind that Part IV of that Act (entitled 'Enforcement of Planning Control') deals with planning in general and is by no

j 14 [1966] 2 All ER 532, [1966] 2 QB 204

15 [1966] 1 All ER 930, [1966] 1 WLR 427

16 [1966] 1 All ER at 934, [1966] 1 WLR at 436

17 [1966] 1 All ER at 936, [1966] 1 WLR at 439

18 [1971] 1 All ER at 843, [1971] 1 WLR at 615

19 [1971] 2 All ER at 337, [1971] 2 WLR at 1298

20 [1922] 1 AC 500 at 504

means confined to the control of caravan sites. Section 47 (5), which has already been read by Salmon LJ, is important. The effect of it is that, provided an enforcement notice is validly served on someone, any person who thereafter uses the land in a manner contravening it is ipso facto rendered guilty of a criminal offence, regardless of whether or not he has himself been served and even regardless of whether he has knowledge that a notice has been served at all. Provided he is using the land in a manner which in fact constitutes a contravention of the notice, it matters not that his contravention was committed in complete ignorance of its terms or even of its existence. That this is the effect of s 47 (5) was at no time challenged by counsel for the defendants—indeed, he in terms accepted it. a

On the face of it, this result is so arbitrary and unjust that one is driven to strain to find some means of avoiding it. One way of achieving this is to adopt an expansive approach in determining the category of people who must be served with enforcement notices, and who can then appeal to the Minister (pursuant to s 46 of the 1962 Act) with a view to having it quashed or varied, or, alternatively, who can take steps to comply with it and so avoid criminal or other proceedings. That, in effect, was the course adopted in this case by the learned judge, who regarded it as a fair inference¹— b

‘that the intention of the legislature was . . . to ensure that anyone who might be prejudiced by an enforcement notice should be served with it and have an opportunity of appealing against it.’ c

Having in mind the requirement in s 45 (3) that an enforcement notice ‘shall be served on the . . . occupier of the land to which it relates’, and finding himself impelled to the conclusion that Mr Wicks (to take an example) was ‘a licensee and not a tenant’, he concluded¹: d

‘Whatever the status of such a person, vis-à-vis the owner of the land, he would, in my judgment, . . . be an occupier for the purposes of s 45.’ e

*Munnich’s case*² notwithstanding, such an approach commends itself to me, and I am prepared to adopt it as one amply warranted by the facts of the case, including the physical layout, duration of sojourn on the site, the contractual terms existing between the plaintiff and his caravanners, and all those other features to which Salmon LJ has already referred. Just as in *Field Place Caravan Park Ltd v Harding*³, a caravan and the pitch on which it stood were held to form one unit of occupation capable of being a single rateable hereditament, so also, in my judgment, Mr Wicks is to be regarded for the purposes of the 1962 Act as the ‘occupier’ of the allocated piece of land on part of which rested the caravan which was his permanent home. So regarding him, it follows that I would also be for dismissing this appeal. f

STAMP LJ. Counsel for the plaintiff in support of his submission that the word ‘occupier’ in s 45 (3) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962 ought to be given a wide meaning to embrace persons in the position of Mr Wicks who, so it was submitted, had a degree of control over the land on which his caravan was placed, called in aid s 47 (5) of the Act. That subsection provides that where by virtue of an enforcement notice a use of land is required to be discontinued, or any conditions or limitations are required to be complied with in respect of a use of land or in respect of the carrying out of operations thereon, then if any person uses the land or causes or permits it to be used or carried out in contravention of the notice he shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable to the fines there specified. It would, so the argument runs, be unjust and anomalous if a person was not to be served with a notice, the breach of which would render him liable to a penalty. I fully appreciate g a the force of the argument and indeed one would have expected the two subsections ss 45 (3) and 47 (5), so to be framed as to embrace the same persons. Thus would the injustice or anomaly to which attention is called have been avoided. The court is accordingly asked to place on the word 'occupier' in the former subsection a meaning which would remove the injustice so far as regards persons in the position of Mr Wicks. The construction which we are asked to place on the word 'occupier' will not b however remove the injustice or anomaly, for it will leave a class of persons not in the position of Mr Wicks who on any construction of s 45 (3) are not 'occupiers' and so not entitled to receive the enforcement notice but nevertheless liable to penalties under s 47 (5). Neither the construction of counsel for the plaintiff, nor as I see it any possible construction, of 'occupier' in s 45 (3) will comprehend all who may be using the land or carrying out operations thereon within the meaning of s 47 (5). A caravanner, such as the caravanner in *Munnich v Godstone Rural District Council*⁴, who uses the c land or one whose caravan is moved from place to place on the land at the whim of the owner of the land will not be entitled to an enforcement notice but nevertheless liable to penalties if he fails to comply with it; and so I think would the organiser of a motor-cycle rally taking place once a fortnight on the land under licence from the owner. I cannot therefore impute to the legislature the intention that those d persons liable to penalties should be served with an enforcement notice and on no principle of construction can I treat s 47 (5) as controlling or affecting the meaning of the word 'occupier'.

¹ [1971] 2 All ER at 337, [1971] 2 WLR at 1297

² [1966] 1 All ER 930, [1966] 1 WLR 427

³ [1966] 3 All ER 247, [1966] 2 QB 484

Nor am I able to accept the submission on behalf of the defendants that the word 'occupier' in s 45 (3) (a) takes its colour from s 45 (3) (b) so as to give the word 'occupier' a meaning which would comprise only those having an interest in the land. Section 45 (3) is the successor, as amended, to s 23 (1) of the Town and Country e Planning Act 1947. That section provided that the enforcement notice should be served on the owner or occupier and there was no such reference as you find now in s 45 (3) (b) to any other person having 'an interest in that land'. At that point of time therefore the meaning of the word 'occupier' had to be determined without the aid of anything to be found in s 45 (3) (b), which was added by s 35 (2) of the Caravan Sites and Control of Development Act 1960 providing for the addition at the end of f s 23 (1) of the 1947 Act of the words now found in s 45 (3) (b) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962. The addition in 1960 of the reference to a person having an interest in the land cannot in my judgment affect the proper construction of the original words which in my judgment accordingly fall to be construed without regard to the terms of s 45 (3) (b).

I conclude therefore that neither the submission founded on the penal effect of s 47 (5) of the 1962 Act nor that founded on s 45 (3) (b) assists in the answer to the g question whether any of the occupiers of the caravans in this case was an 'occupier' of the land within the meaning of s 45 (3) (a).

It is not contended in this case that the caravan dwellers are other than licensees—that is to say they had a contractual right to place their caravans on the land, to have them connected to the services there provided with no doubt ancillary contractual h rights, expressed or implied, of access to and from their caravans, perhaps to walk round and disport themselves over the caravan site and, in the case of Mr Wicks, a licence to mark out an area of the land which surrounded his caravan. But none of them, not even Mr Wicks who is in the strongest position, had any interest legal or equitable in the land itself or any part of it. It is with the occupier of the land not of a caravan resting on it that s 45 (3) is concerned.

i Is there then any essential difference between the caravan dwellers in this case and those in *Munnich v Godstone Rural District Council*⁴. There Lord Denning MR decided not that the particular caravan dwellers in that case were not occupiers but that⁵:

4 [1966] 1 All ER 930, [1966] 1 WLR 427

5 [1966] 1 All ER at 934, [1966] 1 WLR at 436

'Caravan dwellers are only licensees and are never to be regarded as occupiers unless they are granted a tenancy.'

Danckwerts LJ in the course of his judgment said this⁶:

'In most cases, where persons are permitted to place caravans on land belonging to the owner, the owners of the caravans are not occupiers in the ordinary sense of the word, although it is possible that they may be occupiers in certain special circumstances. I remember a case in which I was concerned in which the land contained very permanent standings for the purpose of caravans being let out by the owner of the land, and, according to my recollection, the persons who hired the caravans were treated as tenants when I suppose they might become occupiers. In the present case, however, where it appears that there is a more or less shifting population with regard to the caravans which were brought on to the site and belonged to the person who came, I think that it is quite plain that in no sense of the word were the four persons mentioned in this case anything but licensees and, therefore, that they were not occupiers.'

Some criticism was directed in the course of the debate at the introductory part of the judgment of Danckwerts LJ, it being urged that he was erroneously directing himself to the meaning of the word 'occupier' in a different Act to that in question. But the remarks which followed were in general terms and in my view he was laying down a general rule that caravan dwellers who are mere licensees and have no interest in the land—and I use the word 'interest' in its strict legal sense—are not occupiers.

Whether or not, in view of the doubt whether the remarks in the judgment of Danckwerts LJ which I have quoted³¹ were part of his ratio decidendi, so that, there is a decision of this court that licensees are not occupiers within the meaning of the section here in question I would follow the decision in that case. There is already a difficulty in determining whether in any given set of circumstances a man is a tenant or a licensee and I would not wish to add further confusion in the law by holding that a licensee having no interest in the land may be an occupier according to the acts—or, if you will, the degree of control—which are either expressly or impliedly authorised by his licence. There is I think another reason for following the judgment of Lord Denning MR in the Munnich case⁷ in that it does in my view lead to a more sensible result; for it would, as I see it, be odd if it was compulsory, by the effect of s 45 (3) (a), to serve one who had no interest in the land but, by the effect of s 45 (3) (b), discretionary to serve it on one who had.

I only add this in relation to the meaning of the word 'occupier', that here it is used in a section designed to deal with a situation in which there has been a wrongful development of land which is to be remedied; and in my view a construction requiring the enforcement notice to be served only on those who may be supposed to have been responsible for and to be in a position to remedy what has been done, is to be preferred to one which would embrace one who has merely a contractual right to place his caravan there.

It follows in my judgment that it was not necessary or discretionary to serve the enforcement notice on any of the caravanners and I would allow the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Herbert Smith & Co (for the defendants); James & Charles Dodd (for the plaintiff).

Jacqueline Metcalfe Barrister.

⁶ [1966] 1 All ER at 934, [1966] 1 WLR at 436

⁷ [1966] 1 All ER 930, [1966] 1 WLR 427

a Birmingham Corporation v Perry Barr Stadium Ltd and another

CHANCERY DIVISION

PENNYCUICK V-C

b 22nd, 25th, 26th, 27th OCTOBER 1971

c Injunction – Interlocutory – Principle governing grant – Balance of convenience – Market – Statutory monopoly – Action for disturbance – Likelihood of loss to plaintiff if interlocutory relief refused – No evidence that defendant would suffer greater hardship – Plaintiff corporation claiming statutory monopoly of right to hold markets within area of city – Defendant holding unlicensed market within city – Plaintiff establishing clear prima facie right – Potential loss to plaintiff from fall in revenue from licensed markets and from fall in trade at plaintiff's own markets – No greater loss to defendant from grant of injunction – Defendant's business not involving much capital outlay.

d In 1824 the right to hold a market and to collect tolls, granted by royal charter in 1154, was transferred to the board of street commissioners in the city of Birmingham by the then lord of the manor. The powers of the commissioners were transferred to the city of Birmingham by an Improvement Act of 1851. By s 89 of the Birmingham Corporation (Consolidation) Act 1883 the corporation were empowered to continue the pre-existing markets and to establish such markets as they might think fit. Under these powers the corporation established wholesale and retail markets within its area and in addition licensed seven other market sites for which the proprietors e paid licence fees. The first defendant owned a stadium within the city of Birmingham and granted a licence to the second defendant to hold a market in the stadium on Sundays. The second defendant held the first market on Sunday, 17th October 1971. On 20th October the corporation commenced proceedings and sought an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants from holding a market on Sundays at the stadium. The corporation claimed to possess under the 1883 Act a monopoly f right to hold markets in the city of Birmingham. Evidence was given on behalf of the corporation that, if the second defendant were permitted to hold an unlicensed market, the corporation's revenue from licence fees would be endangered and that it would also suffer loss from the fall in trade at the existing markets carried on by the corporation itself.

g Held – In the whole circumstances of the case the balance of justice and convenience required the grant of an interlocutory injunction against the second defendant because (a) the corporation had clearly established that under s 89 of the 1883 Act it had a statutory monopoly of the holding of markets within the boundary of the city, which it was entitled to enforce by whatever form of action was available in the courts; (b) the corporation had established that the second defendant was disturbing h that monopoly right; (c) there was evidence of the likelihood of loss on the part of the corporation; (d) there was no reason to suppose that the second defendant would suffer greater hardship by an injunction should he ultimately succeed in the action, for his business was not, in the nature of things, one which involved much capital outlay, and (e) the corporation would certainly be good for any damages that might ultimately be awarded to the second defendant in the event of the corporation's j claim failing (see p 728 g, p 730 b and g to p 731 b and p 732 d g and j, post).

Elwes v Payne (1879) 12 Ch D 468 distinguished.

Notes

For the right to protection from disturbance by the owner of a market, see 25 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 403-408, paras 788-798, and for cases on the subject, see 33 Digest (Repl) 475-482, 302-361.

For the exercise of the court's discretion in granting interlocutory injunctions, see 21 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 364-366, paras 763-766, and for cases on the subject, see 28 (2) Digest (Reissue) 966-980, 60-161.

Cases referred to in judgment

Abergavenny Improvement Comrs v Straker (1889) 42 Ch D 83, 58 LJCh 717, 60 LT 756, 33 Digest (Repl) 486, 399.

Birmingham Corpn v Foster (1894) 70 LT 371, 10 TLR 309, 33 Digest (Repl) 480, 348.

Elwes v Payne (1879) 12 Ch D 468, 48 LJCh 831, 41 LT 118, 33 Digest (Repl) 486, 411.

Hailsham Cattle Market Co v Tolman [1915] 1 Ch 360, 113 LT 254; affd CA [1915] 2 Ch 1, 84 LJCh 607, 113 LT 254, 33 Digest (Repl) 486, 401.

Manchester Corpn v Lyons (1882) 22 Ch D 287, [1881-85] All ER Rep 1090, 47 LT 677, 33 Digest (Repl) 480, 347.

Stevens v Chown, Stevens v Clark [1901] 1 Ch 894, 70 LJCh 571, 84 LT 796, 65 JP 470, 33 Digest (Repl) 488, 421.

Motion

The plaintiffs, Birmingham Corporation, sought an interlocutory injunction to restrain the first defendant, Perry Barr Stadium Ltd, and the second defendant, Nigel Maby, who had been granted a licence of Perry Barr Stadium, Perry Barr, in the city of Birmingham, by the first defendant, from holding a market at the stadium. The facts are set out in the judgment.

J R Reid for the plaintiff corporation.

H Brooke for the first defendant.

D R M Henry for the second defendant.

PENNYCUICK V-C. In this action the plaintiffs are the Lord Mayor, aldermen and citizens of the city of Birmingham. The defendants are, first, Perry Barr Stadium Ltd and, second, Nigel Maby. I have before me a motion on the part of the plaintiff corporation whereby it seeks an injunction to restrain the defendants, that is, both defendants, pending the hearing of the action or further order, from holding a market at Perry Barr Stadium, Birmingham, on Sundays in any week, or otherwise using or permitting to be used any portion of their property in such a manner as to interfere with or prejudicially affect the market rights of the plaintiff corporation in the city of Birmingham. The plaintiff corporation claims to possess a monopoly right to hold a market in the city of Birmingham. The first defendant owns a property known as Perry Barr Stadium, at Perry Barr, now in the city of Birmingham. The first defendant has granted a licence to the second defendant to hold a market in Perry Barr Stadium on Sundays. The second defendant held his market for the first time on Sunday, 17th October 1971, after protest on the part of the corporation. Then, on 20th October, the corporation commenced these proceedings and gave notice of motion. The motion was stood over and the second defendant held a market again on 24th October.

The market is of a mixed character and of very considerable extent. It appears that about 200 traders were present selling their goods in the market from stalls or otherwise, and on the first Sunday there were over 15,000 persons in the stadium. It is right to say that, on uncontradicted evidence from the defendants, the market was well conducted and no complaint is made under that head. The first defendant, the owner of the property, adopted what I may call a neutral attitude. It has merely granted a licence and it does not seek to do anything in contravention of the plaintiff corporation's rights if established. For all practical purposes, the issue is now between the plaintiff corporation and the second defendant. I should mention that the second defendant also operates a Sunday market in other towns.

The evidence on matters of fact is quite short, and really, I think, nothing turns on it. Mr Griffiths, a deputy general manager employed by the plaintiff corporation, gives an account of what took place on 17th October.

a 'On the car park of the Stadium I observed a concourse of buyers and sellers. This concourse had the appearance of constituting a market. There were approximately 200 traders selling goods from vehicles, open and covered stalls, and spaces on the ground. A number of the stall-holders were known to me as persons having stalls in the retail markets run by the City of Birmingham. The points of sale were arranged in rows, so that there were avenues for pedestrian flow. The goods offered for sale included fruit, vegetables, eggs, groceries, hot-dogs, beverages, knitwear, dresses, shoes, carpets and crockery. The general public had free access to the site and a very considerable number of people were present.'

b Then there is evidence on the part of the second defendant that he conducts markets elsewhere, and as I have said there is no suggestion that this market is not properly conducted. The real question on the notice of motion is, I think, almost wholly one of law.

c I will read the first few paragraphs from the affidavit sworn on behalf of the plaintiff corporation by Mr Pitt, a solicitor employed in the corporation town clerk's department. He says:

d '... 2. By a Charter of Henry II in 1154 Peter de Birmingham was granted a market. In 1824 the right to hold the market and to collect the market tolls was transferred to the Board of Street Commissioners in the City of Birmingham by the then Lord of the Manor ... 3. Following the Municipal Corporation Act 1835, a Municipal Charter was granted to the City of Birmingham in 1838, and by an Improvement Act of 1851 the powers and rights of the Street Commissioners were transferred to the Council. 4. By Section 89 of the Birmingham Corporation (Consolidation) Act, 1883, the Corporation were and are empowered to continue the pre-existing markets and to establish such other markets as they may think fit. There are at present three existing wholesale markets and one retail market established in the City under the franchise of market of 1154 and the powers contained in the Act of 1883. In addition there are two new retail markets established under Part III of the Food and Drugs Act 1955.'

e He then refers to certain Acts concerning Sunday trading, which I do not intend to read. He then refers to the correspondence with the defendants' solicitor concerning their proposal to open this market. In an affidavit in reply Mr Pitt says:

g '... The [plaintiff corporation] in addition to the various markets they run, license seven markets within the City of Birmingham. For the privilege of being allowed to run these markets, the proprietors pay licence fees. If it appears that [the second defendant] can hold a market unlicensed, the [plaintiff corporation's] licence fees from these licensed markets will be endangered. This is particularly important at the moment when negotiations are under way but have not been concluded for the grant of a licence for a market to be held at Corporation Square, Bull Street, Birmingham. The fees payable in respect of licences to hold markets are considerable and in the case of some of the licences payment is calculated by reference to the turnover of the market.'

h Then there is produced a copy of a typical licence agreement. Later on, he says:

j '... the [plaintiff corporation's] loss stems not only from the fall in trade at their existing markets, but also from the damage to the value of their franchise the decrease in turnover at their licensed markets and the loss of the opportunity to collect the tolls to which they are entitled.'

I shall refer in a moment to the Birmingham Corporation (Consolidation) Act 1883. Before doing so, I should mention that, at the date of that Act, Perry Barr was not included in the city; it was so included by the Birmingham Extension Act 1927. Section 16 of that Act provides:

'Subject to the provisions of this Act the unrepealed provisions of the local Acts and of any other local Act (including any local Act passed or to be passed during the present session of Parliament) or of any other Provisional Order duly confirmed by Parliament, and affecting the existing city or the Corporation as the same respectively are in force within the existing city on the appointed day shall extend and apply to the city and any reference therein to the existing city and the Corporation shall be deemed to refer to the city and the Corporation thereof.'

The city is the extended city, and no point is taken on the fact that Perry Barr was not part of the city in 1883.

Section 89 of the 1883 Act provides as follows, so far as now material:

'The market undertaking of the Corporation as it exists at the commencement of this Act including all property rights powers and privileges of the Corporation in relation to markets and fairs shall continue vested in and may be held exercised and enjoyed by the Corporation subject to the provisions of this Act and the Corporation shall have the following powers (namely): ... (ii.) They may continue and from time to time provide market places and market houses for the sale of marketable articles and places for fairs with offices approaches and conveniences; (iii.) They may continue the market and fairs held at the commencement of this Act and may from time to time alter the days on which and the places at which the same respectively are or may be held and may establish and hold new markets and cattle fairs but not within the parish of Edgbaston ...'

I need not read (iv) and (v). I will refer in a moment to one or two other sections in that Act.

Section 89 contemplates the existence at the commencement of the Act of the market undertaking and provides that all property, rights, powers and privileges shall continue to be vested in and may be held, exercised and enjoyed by the corporation. On this motion, however, the plaintiff corporation has adduced no evidence as to the nature of the existing rights and powers, and counsel for the plaintiff corporation very properly accepted that, for the purpose of this motion, he must rely on the powers expressly conferred by s 89 itself, those powers supplementing whatever rights and powers the plaintiff corporation already possessed, but which latter rights and powers are not in evidence on the motion. It seems to me that s 89, and in particular paras (ii) and (iii) which I have read, plainly points to a statutory monopoly vested in the plaintiff corporation, the nature of the monopoly being the holding of markets within the boundary of the city. A monopoly of this kind created by statute differs only in name from a monopoly of the same kind created by charter, the latter being referred to as a franchise. On this point, I have been referred to *Birmingham Corp'n v Foster*¹, where Romer J said:

'I think that the plaintiffs in this case are entitled to an injunction. I shall assume in this case that, in accordance with the principle laid down in the case of the *Mayor of Manchester v Lyons*² ... the plaintiffs here must, in respect of their market, rely upon their statutory market rights, and not rely upon any special privileges or rights, if there were any, attached to the old manorial market which has been referred to. But, under the statute, the plaintiffs have undoubtedly market rights. They alone have the right to establish a market ...'

¹ (1894) 70 LT 371 at 372

² (1882) 22 Ch D 287, [1881-85] All ER Rep 1090

- a That is a statement concerning this particular corporation and is directly in point here. I was also referred to what was said by Sargant J in the case of *Hailsham Cattle Market Co v Tolman*³:

- b 'On these facts I have no doubt that, had the plaintiffs' market been an ordinary or normal charter market, the monopoly incident to such a market would have entitled them to complain of, and succeed in restraining, the defendant's proceedings. (See for instance *Elwes v. Payne*⁴.) And the case of *Birmingham Corporation v. Foster*⁵ is an authority, were one needed, that the owners of a statutory market are in as favourable a position in this respect, apart from any express or implied provisions in the statute to the contrary.'

- c The judge decided the particular case against the owner of the monopoly on a ground not now in point, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal⁶.

- c Before leaving this point, I would refer to Halsbury's Laws⁷ where, after enumerating the existing types of market, it is said, under the heading of 'Disturbance':

- d 'The owner of a market or fair is entitled to protection from disturbance, and disturbance may consist in any unjustifiable interference with the owner's exclusive right to hold his market or fair and take the profits thereof.'

- d A monopoly right created by statute may, of course, be cut down, either expressly or by implication, by other provisions in the relevant statute. For an instance of such cutting down by implication, see the case of *Abergavenny Improvement Comrs v Straker*⁸. But I am unable to find any provision in this Act either expressly or by implication cutting down the monopoly rights and powers conferred by s 89 on the plaintiff corporation.

- e Section 90 contains certain penal provisions on any person—I summarise it—who sells within the borough except in some market or fair lawfully authorised or in his own dwelling place shop or place etc, any animal article or thing in respect of which tolls, rents, stallages or charges are by this Act authorised to be taken. Then s 91 authorises the corporation itself to demand and receive tolls, rents, stallages and charges. I find nothing in ss 90 or 91, or any other section of this Act to which I have f been referred, which could be construed as cutting down the plaintiff corporation's monopoly right.

- f I should mention at this stage, in order to complete the picture, that s 3 of the 1883 Act incorporates the provisions of the Markets and Fair Clauses Act 1847, except insofar as any of these provisions are expressly varied by this Act. Section 13 of the 1847 Act contains another prohibition on selling, in these terms:

- g 'After the Market Place is opened for public Use every Person other than a Licensed Hawker who shall sell or expose for Sale in any Place within the prescribed Limits, except in his own Dwelling Place or Shop, any Articles in respect of which Tolls are by the special Act authorized to be taken in the Market, shall for such Offence be liable to a Penalty not exceeding Forty Shillings.'

- h It may well be that s 90, as originally enacted, displaces s 13 and there is some authority on that point. Then, however, s 110 of the Birmingham Corporation Act 1903 provides as follows:

- j 'Section 90 . . . of the Act of 1883 except the first proviso of that section is hereby repealed and in construing section 13 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act 1847 as incorporated in the Act of 1883 the prescribed limits shall mean the city.'

3 [1915] 1 Ch D 360 at 367

4 (1879) 12 Ch D 468

5 (1894) 70 LT 371

6 [1915] 2 Ch 1

7 25 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 403, para 788

8 (1889) 42 Ch D 83

I think it is really quite clear that by that section Parliament intended to treat s 13 of the 1847 Act as incorporated in the 1883 Act insofar as it was not already thereby incorporated. I mention those points in view of a number of arguments on a rather different issue which were addressed to me with respect to the 1883 Act and the provisions of that Act. I conclude, therefore, that there is nothing in the 1883 Act which cuts down the monopoly right of the plaintiff corporation.

That being the position, it seems to me that the plaintiff corporation is entitled to enforce its monopoly right by whatever form of action is available in these courts, that is, an action for damages and for an injunction. The suggestion was made by counsel for the second defendant that the penal provisions in s 90 of the 1883 Act might exclude the ordinary remedy. It seems to me that that is plainly not so. This is not the case of a new statutory wrong coupled with a statutory remedy. The wrong, i.e. the disturbance of a market, is one which has always existed under the common law and I see no reason to think that the ordinary remedy at law for this wrong is excluded by the penal provisions in the 1883 Act. That is nonetheless so because so far as I am concerned today the particular monopoly right now vested in the plaintiff corporation is provided by the same statute, the 1883 Act, as contains the penal provisions. On this point, I should refer to the case of *Stevens v Chown*⁹, where the headnote reads as follows:

‘Where a statute provides a particular remedy for the infringement of a right of property thereby created or re-enacted, the jurisdiction of the High Court to protect that right by injunction is not excluded, unless the statute expressly so provides.’

And the learned judge elaborated that point¹⁰.

Counsel for the plaintiff corporation relied on the penal provisions and their alleged breach by the second defendant or persons claiming under him as a separate ground of action from the disturbance of the plaintiff corporation’s monopoly right. There was a great deal of argument on that issue and a number of cases were cited on it. As I have said, I am satisfied that the monopoly right exists and I am also satisfied that the second defendant is disturbing that monopoly right. That being so, the plaintiff corporation has no need to have recourse to the alternative ground, but I would add that if I were not satisfied as to the monopoly right I would certainly not be disposed to grant an injunction on the alternative ground. Counsel for the plaintiff corporation also relied on the Shops Act 1850 and its provisions with regard to Sunday trading. Again, I would certainly not make an injunction on that ground if I was not satisfied as to the monopoly right, and I propose to say no more about it.

In order to obtain relief the plaintiff corporation will have to show damage at the trial of the action. For the purpose of this motion, it is sufficient—and this is accepted by counsel for the second defendant—that the plaintiff corporation should show a likelihood of damage. It seems to me that the passages I have read from the affidavit of Mr Pitt do establish the likelihood of damage. It is really apparent that if some other party, unauthorised by the plaintiff corporation, establishes a market within the city of Birmingham, the value of the plaintiff corporation’s monopoly right must be reduced. Obviously, if it is known that traders can get away with establishing a market without recourse to the licence of the plaintiff corporation, other traders are less likely to spend their money on obtaining a licence from the plaintiff corporation. There is also the point as to interference with the existing markets carried on by the plaintiff corporation itself.

I now come to a point which has caused me some difficulty, namely, whether it is right in the exercise of my discretion that I should make an interlocutory injunction in this case. Leaving aside for the moment something which was said in the case of Elwes a v Payne¹¹, I feel no doubt that I should do so. It seems to me that, the plaintiff corporation having established disturbance of its monopoly right, the balance of justice and convenience is in favour of putting an end to that disturbance at once. I do not see any ground for saying otherwise. This is not a case of delay on the part of the plaintiff corporation, nor, I think, is it a case where the second defendant is likely to have incurred capital expenditure, or anything like that, and I cannot see any special circumstances which would make it right to allow him to go on carrying on his market to the detriment of the plaintiff corporation pending the trial of this action. b What has troubled me is the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of *Elwes v Payne*¹¹ nearly 100 years ago. The headnote reads as follows:

9 [1901] 1 Ch D 894

10 [1901] 1 Ch D at 903

c 'The Plaintiffs were owners of the tolls of an ancient cattle market held weekly on Thursday. The Defendants, who were auctioneers, fitted up with stalls and pens a neighbouring piece of ground, and issued circulars stating that weekly sales of cattle by auction would be held there on Mondays. The Plaintiffs brought their action to restrain the Defendants from holding their proposed sales as being an interference with the Plaintiffs' market:—Held, by the Master of the Rolls, that, having regard to modern facilities for traffic, a market on Monday was prima facie an injury to a market on Thursday, that what the Defendants were d doing was in fact the establishment of a rival market, and that an interlocutory injunction ought to be granted. Held, on appeal, that, the Defendants undertaking to keep an account, an interlocutory injunction ought not to be granted, for that, if an injunction was granted and it turned out that the Defendants were in the right, there would be great difficulty in ascertaining the compensation to which they would be entitled, whereas, if an injunction was refused, and the e Plaintiffs succeeded at the trial, there would be no difficulty in giving them compensation, and their market would suffer no permanent injury from the sales by the Defendants in the meantime.'

The Court of Appeal thus reversed the decision by Sir George Jessel MR.

f In the argument in the Court of Appeal, the first sentence was¹²: 'It is by no means certain that the sales on Monday will hurt the market on Thursday.' James LJ¹³ said:

g 'I do not intend to express any opinion that the Plaintiffs will not succeed at the hearing of the action in establishing their franchise, which does not seem to be seriously in dispute, and in establishing that what the Defendants propose to do will be a nuisance to that franchise; but this is the first time that I have ever heard of an interlocutory injunction being granted in respect of such a right as this. The only question that it seems to me right to decide at the present moment is whether there has been such a case made out as to induce the Court before the rights are finally determined to do something which shall interfere with the prima facie rights of the Defendants [i.e. the right to trade] . . . The order of the Master of the Rolls is not in accordance with my view of what ought to be done, having regard to the greater amount or less amount of damage to be sustained h by these parties. If the Defendants are stopped from beginning a trade which may become a very valuable trade, then, supposing they should turn out to be right, they will have been prevented from carrying on a trade which they had a perfect right to carry on, and there would be great difficulty in determining the amount of damage they would have sustained. I do not know how they would be compensated if it should turn out that they are right. On the other hand, if j the Plaintiffs succeed at the trial, it does not seem to me that there will be the slightest difficulty in giving them full compensation for everything that they can shew they have lost.'

¹¹ (1879) 12 Ch D 468

¹² (1879) 12 Ch D at 475

¹³ (1879) 12 Ch D at 476, 477

Cotton LJ¹⁴ put it more generally:

'I am ready to admit that in such a case irremediable mischief need not be shewn, but I think that there is fallacy in the use of these words, "The Plaintiffs are in possession, and the Defendants are interfering with and disturbing their possession." The Plaintiffs are, no doubt, in possession of a franchise, but they are not in possession of anything with which the Defendants are directly or physically interfering. The question is whether or not what the Defendants are doing is an interference with the right of the Plaintiffs. That is the question to be tried at the hearing. Where the Plaintiffs are in possession and the Defendants are physically and directly interfering with that possession, the only question is whether the Defendants can justify those acts which are directly and physically interfering with the possession and the quiet enjoyment of the property as enjoyed by the Plaintiffs at the commencement of those acts of the Defendants. But where the interference is not physical or direct, but is indirect and only comes in the shape of the consequences which the acts of the Defendants may have upon the market, the case is very different. Therefore, upon the balance of convenience and inconvenience, in my opinion there should be no injunction.'

Now that is rather a strong decision against the grant of an interlocutory injunction in the circumstances of that case, but at the end of it all it is a decision based on the balance of convenience in the particular case having regard to the circumstances of that case. It will be observed that although the existence of the plaintiffs' franchise was not seriously in dispute it was, on the face of it, not apparent that the plaintiffs would suffer injury from the market which the defendants were proposing to establish. It must be borne in mind that the plaintiffs held a cattle market usually on Thursday, and it was proposed by the defendants to hold a cattle auction on Monday. Then it was considered that the defendants would be likely to suffer greater hardship from the injunction if they succeeded than would the plaintiffs from the refusal of the injunction. Counsel has not been able to find any subsequent case on which an interlocutory injunction has been either granted or refused in comparable circumstances.

In the present case, the plaintiff corporation is in a different position from that of the plaintiffs in *Elwes v Payne*¹⁵. The plaintiff corporation does not merely hold a market itself. It grants licences to other persons to do so within the city. There is evidence of the likelihood of loss on the part of the plaintiff corporation and there is really no reason to suppose that the second defendant will suffer greater hardship by an injunction should he ultimately succeed in the action, than would the plaintiff corporation from the refusal of the injunction should the plaintiff corporation succeed in the action. As I have said, the second defendant's business is not, in the nature of things, a business involving much capital outlay. And, finally, an important point, the plaintiff corporation will certainly be good for any damages that might ultimately be awarded to the second defendant. I am certainly moved by what the Court of Appeal said in that case, and specifically by the statement of James LJ¹⁶:

'... this is the first time that I have ever heard of an interlocutory injunction being granted in respect of such a right as this.'

But looking at the whole of the circumstances in the present case, I think that the balance of justice and convenience does require that I should make an interlocutory injunction, and I do not think that *Elwes v Payne*¹⁵, in principle, compels me to do otherwise. I propose, accordingly, to make an injunction against the second defendant. I have not, except at the outset, referred to the position of the first defendant,

¹⁴ (1879) 12 Ch D at, 479 480

¹⁵ (1879) 12 Ch D 468

¹⁶ (1879) 12 Ch D at 476

- a which has not at present, so far as I can see, invaded any right of the plaintiff corporation. I can see no reason why I should grant interlocutory relief against the first defendant.

Injunction granted against second defendant.

- b Solicitors: Sharpe Pritchard & Co, agents for T H Parkinson, Birmingham (for the plaintiff corporation); Barlow, Lyde & Gilbert, agents for Duggan, Elton & James, Birmingham (for the first defendant); Barlow, Lyde & Gilbert, agents for Field & Sons, Leamington Spa (for the second defendant).

Richard J Soper Esq Barrister.

c Thomas David (Porthcawl) Ltd and others v Penybont Rural District Council and others

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND GRIFFITHS JJ

13th DECEMBER 1971

- d Town and country planning – Enforcement notice – Validity – Mining operations – Planning unit in relation to development – Area specified in enforcement notice – Actual working having occurred only within two smaller areas within area specified – Validity of notice in relation to larger area – Power of planning authority to determine that larger area planning unit for purposes of development in question – Town and Country Planning Act 1962, s 45 (1).

- e Town and country planning – Enforcement notice – Period for service of notice – Mining operations – Development – Four year period from carrying out of development – Initial working of area more than four years previously – Whether subsequent working of area within four year period new development or continuation of original development – Whether power to serve enforcement notice in relation to excavations being carried out within area of initial cut – Town and Country Planning Act 1962, ss 12 (1), 45 (2).

- f The respondent local planning authority served an enforcement notice on the appellants under s 45 (1)^a of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962. The notice related to an area of sand on the seashore and stated that it appeared to the planning authority that a specified area of land had been developed within the meaning of s 12 (1)^b of the 1962 Act, by the carrying out thereon of mining operations, i.e. the extraction of sand and gravel. The land in question consisted of an area encircled by a red verge line on a plan attached to the notice. Paragraph 3 of the notice however made it clear that the actual working of sand and gravel had not taken place all over the land within the red verge line but only within two smaller areas coloured pink within the larger area. Furthermore, in the two smaller areas initial working for sand and gravel had in some instances taken place more than four years before the service of the enforcement notice whereas in other cases it had taken place within the four year period. The appellants appealed against a decision of the Secretary of State dismissing an appeal against the enforcement notice. The appellants contended (i) that, since no actual working had occurred outside the two pink areas it was not open to the planning authority to make the enforcement notice effective over the wider area indicated by the red line; and (ii) that in those parts of the pink areas where the initial working had been more than four years before the service of the enforcement notice there was by virtue of s 45 (2)^c of the 1962 Act no power a Section 45 (1), so far as material, is set out at p 735 h and j, post

b Section 12 (1) is set out at p 735 g, post

c Section 45 (2), so far as material, provides: 'The period for the service of an enforcement notice—(a) where the notice relates to the carrying out of development, is the period of four years from the carrying out of that development....'

to prevent the appellants continuing to work those areas until they were worked out. a

Held – The appeal would be dismissed for the following reasons—

(i) there was no requirement that an enforcement notice in relation to mining operations should be restricted to the precise area which was the subject of an actual cut by the shovel or bulldozer; it was quite proper for the planning authority to consider whether the land on which the actual cut had been taken was not in fact part of a wider area, development of which was being started by the particular activity immediately referred to; if it was clear that the first cut was a cut relative to a larger area then it was right for the tribunal of fact to determine, if it thought fit, that the larger area was the planning unit for the purposes of the development in question; in the present case the planning authority and the Secretary of State were right in thinking that the area confined within the red line was a planning unit and was the land to which the enforcement notice should be directed (see p 737 j to p 738 c and h, post); dicta of Lord Denning MR and Diplock LJ in G Percy Trentham Ltd v Gloucestershire County Council [1966] 1 All ER at 703, 704 applied; b

(ii) so far as mining operations were concerned the initial cut did not constitute the development, subsequent operations downwards within the area of that cut merely being a continuation of that development; each shovelful or each cut by the bulldozer was a separate act of development; it did not follow therefore that, where the initial cut had occurred more than four years prior to the enforcement notice, the notice could not restrain further activity within the confines of that cut (see p 738 e f and h, post). c

Notes d

For the service and contents of enforcement notices, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 332-335, paras 438, 439, and for cases on the subject, see 45 Digest (Repl) 349-354, 87-101. e

For the meaning of development, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 259-263, para 366, and for cases on the subject, see 45 Digest (Repl) 325-327, 6-13.

For the Town and Country Planning Act 1962, s 12, see 36 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 87, and for the Town and Country Planning Act 1962, s 45, see 42 Halsbury's Statutes (2nd Edn) 1015. f

Section 45 has been repealed, and replaced by s 15 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1968.

Case referred to in judgment g

Trentham (G Percy) Ltd v Gloucestershire County Council [1966] 1 All ER 701, [1966] 1 WLR 506, 130 JP 179, Digest (Cont Vol B) 689, 30d.

Appeal h

This was an appeal by Thomas David (Porthcawl) Ltd and the trustees of Merthyr Mawr Estates against a decision of the Secretary of State for Wales conveyed by letter dated 24th May 1971 whereby he dismissed an appeal by the appellants against an enforcement notice served on them by the Penybont Rural District Council, as agents for the Glamorgan County Council, the local planning authority for the county of Glamorgan. The grounds of the appeal were: 1. That the Secretary of State was erroneous in point of law in deciding that having regard to the special category of mineral extraction, whereby every extension of workings could be regarded as constituting development as part of a continuous operation, all operational development within the appeals land subsequent to 17th November 1962 constituted development for which planning permission was required, and that the operations proceeded in breach of planning control. 2. That the Secretary of State was erroneous in point of law in deciding that a mining operation was a continuous development in that every step in the development was itself an operation forming j a an extension of the original operation. 3. That the Secretary of State was erroneous in point of law in deciding that each step in a mining operation, in the absence of planning permission, prolonged the period for taking enforcement action in relation to the early stages of the development which had been carried out since the appointed day and thereby constituted a mounting contravention of planning control. 4. That if the Secretary of State was correct in finding that a mining operation was a continuous development then that development was the development of the whole of the appeal site, and had commenced before 17th November 1962, and therefore could not be the subject of an enforcement notice. 5. Alternatively, that the enforcement notice included certain land, which had not been developed as at 17th November 1966, and which therefore could not have been the subject of an enforcement notice. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Widgery CJ.

b c Douglas Frank QC and J Ryman for the appellants.
 I D L Glidewell QC and Gordon Slynn for the Secretary of State for Wales.
 The respondents, the Penybont Rural District Council and the Glamorgan County Council, did not appear and were not represented.

d LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal under s 180 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1962, against the decision of the Secretary of State for Wales conveyed in his decision letter of 24th May 1971 dismissing an appeal by the present appellants against an enforcement notice served on 7th November 1966 by the Penybont Rural District Council, as agents of the Glamorgan County Council, the local planning authority for the county of Glamorgan. The enforcement notice related to an area of sand on the seashore known as Merthyr Mawr Warren, and it complained of development in the form of engineering operations. The Secretary of State, amongst other minor adjustments, directed that the notice should be amended to substitute 'mining operations' for 'engineering operations', and I will treat the notice as having been in those terms from the outset.

e Since development in the form of mining operations is not perhaps as common in this court as some other forms of development it is convenient to begin by refreshing one's memory on the legislation relevant to such development. This notice being served in 1966, the relevant statute is the Town and Country Planning Act 1962. Section 12 (1) of this provides:

f 'In this Act, except where the context otherwise requires, "development", subject to the following provisions of this section, means the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land, or the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land.'

g An enforcement notice is dealt with in s 45 (1):

h 'Where it appears to the local planning authority—(a) that any development of land has been carried out without the grant of planning permission required in that behalf in accordance with Part III of this Act . . . then . . . the local planning authority, if they consider it expedient to do so having regard to the provisions of the development plan and to any other material considerations, may, within the period specified in the next following subsection, serve a notice under this section (in this Act referred to as an "enforcement notice").'

j The period specified in the next following subsection, so far as relevant, is a period of four years from the carrying out of that development. As to what the notice may contain, sub-s (4) provides:

'An enforcement notice—(a) shall specify the development which is alleged to have been carried out without the grant of planning permission as mentioned in paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of this section or, as the case may be, the matters in respect of which it is alleged that any such conditions or limitations as are mentioned in paragraph (b) of that subsection have not been complied with, and (b) may require such steps as may be specified in the notice to be taken, within such period as may be so specified, for the purpose of restoring the land to its condition before the development took place, or of securing compliance with the conditions or limitations, as the case may be, and in particular may, for that purpose, require the demolition or alteration of any buildings or works, the discontinuance of any use of land, or the carrying out on land of any building or other operations.'

In regard to mining development these provisions are modified by Part II of the Town and Country Planning (Minerals) Regulations 1963¹. The effect of these modifications is that 'use' of land in s 12 does not include the use of land by the carrying out of mining operations but for the purpose of s 45 (4) reference to the discontinuance of a use includes discontinuance of mining operations. Thus in answer to the question 'development or no', what one has to have regard to in mining cases is the actual carrying out of work—that is the question—and no change of use is concerned in it. However, when one comes to enforcement under s 45, the effect of the amendment to which I have referred is that an enforcement notice may require the termination of mining operations in precisely the same way as it can require the termination of a use of land undertaken without planning permission.

To come back to the facts of the case. The enforcement notice which gives rise to this appeal, recited in para 3 that it appeared to the council that 'the said land' had been developed by the carrying out thereon of mining operations, namely the extraction of sand and gravel. Going back to para 1 of the notice, one finds that 'the said land' means an area encircled by a red verge line on the plan attached to the notice and before the court. So the land in respect of which the development is alleged to have taken place, or perhaps I should say on, in or under which the development is said to have taken place, is this large area encircled by the single red line. However, it is clear from para 3 of the notice that what is being alleged is that the actual working of the sand and gravel did not occur all over the land confined in the red verge line, but has taken place in two much smaller areas within the large area and each itself coloured pink. So the complaint is—and no one could have made it clearer than the draftsman of this notice—that the land comprised in the red verge line has been developed by reason of the taking of sand and gravel from two smaller pink-washed areas.

The present appellants appealed against that notice on a number of grounds and the usual inquiry was held. Since counsel for the appellants has been very economical in his argument in defining the points which he takes in his submission that the Secretary of State was wrong, I do not find it necessary to go into the history of this matter in any great detail. I think it suffices to illustrate the point in issue to say this. Workings for sand have taken place in this area for very many years indeed, certainly back to before the second world war, and when the inspector came to consider the history of the land encircled by the red line he found that no working had taken place in that area other than in the two areas washed pink. Further in the two areas washed pink initial working for sand and gravel had in some instances occurred before November 1962, and therefore more than four years before the service of the enforcement notice, whereas in other cases within the pink-washed land the initial development had taken place after November 1962 and therefore within the four year period.

Counsel's criticism of the Secretary of State's decision really crystallised itself into two submissions. His first submission is that it being found as a fact that no actual a mineral working has occurred outside the two pink-washed areas then as a matter of law it was not open to the planning authority to make the enforcement notice effective over the wider area comprised in the red line. The second submission is that in those parts of the pink-washed area where the initial mineral working occurred more than four years before the service of the enforcement notice, there is no power to prevent the appellants from continuing to work those areas until they are worked out. Put another way, he submits that in areas where the initial working was more than four years before the date of the notice, there is no control under the Act sufficient to enable an enforcement notice to be served which will prevent continued working of those areas until they are worked out. I will endeavour to deal with those two points separately.

¹ SI 1963 No 1221. The 1963 regulations were revoked and replaced by the Town and Country Planning (Minerals) Regulations 1971 (SI 1971 No 756) as from 5th May 1971

c As to the first one, the control which can be exercised by the town and country planning legislation in respect of mineral working is in respect of any such workings which occur in, on, over or under land. Counsel for the appellants' argument is that there can be no development within those words in s 12 of the Act except on land where the top spit, the top surface, has actually been removed by way of working. He says that the area in question here outside the two pink-washed areas is an area in which no mineral workings have occurred and therefore an area which could not competently be included in the enforcement notice. In answer to that, counsel d for the Secretary of State reminded us of the fact that in many planning cases, although more particularly in cases concerning change of use, it is necessary to consider initially what is the planning unit to which the enforcement notice can properly be applied. One gets, for example, a field of ten acres with one caravan situated in the corner. If you look at the small area covered by the caravan and ask whether there has been e a material change of use, the answer will almost certainly be Yes. If you look at the ten acre field and ask the same question in relation to it, the answer may well be No. Accordingly, in such a case, before you can consider the effect of planning legislation you have to ask yourself what is the planning unit to which an enforcement notice can properly be addressed. That matter is dealt with authoritatively in the Court of Appeal in *G Percy Trentham Ltd v Gloucestershire County Council*² so far as f change of use cases are concerned and I refer to a passage from the judgment of Lord Denning MR. This was a case concerning farm buildings some of which had been used for storage of building materials, and Lord Denning MR said³:

g 'Even if the appellants were able to say that these nine buildings were a "repository", I do not think that they could sever them from the rest of the farmhouse and farm buildings. In applying the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1963, one must consider the whole of the unit which is being used. I think that Diplock, L.J., indicated the right test towards the end of the argument. One should look at the whole area on which a particular activity is carried on, including uses which are ordinarily incidental to or included in the activity.'

h Diplock LJ makes the same point when he said⁴:

'As I suggested in the course of the argument, I think that for that purpose what the local authority are entitled to look at is the whole of the area which was used for a particular purpose including any part of that area whose use was incidental to or ancillary to the achievement of that purpose.'

i Accordingly, one finds in change of use cases that the extent of the planning unit has to be determined by looking at the whole area over which a particular activity is carried on.

Counsel for the Secretary of State contends, and for my part I agree with him, that a similar approach must necessarily be used in connection with operational development such as development by mining. I do not think that it can possibly have been the intention of Parliament that, when an enforcement notice is served in regard to mining operations such as the present, the effect of the enforcement notice should be meticulously restricted to the very square yardage which is being the subject of an actual cut by the shovel or the bulldozer as the case may be. I think it is permissible and indeed right in mining operations cases to ask whether the land on which the actual cut is taken is not in truth and in fact part of a wider area which is being started in development by the particular immediate activity referred to. If as a matter of fact and common sense it is clear that the first cut is a cut relative to a larger area then it is right for the tribunal of fact to determine if it thinks fit that that larger area is a planning unit for present purposes. In this case I think therefore that the rural district council and the Secretary of State were right in thinking that the area confined in the red line was a planning unit and was the land to which the enforcement notice should be directed. I do not take time to dwell on the many inconsistencies and peculiar consequences which might follow in my judgment if the land to which the notice related had necessarily been confined to land on which an actual cut had been made.

2 [1966] 1 All ER 701, [1966] 1 WLR 506

3 [1966] 1 All ER at 703, [1966] 1 WLR at 512

4 [1966] 1 All ER at 704, [1966] 1 WLR at 514

As to the second point, counsel for the appellants as I have said contends that where in any particular spot the taking of minerals began before November 1962 the appellants retain the right to work downwards within the horizontal confines of that area to any extent. He justifies this by saying that the proper interpretation of such a situation is that the development occurred when the surface was cut, and since the development occurred when the surface was cut and since that was more than four years before the date of the notice, it follows that the notice cannot restrain further activity within the confines of that cut. For my part I think that that argument is unsound because I think that in these operational development cases, and I am particularly referring now to mining cases, that each shovelful or each cut by the bulldozer is a separate act of development and it seems to me to be of no comfort to the developer that he should have made a first cut at a particular point more than four years ago. When he continues the work he will be carrying out a further development, not merely continuing the development of four years ago. Accordingly, he would be doing something which is a breach of planning control, and I see no reason why an enforcement notice should not be appropriate.

I ought to say for completeness that the Secretary of State deleted from the notice a requirement for the making good of works which had taken place before the notice was served. Had that requirement remained, other matters might have required investigation in regard to whether that requirement applied to development occurring more than four years before the date of the notice. In the circumstances I find it unnecessary to go into this matter and content myself by saying that I think the Secretary of State was right in law. I would dismiss the appeal.

ASHWORTH J. I agree.

GRIFFITHS J. I agree also.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal granted.

Solicitors: Collyer-Bristow & Co, agents for Cox & Cameron, Port Talbot (for the appellants); Solicitor, Department of the Environment.

N P Metcalfe Esq Barrister.

R v Birmingham Licensing Planning Committee, ex parte Kennedy

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND GRIFFITHS JJ

17th, 21st DECEMBER 1971

Licensing – Certificate of non-objection – Grant of certificate by licensing planning committee – Duty of committee to try to secure that number, nature and distribution of licensed premises accord with local requirements – Adoption by committee of policy of equating barrelage – Policy to refuse applications for certificates unless applicant had acquired licence in suspense covering barrelage equal to estimated barrelage of new premises – Licences only obtainable from existing holders by purchase – Object of policy to relieve local authority of need to compensate existing holders in respect of licences which would not be re-sited – Whether proper ground for refusing certificate that applicant had not purchased barrelage – Licensing Act 1964, s 119 (2).

The applicant applied to the respondent licensing planning committee ('the committee') for the grant of a certificate of non-objection to the grant of a justices' on-licence for a new hotel then under construction on a site in the committee's licensing planning area. Under s 123 (1)^a of the Licensing Act 1964 the applicant could not apply for a justices' on-licence until the committee had intimated to him that they had no objection to the grant. The committee had been set up as a result of the extensive war damage in the Birmingham area as a result of which many licences in respect of destroyed premises were placed in suspense. Accordingly, the committee, in purported exercise of its duty under s 119 (2)^b of the 1964 Act to try to secure that the number, nature and distribution of licensed premises in the area accorded with local requirements, adopted an 'equation of barrelage' policy, by which, unless an applicant for a new on-licence had obtained a licence or licences in suspense covering a barrelage equal to that which it was estimated would be needed for the new premises, objection would almost always be taken under s 123 (1). At all material times it had always been possible to obtain a licence or licences in suspense from the current holder of such licences, but only by paying for it. The price which the applicant would have had to pay, on an agreed estimated barrelage of 1,450 barrels, was £14,500. In accordance with this policy the committee refused to grant a certificate on the ground that the applicant had not obtained the appropriate licence in suspense. It was made clear that the reason for the committee's policy was that, in view of the redevelopment that was necessary, there was a large number of licences in suspense which would require to be dispersed to new sites; accordingly the principle of equating barrelage had to be accepted by all applicants if the Birmingham Corporation were not to be left to pay out considerable sums for compensation in respect of licences which would never be re-sited. It was thus conceded that one of the objects of the policy was to relieve the corporation of the liability to pay compensation. The applicant applied for an order of mandamus directing the committee to hear and determine his application on the ground, inter alia, that they were acting ultra vires in requiring him to purchase barrelage before they would grant him a certificate.

Held – In seeking to relieve the corporation from the liability to compensate the holders of licences in suspense and in formulating the policy of equating barrelage the committee had taken into consideration a factor which was quite irrelevant to the duties laid down in s 119 (2); accordingly the application for mandamus would be granted and the committee directed to consider the application on proper grounds (see p 743 g and j to p 744 a, post).

^a Section 123 (1) is set out at p 741 b, post

^b Section 119 (2) is set out at p 741 d, post

R v Bowman [1898] 1 QB 663 applied.

Notes

For the general duties of licensing planning committees, see 22 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 643, para 1353.

For the principles on which mandamus will be granted, see 11 ibid 85-87, para 161, and for cases on the subject, see 16 Digest (Repl) 316, 317, 945-952.

For the Licensing Act 1964, ss 119, 123, see 17 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 1168, 1172.

Cases referred to in judgment

R v Bowman [1898] 1 QB 663, 67 LJQB 463, 78 LT 230, 62 JP 374, 16 Digest (Repl) 462, 2825.

R v London (Metropolis) Licensing Planning Committee, ex parte Baker [1970] 3 All ER 269, [1971] 2 QB 226, [1970] 3 WLR 758.

R v Port of London Authority, ex parte Kynoch Ltd [1919] 1 KB 176, 88 LJKB 553, 120 LT 177, 83 JP 41, 16 Digest (Repl) 327, 1056.

R v Torquay Licensing Justices, ex parte Brockman [1951] 2 All ER 656, [1951] 2 KB 784, 115 JP 514, Digest (Cont Vol A) 951, 214a.

Cases also cited

R v Athay (1758) 2 Burr 653, 97 ER 494.

R v Rotherham Licensing Justices, ex parte Chapman [1939] 2 All ER 710.

Sagnata Investments Ltd v Norwich Corp'n [1971] 2 All ER 1441, [1971] 2 QB 614, [1971] 3 WLR 133.

Motion for mandamus

This was an application by way of motion by Stephen Kennedy for an order of mandamus directed to the respondent licensing planning committee for the licensing planning area of Birmingham ('the committee'), requiring them to hear and determine an application for the grant of a certificate of non-objection to a grant of a justices' on-licence for a new hotel under construction on a site adjoining New Street, Birmingham. The grounds of the application were (i) that the committee were acting ultra vires in requiring the applicant to purchase barrellage before they would grant him the certificate, (ii) that the committee were acting unlawfully in adopting a policy which fettered their discretion and prevented them from carrying out their duties under s 119 of the Licensing Act 1964, and (iii) the policy which the committee had adopted was unlawful as it was contrary to the public interest. The facts are set out in the judgment of Ashworth J.

D W Tudor Price for the applicant.

R A W Sears for the committee.

Cur adv vult

21st December. ASHWORTH J read the following judgment. I am instructed by Lord Widgery CJ to say that he has read the judgment which I am about to read, and that he agrees with it.

In these proceedings counsel moves on behalf of the applicant, one Stephen Kennedy, for an order of mandamus directed to the respondent licensing planning committee for the licensing planning area of Birmingham requiring them to hear and determine according to law an application for the grant of a certificate of non-objection to the grant of a justices' on-licence for a new hotel now under construction a on a site adjoining New Street in the city of Birmingham. The need for such a certificate arises by reason of s 123 (1) of the Licensing Act 1964 which provides:

'No new justices' licence, other than a Part IV licence, shall be granted for any premises in a licensing planning area unless the licensing justices are satisfied that the licensing planning committee have no objection to the grant.'

b The new hotel is in a licensing planning area and accordingly a certificate of non-objection, as it is called, is required before a justices' on-licence can be obtained.

It is convenient at the start of this judgment to set out the statutory duty of the licensing planning committee (hereinafter called 'the committee') which is laid down in s 119 (2) of the Licensing Act 1964 in the following terms:

c 'It shall be the duty of every licensing planning committee to review the circumstances of its area and to try to secure, after such consultation and negotiation as it may think desirable, and by the exercise of the powers conferred on it by this Part of this Act, that the number, nature and distribution of licensed premises in the area, the accommodation provided in them and the facilities given in them for obtaining food, accord with local requirements, regard being had in particular to any redevelopment or proposed redevelopment of the area.'

The committee was originally set up because of the extensive war damage caused in and around Birmingham which resulted in the area being declared a licensing planning area. Quite apart from any licensing considerations, the city of Birmingham was faced with the task of redeveloping the stricken area and it is manifest that if the programme of redevelopment were to achieve success, there would have to be close consultation between the committee and the corporation. Indeed by para 1 (b) of Sch 11 to the Licensing Act 1964, it is provided that the committee shall include members of the local planning authorities having jurisdiction in the area.

f One result, stemming from the extensive war damage and also from compulsory purchase orders made in pursuance of schemes for redevelopment, was that a very considerable number of licences was placed in suspense. It is this feature, together with the policy adopted for the purpose of dealing with it, that has given rise to the present proceedings.

g It is apparent from the documents exhibited to the affidavit sworn herein by the chairman of the committee that the existence of these licences in suspense presented to the committee and the corporation of Birmingham a serious problem. The solution which they adopted, and which is challenged in these proceedings, was to institute a policy described as 'equation of barrelage'. The court was informed that no other area had adopted a similar policy, but that fact cannot affect its legality.

h In practice the policy means that, unless an applicant for a new on-licence has obtained a licence or licences in suspense covering a barrelage equal to that which is estimated to be needed for the new premises, objection will almost always be taken under s 123 of the 1964 Act. It has at all material times been possible to obtain a licence or licences in suspense from the current holder of such a licences, but only by paying for it. The price which the present applicant would have to pay, on an agreed estimated barrelage of 1,450 barrels, would be £14,500 and it is not surprising that he questions the policy under which he would have to pay so large a sum in order to obtain an on-licence. The reason underlying this policy is made clear in several places in the documents exhibited to the chairman's affidavit. An example is the following extract from a memorandum submitted to the departmental committee on licensing planning by the committee:

'Where redevelopment is necessary in older Cities and towns usually there is a concentration of licences which will require to be dispersed to new sites. In such circumstances the principle of equating barrelage must be accepted by all applicants if the Local Authority is not to be left to pay out considerable sums for compensation in respect of licences which will never be re-sited.' a

Counsel for the committee candidly admitted that one at least of the objects of the policy was to relieve the corporation of a liability to pay compensation, but he contended that this was legitimate.

One issue which might have arisen is the question whether in the circumstances of this case the remedy by way of mandamus is available to the applicant in order to challenge the decision of the committee. However counsel for the committee expressly disclaimed any intention of arguing to the contrary and in my judgment he was right in taking this course. If authority is needed in support of this view, it can be found in the recent decision of this court in *R v London (Metropolis) Licensing Planning Committee, ex parte Baker*¹. b

It is now well established that provided a tribunal is willing to consider any application which may be made to it, there is prima facie nothing wrong in its formulating and declaring a policy which it will apply generally to applications that may be made to it. In *R v Port of London Authority, ex parte Kynoch Ltd*², Bankes LJ said: c

'There are on the one hand cases where a tribunal in the honest exercise of its discretion has adopted a policy, and, without refusing to hear an applicant, intimates to him what its policy is, and that after hearing him it will in accordance with its policy decide against him, unless there is something exceptional in his case. I think counsel for the applicants would admit that, if the policy has been adopted for reasons which the tribunal may legitimately entertain, no objection could be taken to such a course.' d

On the other hand, it is equally well established that if, in formulating its policy, a tribunal takes into account an irrelevant consideration or, as it is sometimes put, extraneous matter, its refusal of an application on the basis of such a policy can be challenged by way of mandamus. The legal position is fully considered in the judgment of this court in *R v Torquay Licensing Justices, ex parte Brockman*³. As an example of a tribunal being influenced by an extraneous consideration, reference may be made to *R v Bowman*⁴ in which justices were held to have acted wrongly in annexing to the grant of a licence a condition of payment of money intended by them to be applied to the relief of rates. It is interesting to note that in that case the justices also annexed a condition that the applicant should surrender three licences held by him, and on the legality of that condition Wills J⁵ declined to express a definite opinion, although he inclined to the view that the justices might lawfully have annexed it. e

The crux of the present case is the question whether the committee's policy of insisting that barrelage should be equated before a certificate of non-objection would be granted involves them in taking into account an extraneous consideration. In order to answer this question it is necessary to consider carefully the terms of s 119 (2) of the Licensing Act 1964, which have already been set out in full. f

The first duty of the committee, imposed by the subsection, is to review the circumstances of its area. Counsel for the committee submitted that this is a continuing duty and that, as development or redevelopment of the area proceeds, the committee is under a duty to see that licensed premises are correctly planned. For my part I think that this submission is right. Redevelopment is normally planned and carried g

¹ [1970] 3 All ER 269, [1971] 2 QB 226

² [1919] 1 KB 176 at 184

³ [1951] 2 All ER 656, [1951] 2 KB 784

⁴ [1898] 1 QB 663

⁵ [1898] 1 QB at 666 h

a out in stages and I agree that it is the committee's duty to keep the process under review in regard to licensed premises.

The second duty is to try to secure that the number, nature and distribution of licensed premises in the area accord with local requirements. In performing this duty, and indeed the first duty too, the committee has to have regard to any redevelopment or proposed redevelopment of the area.

b Counsel for the applicant emphasised the two words 'licensed premises' and contrasted them with the single word 'licences' which is not mentioned in s 119 (2). In his submission the committee is not concerned with licences at all, whether they are in existence or in suspense. It is concerned with licensed premises and in particular with their number, nature and distribution. The three specific matters last mentioned are essentially matters of planning and are to a large extent matters of local geography.

c I agree with counsel for the committee that the words 'licensed premises' are not to be limited to premises in existence at the time when the committee is called on to consider an application. The committee is not only entitled but is bound to look to the future, if it is to have due regard to the proposed development of the area. But at the same time the look into the future must be directed to the number, nature and distribution of licensed premises, and not to other considerations.

d It is in my view important to note that the policy adopted by the committee involves the acquisition of a licence or licences in suspense and not the surrender of a licence attached to existing licensed premises. In other words, there are no licensed premises covered by on-licences in suspense, although no doubt the holders of such licences might apply for their removal to other premises. It is unnecessary in this case to decide whether the committee would be justified in calling on an applicant e for a certificate of non-objection to surrender or acquire licences for existing licensed premises; like Wills J in *Bowman's case*⁶ I express no definite opinion. But in my view there is a great difference between licences for existing premises and licences in suspense, and it is only with the latter that this case is concerned.

In my judgment the principles applied in *Bowman's case*⁷ are equally applicable to this case. In Bowman's case Wills J said⁶:

f 'The justices had no more right to require the payment of money for public purposes than to require that it should be paid into their own pockets.'

In the present case the committee is seeking to relieve the corporation of Birmingham from the liability to compensate the holders of licences in suspense, and in my view g in formulating the policy of equating barrellage the committee has taken into consideration a factor which is quite irrelevant to the duties laid down in s 119 (2).

Counsel for the committee contended that even if the policy of the committee were held to be unjustifiable, nonetheless an order of mandamus should not issue. He pointed out that the policy has been applied over a considerable period without being challenged and he submitted that in the circumstances this court in its discretion h should refuse relief. For my part I feel quite unable to give effect to this submission. The corporation have already obtained considerable financial benefit as a result of the policy and I see no reason why they should receive more. Moreover the sum which the applicant would have to pay, if the policy were upheld, is no less than £14,500 and in my view it would be wrong to deny him relief from the obligation to pay it as the price of a certificate under s 123.

j In conclusion it is worth stating that counsel for the committee conceded that, apart from the issue of barrellage equation, the applicant would have obtained a certificate of non-objection. For this reason it has been essential to consider that issue with particular care. In my judgment this motion succeeds and the order of mandamus should go directing the committee to consider the application in the light of the judgment of this court. a GRIFFITHS J. I agree.

6 [1898] 1 QB at 666

7 [1898] 1 QB 663

Mandamus granted. Leave to appeal granted. b

Solicitors: Beckman & Beckman (for the applicant); Sharpe, Pritchard & Co, agents for Town Clerk, Birmingham (for the respondent committee).

N P Metcalfe Esq Barrister.

Morgan v Quality Tools & Engineering (Stourbridge) Ltd c

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND BRIDGE JJ

18th NOVEMBER 1971

National insurance – Contributions – Recovery – Arrears of contributions – Conviction for failing to pay contributions – Liability on conviction to pay amount equal to unpaid contributions – Order for payment by court on conviction – Power to recover sums by civil proceedings – Whether court which enters conviction bound to make order for payment – National Insurance Act 1965, s 95 (1), (3), (9). d

The respondent company was convicted by justices on 20 informations charging it with failing to pay weekly contributions in respect of specified employees, contrary to the National Insurance Act 1965, s 8 (2)^a. It was also found liable to pay arrears of other contributions as set out in notices served under s 95 (3)^b of the 1965 Act. The justices imposed a fine in respect of each information but refused to make an order against the respondent company for the recovery of the unpaid contributions which were the subject-matter of the informations and of the notices under s 95 (3), on the grounds (a) that s 95 (1)^c and (3) of the 1965 Act did not impose a duty on them to make such an order, and (b) that the recovery of the sum involved (£2,904) was more appropriate to civil proceedings under s 95 (9)^d than to proceedings for a penalty in a magistrates' court. e

Held – Although no reference was made in terms to any order for payment being made by the court which entered the conviction, the effect of the words 'shall be liable to pay to the National Insurance Fund' in s 95 (1) and (3) of the 1965 Act was to impose a mandatory duty on the justices to make an order for the payment of the contributions, since the scheme of the 1965 Act was such that the legislature must have intended that an order for payment after conviction would follow as a matter of course (see p 748 e h and j and p 749 c, post). f

Dictum of Lord Goddard CJ in Shilvock v Booth [1956] 1 All ER at 384 applied. g

Notes h

For the recovery of national insurance contributions on prosecution, see 27 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 706, para 1286, and for cases on the subject, see 35 Digest (Repl) 803, 8-10.

For the National Insurance Act 1965, ss 8 and 95, see 23 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 262, 363. j

^a Section 8 (2) is set out at p 746 g, post

^b Section 95 (3), so far as material, is set out at p 747 a to d, post

^c Section 95 (1) is set out at p 746 j, post

^d Section 95 (9) is set out at p 747 j, post

Case referred to in judgment

- a Shilvock v Booth [1956] 1 All ER 382, [1956] 1 WLR 135, 120 JP 133, 35 Digest (Repl) 803, 8.

Case also cited

Leach v Litchfield [1960] 3 All ER 739, [1960] 1 WLR 1392.

Case stated

b This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the county borough of Warley in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Old Hill on 21st April 1971 whereby they convicted the respondent company, Quality Tools & Engineering (Stourbridge) Ltd, on 20 informations preferred by the appellant, Dennis John Morgan, an officer of the Department of Health and Social Security, alleging failure to pay contributions in respect of employees, contrary to the National Insurance Act 1965, s 8 (2). The justices having convicted the respondent company, the appellant proved that notices under s 95 of the National Insurance Act 1965 had been served, with the summonses in respect of the 20 informations, of his intention in the event of conviction of the respondent company for the 20 offences to give evidence of the failure of the respondent company to pay other contributions under the National Insurance Act 1965 and under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act 1965 for the persons referred to in the informations and other persons employed by the respondent company which amounted in total to £2904.43 and which remained unpaid. The appellant therefore applied to the justices for an order, under s 95 (3) of the National Insurance Act 1965, for the payment by the respondent company of the arrears of contributions in the amount of £2904.43.

c It was contended by the appellant that the justices should make such an order having regard to the fact that the informations had been found to be proved and that the notices in respect of the arrears of contributions had been duly proved.

The justices were of opinion that: (a) The respondent company having been convicted on each of the 20 informations was, under s 8 (2) of the National Insurance Act 1965, liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £10 in respect of each of their 20 offences; and accordingly the justices imposed a fine of £5 on the respondent company in respect of each of the 20 informations, making a total of £100 in penalties. (b) The appellant, having proved the informations and having proved that the notices under s 95 (3) of the National Insurance Act 1965 had been duly served and that the arrears of total contributions amounting to £2904.43 remained unpaid at the time of the conviction of the respondent company, was entitled to apply for an order for payment of such arrears and the justices had jurisdiction under s 95 to make the order; the justices, however, came to the conclusion that the words in s 95 'shall be liable to pay to the National Insurance Fund . . . a sum equal to the total of all the contributions . . . which remain unpaid at the date of the conviction' were not mandatory on them to make such an order; having regard to the financial position of the respondent company the justices were of opinion that the amount involved, ie £2904.43, was so large, that in the default of payment the powers of a magistrates' court to enforce the sum as a penalty being restricted to the issue of a distress warrant for distraint of the respondent company's goods, were not so adequate as those applicable to recovery by action in civil proceedings. They considered that in view of the amount involved the recovery of these arrears should be effected under the provisions of s 95 (9) of the National Insurance Act 1965 and accordingly made no order against the respondent company for the payment of arrears of contributions.

j The questions for the opinion of the High Court were: (a) Whether by reason of the words 'shall be liable' in s 95 (3) of the National Insurance Act 1965, it was mandatory on the court to make an order for payment of arrears of contributions if the court convicted under s 95 (1) and the notice referred to in s 95 (3) had been duly served, in view of the fact that the appellant could utilise the provision of s 95 (9) to enforce the recovery of arrears of large amounts in the High Court. (b) If such an order must be made, could the magistrates' court ask the appellant to proceed to enforce by civil proceedings without the justices having to go through the procedure of allowing time to pay and delaying the enforcement action by abortive distress, having regard to ss 63 (1), 64 (1) and 65 (1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952.

Gordon Slynn for the appellant.

The respondent company did not appear and was not represented.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the county borough of Warley who on 21st April 1971 convicted the respondent company on 20 informations, each alleging that on a certain day at a specified place in Warley, the respondent company did fail to pay a contribution under the National Insurance Act 1965 in respect of a specified week and in respect of a specified employee. The informations are identical one with the other except in regard to the date, the week charged and the name of the employee. In fact there were five employees chosen for specimen charges, and in respect of each of them charges are made for four separate weeks.

Having found the offences proved, the justices convicted on each of the 20 informations; they fined the respondent company £5 on each of the informations, and then arose the question which brings the matter before this court, namely the question whether they should order payment of the unpaid contributions both in respect of these 20 informations and other like informations which were established before them.

To understand the considerations which arise in regard to any such order for payment, one must go to the legislation, and it will be remembered that under the National Insurance Act 1965 where a person is employed under a contract of service a single stamp is purchased by the employer in order to pay to the National Insurance Fund the total contribution due from the employer and the employee. Having paid the sum and thus made the total contribution, the employer is normally allowed to reimburse himself the employee's portion by deduction from the wages. The justices find, and there was no dispute in this case, that in a number of instances the employer, namely the respondent company, had deducted the appropriate amount from the employee's wages but had not bought the stamp, and it was this conduct which gave rise to the proceedings in the court below.

Under s 8 (2) of the 1965 Act it is provided:

'If any employer or insured person fails to pay at or within the time prescribed for the purpose any contribution which he is liable under this Act to pay, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding ten pounds', and it was under that subsection that the fines of a total of £100 were imposed.

In order to see what the position is in regard to any order made by the justices for payment of the unpaid contributions one goes to s 95 of the 1965 Act. Section 95 (1) provides:

'In any case where an employer or an insured person has been convicted of the offence under section 8 (2) of this Act of failing to pay a contribution at or within the time prescribed for the purpose and the contribution remains unpaid at the date of the conviction, he shall be liable to pay to the National Insurance Fund a sum equal to the amount which he failed to pay.'

It is to be observed that the phraseology there is that he shall be liable to pay, and no reference is made in terms to any order for payment being made by the court which enters the conviction. Section 95 (3) deals with a related aspect of the same matter, because under sub-s (3) it is possible for the authority to bring in and obtain

- a payment of unpaid contributions other than those which gave rise to the specific conviction before the court. Under sub-s (3):

‘On any such conviction as is mentioned in subsection (1) or (2) of this section, if notice of intention to do so has been served with the summons or warrant, evidence may be given—(a) in the case of an employer—(i) of the failure on his part to pay at or within the time prescribed for the purpose on behalf or in respect of the same person other contributions under this Act during the two years preceding the date of the offence, or contributions under the Industrial Injuries Act on that date or during those two years; and (ii) in the case of any such conviction as is mentioned in the said subsection (1), of the failure on his part so to pay on behalf or in respect of any other person employed by him any contributions under this Act or under the Industrial Injuries Act on that date or during those two years; . . . on proof of such failure the employer or the insured person shall be liable to pay to the National Insurance Fund or, as the case may require, the Industrial Injuries Fund or each such Fund, a sum equal to the total of all the contributions under this Act or, as the case may be, the Industrial Injuries Act which he is so proved to have failed to pay and which remain unpaid at the date of the conviction.’

- b
- c
- d One finds therefore, that if the appropriate notice of what one might call other omissions is served, and if the magistrates are satisfied that the failure is proved, then the same obligation to pay unpaid contributions of the kind referred to in sub-s (3) arises as in the case of unpaid contributions the subject of the conviction itself under sub-s (1).

- e The debate in this case revolves on the effect and meaning of the provision that in either instance the person at fault shall be ‘liable to pay’ the unpaid contributions. Further light is thrown on this by s 95 (6), which provides:

‘In England or Wales, any sum ordered to be paid to the National Insurance Fund or the Industrial Injuries Fund under this section shall be recoverable as a penalty.’

f

The method of recovery as a penalty is thus clearly provided.

Section 95 (8), which is of some relevance here, as the respondent is a company, is in these terms:

‘If the employer being a body corporate, fails to pay to the National Insurance Fund or the Industrial Injuries Fund any sum which the employer has been ordered to pay under this section, that sum, or such part thereof as remains unpaid, shall be a debt due to the National Insurance Fund or the Industrial Injuries Fund, as the case may be, jointly and severally from any directors of the body corporate who knew, or could reasonably be expected to have known, of the failure to pay the contribution or contributions in question.’

h

That is an important additional right whereby the fund can recover from the directors of a respondent company under the terms of the section, and it is to be observed that the subsection contemplates an order to pay, because the power to recover from directors is contingent on there having been an order made to pay. I should have drawn attention when dealing with sub-s (6) to the fact that there again is a reference to a sum ordered to be paid. It is therefore quite evident in my judgment that the Act contemplates that the convicting court may make an order in those terms.

j

I ought to conclude my references to s 95 by reading sub-s (9):

‘Nothing in this section shall be construed as preventing the recovery of any sums due to the National Insurance Fund or the Industrial Injuries Fund by means of civil proceedings.’

There is thus the possibility of recovering the sum as a penalty under sub-s (6) or by civil proceedings under sub-s (9). a

The justices took a great deal of trouble with this, to them, no doubt somewhat difficult case, and although they had no difficulty in deciding that the fine to which I have already made reference should be imposed, they obviously were reluctant to make an order for payment of the unpaid contributions, the total of which in this case had achieved the rather substantial sum of £2,904. It was contended before them on behalf of the appellant that there was a duty on them to make such an order, and that in substance they had no discretion in the matter at all. They were, as I say, somewhat reluctant, and I think it was for a very practical reason. I think they felt, rightly or wrongly, that the recovery of a sum of this kind was much more appropriate to civil proceedings than to proceedings for a penalty in the magistrates' court. They refer to a matter no doubt close to their hearts, namely the time involved in collection by weekly instalments of such a sum and all the complications with which of course they were very familiar. They concluded that on the true view of this case the proper remedy was recovery in civil proceedings under sub-s (9), and that it was within their discretion to refuse to make an order for payment with a view to recovery as a penalty. The short question is whether they had such a discretion, or whether, as the appellant contends before us today, it was in fact mandatory on them to make the order requested. b
c
d

Approaching the matter devoid of authority I would certainly have been inclined to the view that there was here no discretion. It is significant, I think, that s 95 at no time provides in what circumstances an order for payment is to be made. Both in sub-s (6) and in sub-s (8) it seems to assume that such an order for payment will be made, and having regard to the scheme of the section, and I think the scheme of the Act as a whole, I would have thought in the absence of authority that the proper view was that Parliament had intended an order for payment to follow as a matter of course once the failure to pay the relevant contributions had been established and the other procedural steps in the section had been taken. e

The matter, however, is not devoid of authority. It was the subject of an observation by Lord Goddard CJ in *Shilcock v Booth*¹. This was a case in which under the National Insurance Act 1946 and regulations² made under it, provisions which I may say for all practical purposes are in pari materia with the Act we are now considering, justices had taken the view that they had no jurisdiction to make an order for payment of arrears of contributions. Nothing turns on the fact that they had, one might say now, obviously the power to make an order, but it is relevant to observe that at the end of his judgment, a judgment with which the other members of the court concurred, Lord Goddard CJ referred to the very point with which this court is now concerned. Dealing with a convicted person who had failed to pay contributions, he said³: f
g

'He [a convicted person] is liable to pay these contributions as he is liable to pay the fine; and, although the draftsman might have written "On proof of such failure the insured person shall be ordered to pay", it is clear enough that that is what is meant. It is a summary and cheap method of recovering these contributions without further proceedings. For these reasons, I think the justices came to a wrong decision, and this case must go back with a direction that it is their duty to make an order that the respondent should pay the contributions which it has been proved he has failed to pay . . .'

h

That, if I may respectfully say so, entirely accords with my first impression of the meaning of this legislation, and I would follow it without hesitation. I would add only one word in regard to the justices' belief, that it was more appropriate that civil i a proceedings were used in this case, by referring again to s 95 (8), which gives the National Insurance Fund a special remedy against directors of a limited company which is a remedy which would not exist under the ordinary civil law. Accordingly, the justices were wrong in their conclusion that the civil remedy must necessarily be as good as the penal remedy because I think they failed to notice under that subsection the additional penal remedy.

¹ [1956] 1 All ER 382, [1956] 1 WLR 135

² I.e. the National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations 1948 (SI 1948 No 1417)

³ [1956] 1 All ER at 384, [1956] 1 WLR at 138

b I would allow the appeal and send the case back to the magistrates, using the words of Lord Goddard CJ in *Shilvock v Booth*⁴, namely, with a direction that it is their duty to make an order for payment of the agreed sum of £2,094.

ASHWORTH J. I agree.

c BRIDGE J. I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor: Solicitor, Department of Health and Social Security (for the appellant).

Gordon H Scott Esq. Barrister.

d British Railways Board v Herrington

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD REID, LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, LORD WILBERFORCE, LORD PEARSON AND LORD DIPLOCK

e 9th, 11th, 12th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 19th, 22nd NOVEMBER 1971, 16th FEBRUARY 1972

f Occupier – Negligence – Trespasser – Duty owed by occupier to trespasser – Duty in respect of concealed dangers on property – Duty to trespassers likely to come on to property – Child trespasser on railway – Electrified railway line – Failure by occupier to maintain adequate fence – Railway line passing alongside field open to the public – Chain link fence marking boundary of railway line with field – Fence broken down and giving easy access to short cut across railway – Occupier notified that children had been seen on line – Failure to inspect or repair fence – Child walking on to line seriously injured by electrified rail – Whether occupier liable for breach of duty to child.

g The plaintiff, a boy aged six, went with his two older brothers to play in a field which was National Trust property freely open to the public and frequented by children. Through the field ran a path which led to an electrified railway track owned by the British Railways Board ('the board'). Shortly before reaching the line of a four foot high chain link fence, which had been erected to border the railway track, the path turned to the right and led to a footbridge over the track. Where the path turned to the right, however, there was a further short stretch of trodden path which continued straight up to the fence. At the point where the trodden path reached it, the fence had become detached from one of the supporting posts and pressed down to within ten inches of the ground. The evidence showed that the fence had been in that condition for some time and that people had been using the gap to take a short cut across the railway line. There was also evidence that employees of the board had reported some seven weeks before the accident that children had been seen on the stretch of railway line but no action had been taken by the board in consequence of the report. After playing in the field for some time with his brothers the plaintiff wandered off, crossed the gap in the fence and walked on to the railway line where he was severely injured by the electrified rail. In an action by the plaintiff, the board claimed that they were not liable to him for, being a trespasser on the railway track, they owed him no duty of care, nor had they shown any reckless disregard for his presence on the track.

Held – (i) Although as a general rule a person who trespassed on the land of another did so at his own risk, and the occupier of the land did not owe him the common duty of care owed to persons lawfully on the land, it did not follow that an occupier was never, in any circumstances, under a duty to take steps to protect a trespasser from potential danger; nor was the occupier's duty limited to refraining from acting with the deliberate intention of doing harm to a trespasser actually on the land or with reckless disregard of his presence there. Where an occupier knew that there were trespassers on his land, or knew of circumstances that made it likely that trespassers would come on to his land, and also knew of physical facts in relation to the state of his land or some activity carried out on the land which would constitute a serious danger to persons on the land who were unaware of those facts, the occupier was under a duty to take reasonable steps to enable the trespasser to avoid the danger. That duty would only arise in circumstances where the likelihood of the trespasser being exposed to the danger was such that, by the standards of common sense and common humanity, the occupier could be said to be culpable in failing to take reasonable steps to avoid the danger (see p 758 e to h, p 765 c to e, p 769 a and b, p 772 h, p 773 g, p 774 a to c, p 777 e to j, p 779 f to h, p 783 e and f, p 786 c, p 794 h and j, p 795 f to h, and p 796 a to d, post).

(ii) Accordingly the board were in breach of their duty to the plaintiff for they had brought on to their land in the electrified rail a lethal and, to a small child, a concealed danger; it would have been easy for them to have maintained and enforced a reasonable system of inspection and repair of the boundary fence; it was known to them that children were entitled and accustomed to play on the other side of the fence and they must have known that a young child might easily cross a defective fence and run into grave danger. Although in failing to take any steps to maintain the fence in good repair the board could not be said to have acted with reckless disregard of the plaintiff's presence on the track, they had failed to act with due regard to humane considerations and were, in the circumstances, culpable (see p 759 b and c, p 760 h, p 761 h, p 765 h, p 767 d, p 779 c, p 786 d and p 796 f, post).

Dicta of Best J in Ilott v Wilkes [1814-23] All ER Rep at 282, of Kitto J in Thompson v Bankstown Municipal Council (1952) 87 CLR at 642, 643, and of Dixon CJ and Windeyer J in Railways Comr (NSW) v Cardy (1961) 104 CLR at 286, 321, 322, applied.

Railways Comr v Quinlan [1964] 1 All ER 897 explained.

Edwards v Railway Executive [1952] 2 All ER 430 distinguished.

R Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck [1929] All ER Rep 1 not followed.

Dictum of Lord Denning MR in Videan v British Transport Commission [1963] 2 All ER at 864 disapproved.

Decision of the Court of Appeal sub nom Herrington v British Railways Board [1971] 1 All ER 897 affirmed on other grounds.

Notes

For the duty owed by occupiers of premises to trespassers, see 28 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 53, 54, para 49, and for cases on the subject, see 36 Digest (Repl) 70, 71, 376-382.

For the standard of care in relation to trespassing children, see 28 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 17, 18, para 15, and for cases on the subject, see 36 Digest (Repl) 120, 121, 600-611.

Cases referred to in opinions

Adams v Naylor [1946] 2 All ER 241, [1946] AC 543, 115 LJKB 356, 175 LT 97, affg [1944] 2 All ER 21, [1944] 1 KB 750, 38 Digest (Repl) 53, 273.

- a* Addie (R) & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1, 98 LJPC 119, 140 LT 650; rvsg sub nom Dumbreck v Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd 1928 SC 547, 36 Digest (Repl) 120, 604.
- Baker v Bethnal Green Corp'n* [1945] 1 All ER 135, 109 JP 72, 43 LGR 75, 36 Digest (Repl) 217, 1148.
- Billings (A C) & Sons Ltd v Riden* [1957] 3 All ER 1, [1958] AC 240, [1957] 3 WLR 496, Digest (Cont Vol A) 1145, 1056.
- b* Bird v Holbrook (1828) 4 Bing 628, 2 Man & Ry MC 198, 1 Moo & P 607, 6 LJOSCP 146, 46 Digest (Repl) 421, 656.
- Blyth v Birmingham Waterworks Co* (1856) 11 Exch 781, [1843-60] All ER Rep 478, 25 LJEx 212, 26 LTOS 261, 20 JP 247, 36 Digest (Repl) 5, 1.
- Buckland v Guildford Gas Light and Coke Co* [1948] 2 All ER 1086, [1949] 1 KB 410, 113 JP 44, 20 Digest (Repl) 234, 149.
- c* Carlgarth, The, The Otarama [1927] P 93, 96 LJP 162, 136 LT 518, 17 Asp MLC 195, 38 Digest (Repl) 451, 1007.
- Carmarthenshire County Council v Lewis* [1955] 1 All ER 565, [1955] AC 549, [1955] 2 WLR 517, 119 JP 230; affg sub nom Lewis v Carmarthenshire County Council [1953] 2 All ER 1403, [1953] 1 WLR 1439, 118 JP 51, Digest (Cont Vol A) 168, 569a.
- d* Cooke v Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland [1909] AC 229, [1908-10] All ER Rep 16, 78 LJPC 79, 100 LT 626, 36 Digest (Repl) 118, 590.
- Creed v John McGeoch & Sons Ltd* [1955] 3 All ER 123, [1955] 1 WLR 1005, Digest (Cont Vol A) 1169, 588b.
- Davis v St Mary's Demolition & Excavation Co Ltd* [1954] 1 All ER 578, [1954] 1 WLR 592, Digest (Cont Vol A) 1169, 570b.
- Deane v Clayton* (1817) 7 Taunt 489, 1 Moo CP 203, 129 ER 196, 46 Digest (Repl) 394, 360.
- e* Devlin v Jeffray's Trustees (1902) 40 SCLR 92, 7 Digest (Repl) 293, *170.
- Donoghue (or McAlister) v Stevenson* [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1, 1932 SC (HL) 31, 101 LJPC 119, 147 LT 281, 36 Digest (Repl) 85, 458.
- Dunster v Abbott* [1953] 2 All ER 1572, Digest (Cont Vol A) 1157, 375a.
- Edwards v Railway Executive* [1952] 2 All ER 430, [1952] AC 737, 36 Digest (Repl) 121, 611.
- f* Excelsior Wire Rope Co Ltd v Callan [1930] AC 404, [1930] All ER Rep 1, 99 LJKB 380, 142 LT 531, 94 JP 174, 36 Digest (Repl) 118, 592.
- Gautret v Egerton, Jones v Egerton* (1867) LR 2 CP 371, 37 LJCP 191, sub nom Gantret v Egerton, Jones v Egerton 16 LT 17, 36 Digest (Repl) 47, 247.
- Glasgow Corp'n v Taylor* [1922] 1 AC 44, [1921] All ER Rep 1, 91 LJPC 49, 126 LT 262, 86 JP 89, 36 Digest (Repl) 119, 597.
- g* Goldman v Hargrave [1966] 2 All ER 989, [1967] AC 645, [1966] 3 WLR 513, [1967] ALR 113, Digest (Cont Vol B) 559, 382Aa.
- Grand Trunk Ry Co of Canada v Barnett* [1911] AC 361, 80 LJPC 117, 104 LT 362, 36 Digest (Repl) 71, 379.
- Haley v London Electricity Board* [1964] 3 All ER 185, [1965] AC 778, [1964] 3 WLR 479, 129 JP 14, Digest (Cont Vol B) 331, 2091a.
- h* Hardy v Central London Ry Co [1920] 3 KB 459, [1920] All ER Rep 205, 89 LJKB 1187, 124 LT 136, 36 Digest (Repl) 120, 603.
- Hawkins v Coulsdon & Purley Urban District Council* [1954] 1 All ER 97, [1954] 1 QB 319, [1954] 2 WLR 122, 118 JP 101, Digest (Cont Vol A) 1156, 869a.
- Hay (or Bourhill) v Young* [1942] 2 All ER 396, [1943] AC 92, 111 LJPC 97, 167 LT 261, 36 Digest (Repl) 16, 66.
- i* Heaven v Pender (1883) 11 QBD 503, [1881-85] All ER Rep 35, 52 LJQB 702, 49 LT 357, 47 JP 709, 36 Digest (Repl) 7, 10.
- Hillen and Pettigrew v ICI (Alkali) Ltd* [1936] AC 65, [1935] All ER Rep 555, 104 LJKB 473, 153 LT 403, 36 Digest (Repl) 71, 377.
- Holland v District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanarkshire* 1909 2 SLT 7, 1909 SC 1142, 7 Digest (Repl) 294, *175.

- Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd* [1970] 2 All ER 294, [1970] AC 1004, [1970] 2 WLR 1140, [1970] 1 Lloyd's Rep 453, Digest (Cont Vol C) 731, 133*b*.
- Ilott v Wilkes* (1820) 3 B & Ald 304, [1814-23] All ER Rep 277, 106 ER 674, 46 Digest (Repl) 421, 655.
- Indermaur v Dames* (1866) LR 1 CP 274, [1861-73] All ER Rep 15, Har & Ruth 243, 35 LJCP 184, 14 LT 484; affd (1867) LR 2 CP 311, 36 Digest (Repl) 46, 246.
- Jay v Whitfield* (1817) 3 B & Ald 308, 106 ER 676, 46 Digest (Repl) 421, 654.
- Kingzett v British Railways Board* (1968) 112 Sol Jo 625, Digest (Cont Vol C) 742, 611*c*.
- Latham v Richard Johnson & Nephew Ltd* [1913] 1 KB 398, [1911-13] All ER Rep 117, 82 LJKB 258, 108 LT 4, 77 JP 137, 36 Digest (Repl) 49, 262.
- Lowery v Walker* [1910] 1 KB 173, 79 LJKB 297, 101 LT 873, rvsd HL [1911] AC 10, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12, 86 LJKB 138, 103 LT 674, 36 Digest (Repl) 55, 302.
- Lynch v Nurdin* (1841) 1 QB 29, [1835-42] All ER Rep 167, Arn & H 158, 4 Per & Dar 672, 10 LJQB 73, 5 JP 319, 36 Digest (Repl) 33, 150.
- McCarthy v Wellington City* [1966] NZLR 481, Digest (Cont Vol B) 560, *510*c*.
- M'Glone v British Railways Board* 1966 SC (HL) 1, 1966 SLT 2.
- Miller v South of Scotland Electricity Board* 1958 SC (HL) 20, 1958 SLT 229, 20 Digest (Repl) 237, *91.
- Mooney v Lanarkshire County Council* 1954 SC 245.
- Morran v Waddell* (1883) 11 R 44, 21 ScLR 28, 36 Digest (Repl) 124, *917.
- Mourran v Poulter* [1930] 2 KB 183, [1930] 1 All ER Rep 6, 99 LJKB 289, 143 LT 20, sub nom Moulton v Poulter 94 JP 190, 36 Digest (Repl) 71, 380.
- Munnings v Hydro-Electric Commission of Tasmania* (1971) 45 ALJR 378.
- New South Wales Transport Comrs v Barton* (1933) 49 CLR 114, (1933) Argus LR 228, 6 ALJ 459, 33 SRNSW 507, 50 NSWWN 230, 2 Digest (Repl) 306, *59.
- Perry v Thomas Wrigley Ltd* [1955] 3 All ER 243, [1955] 1 WLR 1164, Digest (Cont Vol A) 1170, 589*a*.
- Prentice v Assets Co Ltd* (1890) 17 R 484, 36 Digest (Repl) 74, *414.
- Railways Comr (NSW) v Cardy* (1961) 104 CLR 274, [1961] ALR 16, 34 ALJR 134, Digest (Cont Vol A) 1171, *867*c*.
- Railways Comr v McDermott* [1966] 2 All ER 162, [1967] 1 AC 169, [1966] 3 WLR 267, [1966] ALR 897, [1966] 1 NSW 420, Digest (Cont Vol B) 609, 398*a*.
- Railways Comr v Quinlan* [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054, [1964] 2 WLR 817, [1964-65] NSW 157, [1964] ALR 900, Digest (Cont Vol B) 558, 380*a*.
- Read v J Lyons & Co Ltd* [1946] 2 All ER 471, [1947] AC 156, [1947] LJ 39, 175 LT 413, 36 Digest (Repl) 83, 452.
- Rich v Railways Comr (NSW)* (1959) 101 CLR 135.
- Ross v Keith* (1888) 16 R 86, 26 ScLR 55, 36 Digest (Repl) 172, *397.
- Thompson v Bankstown Municipal Council* (1952) 87 CLR 619, 69 NSWWN 64, 26 Digest (Repl) 350, *248.
- United Zinc & Chemical Co v Britt* (1922) 258 US 268, 42 Sup Ct 299.
- Videan v British Transport Commission* [1963] 2 All ER 860, [1963] 2 QB 650, [1963] 3 WLR 374, Digest (Cont Vol A) 1143, 89*b*.

Appeal

This was an appeal by the British Railways Board against the order of the Court of Appeal (Salmon, Edmund Davies and Cross LJ) dated 2nd December 1970 and reported [1971] 1 All ER 897, affirming the judgment of Cairns J dated 27th February 1970 awarding damages for personal injuries to the respondent, Peter Thomas Herrington, an infant, in an action brought by him by his mother and next friend, Kathleen Louise Herrington, against the appellants for damages for negligence and/or breach of statutory duty. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest.

R A Gatehouse QC and Robert Alexander for the appellants.
D S Hunter QC and M N Chambers for the respondent.

- a Their Lordships took time for consideration.
16th February. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD REID. My Lords, on 7th June 1965 the respondent, then a child of six years old, was playing with other children on National Trust property at Mitcham which is open to the public. Immediately adjoining this property the appellants b have an electrified railway line a few yards from the boundary. Their boundary is marked by a fence which, if it had been in good repair, would have sufficed to prevent the respondent from reaching the railway line. But it was in very bad repair so that when the respondent strayed away from his playmates he was able to get through or over it. He then went a few yards farther and came in contact with the live electrified rail. Fortunately he was rescued but he had already sustained severe c injury. His age was such that he was unable to appreciate the danger of going on to the railway line and probably unable to appreciate that he was doing wrong in getting over the fence.

I have no doubt that if the appellants owed to potential child trespassers any duty of care to take steps for their safety, they were in breach of any such duty. Enquiry soon after the accident showed that this was by no means the only place where their d fence was defective and a well trodden track leading to the point where the respondent got on to their property showed that a considerable number of trespassers must have crossed the line at this point to other National Trust property on the other side. The appellants led no evidence at the trial and it cannot be inferred that they knew about these trespassers before the accident. The only evidence of their knowledge was a report produced by them which showed that they knew that a few weeks
e before the accident some children had been seen on the line at some point not very far away. But in my view the evidence was sufficient to show either that there was no systematic inspection of their fence or that if there was any system it was not operated or enforced.

The appellants' main contention is that they owed no duty to this child. They found on the leading case of *R Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck*¹. The respondent f founds on later authorities and asks us to reconsider Addie's case¹ if it cannot be distinguished. He is entitled to say that Addie's case¹ has frequently been criticised. I well remember that this decision, which reversed the decision of the Court of Session², was much criticised in Scotland at the time. But no one doubted that it had settled the law. And it has always been said to have been followed both in England and in Scotland, although it is not easy to reconcile with it much that has been g said in recent cases. The speeches in Addie's case¹ must be read in the light of the facts which are set out in Session Cases². The Lord President (Lord Clyde) said³, after stating that the boy was a trespasser:

'On the other hand, he was a member of a class of persons—to wit, the local community of working-class residents of all ages—who, to the knowledge of the h defenders, were in the habit of resorting to the field (1) as an open space; (2) as a playground; (3) as a means of access to chapel and railway station; and (4)—as regards the less well-disposed members of the local community—as a means of approach to the defenders' coal bing and wood depot for purposes of depredation. Against the latter class the defenders took the usual means of legal protection by frequent prosecutions for theft. Against the former class they took no measures of a kind calculated to be effective; and they knew that such measures as i they did take were quite ineffectual to check the habitual resort of both adults and children to the field and to the immediate neighbourhood of the haulage system.'

1 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

2 1928 SC 547

3 1928 SC at 553

Then, having said that if the presence of a trespasser near a dangerous machine is known to the proprietor he cannot disregard that, he went on⁴:

'I am unable to distinguish that case from the case in which the proprietor knows of the habitual resort of adults or children, or both, to the near neighbourhood of the dangerous machine—a habit of resort which makes it to his knowledge likely that one or more of such persons may be at the machine when he applies the motive power.'

Later he said⁵:

'The intrusion of the local public upon the defenders' field and the site of their haulage system in the present case seems to me to have been very similar to the use by the local public of an unauthorised short cut in *Lowery v Walker*⁶ . . .'

The speeches in this House in Addie's case⁷ appear to me to be intended to lay down a general rule that no occupier is under any duty to potential trespassers, whether adults or children, to do anything to protect them from danger on his land however likely it may be that they will come and run into danger and however lethal the danger may be. I find it impossible to reconcile these speeches with any idea that the occupier will incur any duty of care to trespassers by carrying out dangerous operations on his land even when he knows that trespassers are very likely to come on to his land and that if they come these operations may cause them injury. If he knows that trespassers are already on his land then for the first time he does incur a duty but it is a duty of a very limited kind—a duty not to act with reckless disregard of their safety.

There was nothing new in that. But the rule was laid down with stark simplicity and the speeches must have been intended to check a growing tendency of courts both in England and Scotland to try to soften its impact. The noble and learned lords appear to have had in mind that occupiers are entitled to know precisely what their duties are and nothing could be simpler than the answer which they gave.

But there were already two exceptions to this rule. The first was where the occupier had put on his land something which was dangerous and was an allurement to children. That seems to me to be easy to explain. He ought to know that by putting that allurement there he was in a sense inviting children to meddle with the dangerous thing, and the law would not permit him to do that without imposing a duty on him. His liability arose from his own choice to endanger children in that way.

The second exception is not so easy to explain. If, after a certain point not easy to define, the occupier continued to stand by and acquiesce in the coming of trespassers he was held to have given a general permission or licence to trespassers to continue to do what those trespassers had been doing. Any 'licence' of this kind was purely fictitious. There was no need to find any evidence that he had in fact consented to the coming of the trespassers or to the continuance of the trespassing. His inaction in suffering the trespassing might have been due to many other reasons than his being willing to allow it. He might prove that there was some other reason but that would not avail him.

The Court of Session decided Addie's case⁸ on the ground that the child was a licensee. On the then current trend of authority I think they were well entitled to do so. But this House⁷ thought otherwise and it appears to me that their decision must be regarded as an attempt to confine the doctrine of licence within much narrower limits than had been customary.

Later cases can hardly be said to exhibit loyal acceptance of the *Addie*⁷ doctrine.

4 1928 SC at 554

5 1928 SC at 555

6 [1911] AC 10, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12

7 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

8 1928 SC 547

a In *Excelsior Wire Rope Co Ltd v Callan*⁹ this House giving extempore judgments dismissed an appeal by the occupier without hearing the respondent. There cannot have been any intention to modify the considered judgments in *Addie's case*¹⁰, and it is perhaps a little surprising that the House was able so easily to reach a different conclusion. I can only regard the decision in *Callan's case*⁹ as founded, rightly or wrongly, on the particular facts of the case. Encouraged by the decision in *Callan's case*⁹ the Court of Appeal were able to decide against the occupier in *Mourton v Poulter*¹¹. In *Adams v Naylor*¹² there was a difference of opinion in the Court of Appeal. Scott LJ decided against the occupier on grounds that are not easy to state succinctly. Mackinnon LJ and Morton J reluctantly followed *Addie*¹³. I need not notice any other cases until *Edwards v Railway Executive*¹⁴. There persistent trespassing by children imposed no duty on the railway to keep them out or protect them. I think Lord Goddard accurately stated the law when he said¹⁵:

‘ . . . repeated trespass of itself confers no licence . . . To find a licence there must be evidence either of express permission or that the landowner has so conducted himself that he cannot be heard to say that he did not give it.’

d So far *Addie*¹³ stood, disliked but essentially unshaken. A new chapter opened with *Videan v British Transport Commission*¹⁶. A stationmaster's child strayed on to the railway and was run over. It was rightly held that the child was a trespasser and that the authority were not liable. But some obiter dicta of Lord Denning MR appear to me to be directly contrary to the decision of this House in *Addie's case*¹³. Nevertheless, they have attracted much support in subsequent cases. Having pointed out that for child trespassers innocent of any wicked intent the rule in *Addie's case*¹³ works most unfairly, he said¹⁷:

‘Hence the shifts to which generations of judges have been put to escape the rule. They have time and again turned a trespasser into a licensee so as to give him a remedy for negligence when otherwise he would have none.’

f So far I take no exception. But then he went on to discuss¹⁸ ‘a new way . . . to mitigate the harshness of the old rule’, by confining the old rule to the responsibility of the occupier for the condition of his premises and inventing a new duty towards trespassers to conduct his activities on his property with reasonable care. But in *Addie's case*¹³ the danger was not in the condition of the property; the mechanism when at rest was quite safe. The danger arose when Addie's servant began the operation of setting the mechanism in motion. If this new theory were right *Addie's case*¹³ must have gone the other way. Lord Denning MR founded the new view on foreseeability. He said¹⁹:

h ‘The true principle is this: In the ordinary way the duty to use reasonable care extends to all persons lawfully on the land, but it does not extend to trespassers; for the simple reason that he cannot ordinarily be expected to foresee the presence of a trespasser. But the circumstances may be such that he ought to foresee even the presence of a trespasser; and then the duty of care extends to the trespasser also.’

j 9 [1930] AC 404, [1930] All ER Rep 1

10 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

11 [1930] 2 KB 183, [1930] All ER Rep 6

12 [1944] 2 All ER 21, [1944] 1 KB 750, aff'd [1946] 2 All ER 241, [1946] AC 543

13 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

14 [1952] 2 All ER 430, [1952] AC 737

15 [1952] 2 All ER at 436, [1952] AC at 746, 747

16 [1963] 2 All ER 860, [1963] 2 QB 650

17 [1963] 2 All ER at 864, [1963] 2 QB at 663

18 [1963] 2 All ER at 864, [1963] 2 QB at 664

19 [1963] 2 All ER at 865, 866, [1963] 2 QB at 666

But in *Addie's case*²⁰ the presence of the children was not only foreseeable, it was very probable. Nevertheless, this House held there was no duty. a

This House in *Addie*²⁰ held that no duty at all arose until the trespassers were known to be on the land. It is easy to extend that to a case when the occupier as good as knows, where he shuts his eyes; he will not then be heard to say that he did not know. But he has no duty to do anything before the trespasser arrives. If, on the other hand, a duty were to arise before the trespassers' arrival, when that arrival is merely foreseeable or probable, the situation would be very different. The occupier would have to do what that duty required him to do to prepare for the trespassers' arrival. But that is precisely what *Addie's case*²⁰ says he need not do. I can see no way of bringing in that foreseeability test without reconsidering and overruling at least that part of the decision in *Addie*²⁰. A duty to act with humanity towards a trespasser known to be there is one thing. A duty of care towards probable trespassers is of a different order. It would completely transform the whole picture and, so far as I can see, completely supersede the *Addie*²⁰ duty in all cases where the arrival of the injured trespasser had been probable or foreseeable. b

It follows that I cannot accept all that was said in the judgment of the Privy Council in *Railways Comr v Quinlan*¹ as being consistent with the decision in *Addie's case*²⁰. In one passage it is said, I think rightly²: c

'A person's knowledge is a question of fact: such a fact is a very different thing from the objective question whether there was a reasonable likelihood of someone being present at the relevant time and place and whether a person ought to have foreseen that likelihood. Given the fact of the knowledge, the occupier comes under the obligation not to inflict intentional or reckless injury on the person of whose presence he is aware. This again is a very different thing from an obligation to take precautions in advance against the likelihood of a trespasser being present.' d

And then there is a reference to the occupier being in a position in which he as good as knows that the other is there. So far that is pure *Addie*²⁰. But a later passage³ appears to me to be inconsistent with this. It would seem to say that it is sufficient if the presence of the trespasser is extremely likely or very probable. e

So we are confronted with the position that persistent attempts have been made to confer on child trespassers greater rights and to impose on occupiers greater obligations than are to my mind consistent with the decision of this House in *Addie's case*²⁰. I shall not deal with the forthright Australian authorities farther than to say that those attempts are even more persuasive and far reaching than those in this country. So it appears to me that no satisfactory solution can be found without a re-examination of the whole problem and a reconsideration by this House of its decision in *Addie's case*²⁰. f

Child trespassers have for a very long time presented to the courts an almost insoluble problem. They could only be completely safeguarded in one or other of two ways. Either parents must be required always to control and supervise the movements of their young children, or occupiers of premises where they are likely to trespass must be required to take effective steps to keep them out or else to make their premises safe for them if they come. Neither of these is practicable. The former course was practicable at one time for a limited number of well-to-do parents but that number is now small. The latter, if practicable at all, would in most cases impose on occupiers an impossible financial burden. g

Legal principles cannot solve the problem. How far occupiers are to be required h

²⁰ [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

¹ [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054

² [1964] 1 All ER at 906, [1964] AC at 1076

³ [1964] 1 All ER at 907, [1964] AC at 1077 i

a by law to take steps to safeguard such children must be a matter of public policy. The law was uncertain when *Addie's case*⁴ was decided. That decision was intended to make the law certain. It did so. This House must have taken the view that as a matter of public policy occupiers should have no duty at all to keep out such children or to make their premises safe for them. Their only duty was a humanitarian duty not to act recklessly with regard to children whom they knew to be there.

b It may have been arguable 40 years ago that that was good public policy. But for one fact I would think it unarguable today. That is the fact that only 14 years ago Parliament when it had an obvious opportunity to alter that policy failed to do so. The law with regard to occupiers' liability to persons coming on to their land was then so unsatisfactory that Parliament found it necessary to pass for England and Wales the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957. It imposed a 'common duty of care' on occupiers towards all persons who might lawfully come on to their land. But it pointedly omitted to alter the existing law as to trespassers. At that time there was no doubt that *Addie's case*⁴ had settled the law, and under the practice then prevailing this House could not alter that decision. The Court of Appeal had not yet begun to try to modify *Addie's case*⁴. As I have already said, they had no right to do that and I do not think that in 1957 their action could reasonably have been foreseen. So I find it exceedingly difficult to interpret the silence of Parliament in the 1957 Act with regard to trespassers in any other way than as an approval of the existing law with regard to them. And that means an approval of the decision in *Addie's case*⁴.

c It is, however, I think just possible to attribute that silence to Parliament (or those who then advised Parliament) being unable to make up their minds as to what to put in place of *Addie*⁴. I say that because, when the law of Scotland on this matter was amended in 1960, Parliament (no doubt acting on more robust advice from Scotland) did alter the Scots law with regard to trespassers. It seems unlikely that on a matter of this kind Parliament would deliberately adopt quite different policies for the two countries. So I think I may be justified in attributing to indecision the silence of Parliament in 1957 with regard to trespassers in England.

d The question, then, is to what extent this House sitting in its judicial capacity can do what Parliament failed to do in 1957. I dislike usurping the functions of Parliament. But it appears to me that we are confronted with the choice of following *Addie*⁴ and putting the clock back or drastically modifying the *Addie*⁴ rules. It is suggested that such a modification can be achieved by developing the law as laid down in *Addie's case*⁴ without actually overruling any part of the decision. I do not think that that is possible. It can properly be said that one is developing the law laid down in a leading case so long but only so long as the 'development' does not require us to say that the original case was wrongly decided. But it appears to me that any acceptable 'development' of *Addie's case*⁴ must mean that *Addie's case*⁴ if it arose today would be decided the other way. The case for the pursuer in *Addie's case*⁴ was stronger on the facts than the case for the present respondent and I do not think that we could dismiss this appeal without holding or at least necessarily implying that *Addie's case*⁴ was wrongly decided.

e I do not think that it would be satisfactory merely to follow the scheme of the Scottish Act⁵. That Act provides by s 2 that the care which an occupier is required to show to a person entering his land (which includes a trespasser) in respect either of its dangerous state or of dangerous activities on it shall be—

f 'such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that that person will not suffer injury or damage by reason of any such danger.'

g That may work satisfactorily where actions for damages for failure to exercise such care are generally decided by juries. Juries do not give reasons and so no verdict of a jury can establish a precedent. But in England such actions are decided by judges who must give reasons and whose decisions can be the subject of appeal. No doubt if the matter were left at large in this way a body of case law with regard to the position of trespassers would develop over the years. The matter would in one form or another come before this House before very long and some authoritative guidance would then emerge. But I would not create such a period of uncertainty if that can be avoided, and I think it can be avoided.

4 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

5 I.e. the Occupiers' Liability (Scotland) Act 1960

The first matter to be determined is the nature of the duty owed by occupiers to trespassers. Here I think we can get good guidance from *Addie's case*⁶. The duty there laid down was a duty not to act recklessly. Recklessness has, in my opinion, a subjective meaning; it implies culpability. An action which would be reckless if done by a man with adequate knowledge, skill or resources might not be reckless if done by a man with less appreciation of or ability to deal with the situation. One would be culpable, the other not. Reckless is a difficult word. I would substitute culpable.

The duty laid down in *Addie's case*⁶ was a humanitarian duty. Normally the common law applies an objective test. If a person chooses to assume a relationship with members of the public, say by setting out to drive a car or to erect a building fronting a highway, the law requires him to conduct himself as a reasonable man with adequate skill, knowledge and resources would do. He will not be heard to say that in fact he could not attain that standard. If he cannot attain that standard he ought not to assume the responsibility which that relationship involves. But an occupier does not voluntarily assume a relationship with trespassers. By trespassing they force a 'neighbour' relationship on him. When they do so he must act in a humane manner—that is not asking too much of him—but I do not see why he should be required to do more. So it appears to me that an occupier's duty to trespassers must vary according to his knowledge, ability and resources. It has often been said that trespassers must take the land as they find it. I would rather say that they must take the occupier as they find him.

So the question whether an occupier is liable in respect of an accident to a trespasser on his land would depend on whether a conscientious humane man with his knowledge, skill and resources could reasonably have been expected to have done or refrained from doing before the accident something which would have avoided it. If he knew before the accident that there was a substantial probability that trespassers would come, I think that most people would regard as culpable failure to give any thought to their safety. He might often reasonably think, weighing the seriousness of the danger and the degree of likelihood of trespassers coming against the burden he would have to incur in preventing their entry or making his premises safe, or curtailing his own activities on his land, that he could not fairly be expected to do anything. But if he could at small trouble and expense take some effective action again I think that most people would think it inhumane and culpable not to do that. If some such principle is adopted there will no longer be any need to strive to imply a fictitious licence. It would follow that an impecunious occupier with little assistance at hand would often be excused from doing something which a large organisation with ample staff would be expected to do.

It is always easy to be wise after the event and in judging what ought to have been done one would have to put out of one's mind the fact that an accident had occurred and visualise the position of the occupier before it had happened. Quite probably this would not be the only point on his land where trespass was likely. One would have to look at his problem as a whole and ask whether if he had thought about the matter it would have been humane or decent of him to do nothing. That may sound a low standard but in fact I believe that an occupier's failure to take any preventive steps is more often caused by thoughtlessness than by any shirking of his

a moral responsibility. I think that current conceptions of social duty do require occupiers to give reasonable attention to their responsibilities as occupiers, and I see nothing in legal principles to prevent the law from requiring them to do that.

b If I apply that test to the present case I think that the appellants must be held responsible for this accident. They brought on to their land in the live rail a lethal and to a young child a concealed danger. It would have been very easy for them to have and enforce a reasonable system of inspection and repair of their boundary fence. They knew that children were entitled and accustomed to play on the other side of the fence and must have known, had any of their officers given the matter a thought, that a young child might easily cross a defective fence and run into grave danger. Yet they did nothing. I do not think that a large organisation is acting with due regard to humane considerations if its officers do not pay more attention to safety. c I would not single out the stationmaster for blame. The trouble appears to have been general slackness in the organisation. For that the appellants are responsible and I think in the circumstances culpable. I would therefore hold them liable to the respondent and dismiss this appeal.

d LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, on 7th June 1965 (Whit Monday) the respondent, a small boy aged six, went to play in a field near Mitcham called Bunces Meadow. He was with his two brothers who were a little older than he was. Bunces Meadow is National Trust property which is freely open to the public. Through it there runs a public path. For a part of its distance the path is a made-up path having a tarmacadam surface. It continues as a trodden path which makes a turn to the right. The reason for this is that straight ahead of the path there is a single line railway track, which runs between Mitcham Junction and Morden Road Halt. e By the side of the track there is a 'live' rail carrying the necessary electric current for trains which are driven along the track. The path to the right leads to a footbridge over the railway track. By crossing the railway another National Trust property, Morden Hall Park, is reached.

f The trodden path turned to the right near to but before reaching the line of the fence which had been erected to border the railway track. There was a further short stretch of trodden path (which should have been a cul-de-sac) reaching up to the fence. The fence was a chain link fence four feet high supported by concrete posts eight feet six inches apart. But at the very place where the fencing should have debarred a person from going straight on if he had not previously turned to the right it was defective. The fence was detached from one of the posts and had been pressed g down so that its top curved down to within about ten inches of the ground. The lower part of the chain link, which was rusty, was lying on the ground. The state of affairs was, as the learned judge found, that for some time before 7th June people going to Morden Hall Park had been taking a short-cut. They proceeded straight on and crossed the railway track. The fence was in so dilapidated a condition that anybody, adult or child, 'could quite easily get across on to the line'.

h The three boys played in Bunces Meadow but shortly after noon the two elder ones missed their young brother. He had wandered off. They went in search of him. One brother went through what was virtually the gap in the fencing and then found his young brother on the railway track. He was between the conductor rail and the running rail. He was lying unconscious. After help had been secured, a rescue was effected; but that was only after the boy had been most gravely injured. He suffered j very severe burns.

Certain additional facts call for mention. The learned judge was satisfied by the evidence given by two youths who had visited Bunces Meadow a number of times in the six weeks previous to 7th June that the fence had been in its dilapidated condition for at least several weeks before that date. The state of the fence and of the path lead the learned judge to think that the described condition of the fence had probably existed for months. The appellants, the British Railways Board, made no attempt to contravert any of these conclusions. They thought it prudent not to put any witness in the box. They decided to give no explanations in regard to any of the documents which discovery disclosed. Thus, there was a memorandum dated 17th April 1965 (some seven weeks before the accident) from the stationmaster's office, Mitcham Junction, to the 'line manager' stating that the guard of an afternoon train two days previously had reported to the signaller at Mitcham on arrival at Merton Park that children were on the line between Mitcham and Morden Road Halt; the memorandum stated that the Mitcham police were requested to investigate. There were various memoranda written on the date of the accident; they recorded that at 3.10 pm there was an examination of the fences in the vicinity of Bunces Meadow; three places in the vicinity were discovered where children could get on to the line through the fences. One memorandum was to the 'line manager'; another was to the 'ganger' at Mitcham. 'Control' had ordered the stationmaster (of Mitcham Junction) to examine the fences and to report and also to inform the 'ganger' to get the fences repaired immediately. The 'engineers' department were instructed to make repairs in three places. A letter of 11th June from the 'divisional manager' recorded that he was advised that the fence at the site of the accident was 'in rather a bad state' and that there were three different places where children could get on to the line through the fences; the writer asked that he should be informed when the repair work was completed; the letter went to the 'line manager' with a copy to the stationmaster. A memorandum from the stationmaster to the divisional manager reported that the engineers' department were called out and that the fences were repaired on the day of the accident.

In view of the evidence which was before the learned judge and in the light of the documents referred to, it is a matter of some surprise that when a claim was made it was stated on behalf of the appellants that their engineer had made an inspection of the fence in question on the morning of the accident and found it in order.

'Our evidence quite clearly establishes that the fence was found in good order earlier on the day in question, but was found damaged after the accident.

Temporary repairs were carried out immediately afterwards, followed later by permanent repairs.'

Having regard to the evidence before the learned judge and to the terms of the various internal memoranda it is difficult to understand how the letter came to be written. There was no evidence either to support it or to explain it. If there was a system of inspection there must have been a lamentable failure in its operation. The fact remains that for weeks or months the fencing was so broken down at a point ahead of a public path that a person could easily get across to the line; an adult would doubtless appreciate the risks or perils in so proceeding; a boy aged six would not.

If the facts which I have outlined were put to any well-disposed but fair-minded member of the public, whether a parent or not, I venture to think that the response guided by the promptings of common sense would be that having regard to the dangerous nature of the live rail and its perils for a small child, the appellants were grievously at fault in allowing a fence at the particular place in question to remain for a long time in a broken down condition. It must at any time be a matter of regret and of concern if the answer of the law does not accord with the answer that common sense would suggest. But the appellants assert that the law must refuse the infant's claim. In effect they say that he was a legal outcast. In short he was a trespasser. And they say:

'Towards the trespasser the occupier has no duty to take reasonable care for his protection or even to protect him from concealed danger. The trespasser comes on to the premises at his own risk.'

7 See R Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck [1929] AC 358 at 365, [1929] All ER Rep 1 at 4, per Lord Hailsham LC.

a On the authority of the same case⁸ they say that an occupier is only liable to a trespasser where the injury is due to some wilful act involving something more than the absence of reasonable care:

“There must be some act done with the deliberate intention of doing harm to the trespasser, or at least some act done with reckless disregard of the presence of the trespasser . . .”⁸

b

So they say that in the present case there was no wilful act done against the infant; the appellants did not know of his presence and did nothing in disregard of his presence.

c

d

e

f

There is always peril in treating the words of a speech or a judgment as though they were words in a legislative enactment, and it is to be remembered that judicial utterances are made in the setting of the facts of a particular case. The facts in the present case differ from those in Addie's case⁸. In the present case a question arises whether some duty may be owed to a person before he becomes a trespasser. In that case a question arose whether a duty was owed to someone who was already a trespasser. In that case both adults and children often went on to the land in question though it was made plain to them that they had no right to do so. There were many gaps in the hedge that surrounded the land. Children did in fact go and play on the land (in spite of their being periodically driven off); they played both near the wheel which was there and elsewhere. The wheel was about 100 yards within the boundary of the land. The wheel was not something as inherently dangerous as a live rail which it is highly perilous to touch. Those who set the wheel in motion did not know that a four year old boy had gone to sit on it. He was a trespasser and he had been warned not to go to the land or to go near to the wheel. But as those operating the wheel must have known that it was at least a possibility if not a likelihood that a child would be on or near to the wheel it might have been held that there was a duty to give some warning or to exercise some measure of care to see that no one was going to be injured before the machine was suddenly set in motion. But it was held that there was no liability for the death of the boy. The law was laid down in the terms that I have quoted. There have been many expressions of lament that the claim should not have succeeded as did the claim in *Excelsior Wire Rope Co Ltd v Callan*⁹.

g

h

j

In the present case the boy was injured by coming into contact with something on the land—the live rail. The live rail was placed where it was for the legitimate purpose of supplying power for the running of trains. There was no question of intending to do harm to a trespasser. If the question is asked, what did the appellants do wrong? the answer must I think be that they allowed the fence to remain for a long time in such a state that a child who did not sense danger could quite easily get on to the line and the live rail. Anyone who gave any thought to the matter would at once appreciate that the purpose of having a fence bordering on a railway track with a live rail is to warn people that they must proceed no further and to be to some extent an obstacle to prevent them from so doing. Anyone would further appreciate that if the fencing had a gap in it and a gap near to a public path a child might go through the gap and be in a position of great danger. Not only might a child come into contact with the live rail; he might be struck by a passing train. So the question arises whether the appellants had any obligation to take thought and have taken thought to take some action. It is enough for them to say—true we could appreciate that if a child stepped over the broken fence he might get on to the railway track with its live rail and be killed or gravely hurt but the moment

8 R Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck [1929] AC 358 at 365, [1929] All ER Rep 1 at 4 per Lord Hailsham LC

9 [1930] AC 404, [1930] All ER Rep 1

he stepped over the broken fence he would be a trespasser and 'Towards the trespasser the occupier has no duty to take reasonable care for his protection or even to protect him from concealed danger'? Although, generally speaking, an occupier is not obliged to fence his land and although, generally speaking, there is no obligation to prevent somebody from becoming a trespasser—are there some circumstances in which a duty arises to take some action to lessen the risk of peril both in the case of a potential or prospective trespasser and in the case of someone who has become a trespasser?

Having posed this question it is to be remembered that in *Addie's case*¹⁰ consideration was given to such cases as *Cooke v Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland*¹¹, *Lowery v Walker*¹² and *Latham v Richard Johnson & Nephew Ltd*¹³ and to many other cases and I think that it must be recognised that it was implicitly laid down in all the speeches that apart from cases where an occupier intends to injure a trespasser (as by laying a spring gun) he owes no duty to a potential or prospective trespasser and that it was expressly and indeed inexorably laid down that towards an actual trespasser he owes no duty apart from the duty not maliciously to cause him injury. The question now arises whether we should depart, as we were invited to do, from what was laid down in *Addie's case*¹⁰ or whether in the light of developments in the law since 1929 there are some modifications which permissibly can be accepted.

In approaching this question regard must be had to the fact of the enactment of and to the provisions of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957. It seems to me that Parliament must have decided that problems relating to trespassers should be left to be decided according to common law principles. By s 1 (1) of the Act the 'rules' enacted by ss 2 and 3 are to have effect—

'in place of the rules of the common law, to regulate the duty which an occupier of premises owes to his visitors in respect of dangers due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them.'

To such 'visitors' (subject to exceptions) there is a duty to take such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purpose for which he is invited or permitted by the occupier to be there. But a trespasser is not a 'visitor'. The term trespasser is a comprehensive word; it covers the wicked and the innocent; the burglar, the arrogant invader of another's land, the walker blithely unaware that he is stepping where he has no right to walk, or the wandering child—all may be dubbed as trespassers.

When in 1960 the Occupiers' Liability (Scotland) Act was passed it was in terms which created a certain duty of care to trespassers. The English Act was, however, left as it was. It was not amended. It would not, in my view, be fitting for us to make fundamental changes in the law, according to our view as to what its terms and policy should be, when Parliament, apparently deliberately, has refrained from making such changes. We can, however, ensure that the tide of development of the common law is not unwarrantably impeded.

If a child is a visitor an occupier must 'be prepared for children to be less careful than adults' (see s 2 (3) of the English Act). But apart from any statutory provisions it is a matter of ordinary common knowledge that children will roam and will explore. If a fence marks a boundary an adult who climbs over it will appreciate what he is doing. A small boy who finds a part of a fence so dilapidated that there is no real obstacle to his progress will not or may not know that he is at once a 'trespasser' if he goes on. So the problem raised in this case is whether, if an occupier

¹⁰ [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

¹¹ [1909] AC 229, [1908-10] All ER Rep 16

¹² [1911] AC 10, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12

¹³ [1913] 1 KB 398, [1911-13] All ER Rep 117

a has for legitimate reasons (and with no object of hurting anyone) placed something highly dangerous on his land, he owes any and what duty to take some steps to lessen the risk that a wandering child may run into the danger. Although the present case relates to a young child who obviously may be less perceptive than an adult the kindred question is raised whether there may be circumstances, if a situation of danger has been created on land, in which some measure of duty would be owed to an adult trespasser. Furthermore, although in the present case the place of great danger was quite close to the boundary of the private land, the question of principle might equally arise if the place of great danger was not close to such boundary. If a mine-field had for legitimate reasons been created and if it continued in existence I should be sorry to think that an occupier owed no duty to warn a potential or actual trespasser. In his powerful dissenting judgment in *Adams v Naylor*¹⁴ Scott LJ saw no reason in principle why an occupier should not be called on to take all reasonable precautions to keep trespassing children out of a place where he knows they will be blown up.

b In the early part of the 19th century, occupiers of land sometimes placed spring guns on their land; if a trespasser walked against a wire he would cause a gun to be fired and he might be injured. If an occupier could do as he liked on and within the confines of his own land why should he not place such guns? Yet certain trespassers who suffered injury brought claims. Could such a trespasser recover damages? The courts held that he could. There were two reasons. One was that an occupier could not do indirectly what he could not do directly; if he had been present on his land and had seen a trespasser he would not have been entitled to fire a gun at him. So he ought not to cause a gun to be fired indiscriminately and automatically if and when an intruder walked on the land. The other reason was that it was contrary to principles of humanity to place a spring gun of which a trespasser was unaware.

c Thus, in 1807 (in *Jay v Whitfield*¹⁵) a boy who entered the defendant's premises for the purpose of cutting a stick was shot by a spring gun; he recovered £120 damages (before Richards CB) for his injury. It is recorded in one of the cases that it was formerly the practice to give public notice in market towns if such means of protection as spring guns had been resorted to. It was the 'common understanding of mankind' that such notice ought to be given. That was before there was any statutory provision in regard to them.

d In *Ilott v Wilkes*¹⁶, which was in 1820, a trespasser who knew that there were spring guns in a wood (without knowing the actual particular spots where they were placed) was injured when he trod on a latent wire and caused a gun to be fired. On the principle volenti non fit injuria he failed in his claim for damages. But the duty to warn was recognised. Thus Bayley J said¹⁷:

e '... although it may be lawful to put these instruments on a man's own ground, yet as they are calculated to produce great bodily injury to innocent persons (for many trespassers are comparatively innocent) it is necessary to give as much notice to the public as you can, so as to put people on their guard against the danger.'

f Best J spoke with no uncertain voice when he proclaimed¹⁸:

'Humanity requires that the fullest notice possible should be given, and the law of England will not sanction what is inconsistent with humanity.'

g Bayley J recognised that there may be circumstances in which there is a duty to prevent injury to a trespasser. He instanced a situation in which a furious dog

14 [1944] 2 All ER 21, [1944] 1 KB 750, affd [1946] 2 All ER 241, [1946] AC 543

15 (1817) 3 B & Ald 308

16 (1820) 3 B & Ald 304, [1814-23] All ER Rep 277

17 (1820) 3 B & Ald at 312, [1814-23] All ER Rep at 279, 280

18 (1820) 3 B & Ald at 319, [1814-23] All ER Rep at 282

was loose in a yard but where there was notice over the entrance of the presence of the dog. He said that if a wrongdoer read the notice but then in the absence of the owner entered the yard he was voluntarily incurring the risk of being injured. But he expressed a further view for he said¹⁹:

'If, indeed, the master had been upon the spot at the time, and had seen the dog running towards the man, it would have been his duty to have done all in his power to prevent the animal from worrying him, and if he had not so done, the party injured might have had a right of action.'

The passage is of interest as showing that the learned judge thought that even inaction, when humanitarian impulses would prompt action, might amount to a breach of a duty owed to a trespasser.

In the later case, in 1828, of *Bird v Holbrook*²⁰, a young man, in order to catch a stray fowl (so as to help the servant of its owner), went over a wall into the defendant's garden where he came into contact with a wire which discharged a gun. He recovered damages in respect of the injury which he sustained. Best CJ stoutly proclaimed¹:

'But we want no authority in a case like the present; we put it on the principle that it is inhuman to catch a man by means which may maim him or endanger his life, and, as far as human means can go, it is the object of English law to uphold humanity, and the sanctions of religion.'

Burrough J said²:

'The Plaintiff was only a trespasser; if the Defendant had been present, he would not have been authorised even in taking him into custody, and no man can do indirectly that which he is forbidden to do directly.'

That approach would I think bring the case within the category of acts done with a 'deliberate intention of doing harm to a trespasser'. The spring gun would be deliberately placed so that it would cause injury to any trespasser who might arrive. As Viscount Dunedin said in *Addie's case*³:

'... he may not set a spring gun, for that is just to arrange to shoot him without personally firing the shot.'

Alternatively the placing of the spring gun might amount to a 'reckless disregard of the presence of the trespasser'. It is to be observed that Dixon CJ said in *Railways Comr (NSW) v Cardy*⁴:

'The fixed rule that a trespasser comes at his own risk and that only a wilful injury to him is actionable is modified by the assimilation of "reckless disregard of the presence of the trespasser" to wilfulness. It needs no argument to show that reckless disregard to the presence of a man must include not only the case of a man who is there but also of one whose coming is expected or foreseen.'

The spring gun would be placed on land because the possible presence of a trespasser would either be expected or foreseen—and there would be the circumstance that injury was intended. Although the conditions of danger on the railway track in the present case were not created with any intention of doing injury to anyone, if it could be expected or foreseen that some trespasser (such as a young child) might

19 (1820) 3 B & Ald at 313, [1814-23] All ER Rep at 280

20 (1828) 4 Bing 628

1 (1828) 4 Bing at 643

2 (1828) 4 Bing at 645

3 [1929] AC at 376, [1929] All ER Rep at 10

4 (1961) 104 CLR 274 at 285

a run into the danger unawares, was there some and, if so, what duty to take some and what steps to seek to avert such an occurrence? If humanity is to be a guide should it not operate to lessen the risk of foreseeable injury from a danger which has been created even though such injury is not intended?

b If the passages to which I have referred show that even in days when property rights were jealously safeguarded it was firmly recognised that the dictates of humanity must guide conduct even towards trespassers such recognition must surely be no less firm today. Indeed, it should be firmer. It is today basic to our legal thinking that every member of a community must have regard to the effect on others of his actions or his inactions. If in all probability the boy in the present case would not have suffered injury had the fence been in ordinary repair instead of being left dilapidated for weeks on end the question might be asked—even so as the boy would be a trespasser the moment he crossed the line of the fence why and for what reason should the appellants owe him any duty at all beyond that of not deliberately harming him thereafter or of acting with reckless disregard of his presence on their land? I would answer for reasons of common sense and common humanity. The nature and extent of any duty owed will call for separate consideration. But there must be some circumstances in which, by reason of them, a duty is owed by an occupier of land to potential trespassers as well as to actual trespassers of whom he is positively aware. As my noble and learned friend Lord Pearson said in *Videan v British Transport Commission*⁵, it is a heresy to suggest that occupation of land is a ground of exemption from liability; on the contrary (he said) occupation of land is a possible ground of liability and if a duty of care is owed then any person to whom it is owed is a neighbour although the content of the duty will vary according to the circumstances.

c If it is asked, why need the appellants give any thought to the question whether a trespasser might come to harm by trespassing on their land? the answer must I think again be that common sense and common intelligence so direct. What has been called ordinary civilised behaviour would so prompt. The words of Lord Macnaghten in *Cooke v Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland*⁶ (while remembering that it was held that the children in that case were licensees) are apposite:

f 'Would not a private individual of common sense and ordinary intelligence, placed in the position in which the company were placed, and possessing the knowledge which must be attributed to them, have seen that there was a likelihood of some injury happening to children resorting to the place and playing with the turntable, and would he not have thought it his plain duty either to put a stop to the practice altogether, or at least to take ordinary precautions to prevent such an accident as that which occurred?'
g

By taking ordinary thought and exercising 'common sense and ordinary intelligence'—even apart from the guidance of common humanity—I think that the appellants would see that in the circumstances of this case there was a likelihood that some child might pass over the broken down fence and get on to the track with its live rail and be in peril of serious injury. Even though the child would be a trespasser h ought it not to be their 'plain duty' to repair the fence? That would be a relatively simple operation not involving any unreasonable demands of time or labour or expense.

In the classic definition of negligence in 1856 in *Blyth v Birmingham Waterworks Co*⁷ Alderson B said that negligence was—i 'the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do.'

5 [1963] 2 All ER 860 at 873, [1963] 2 QB 650 at 677, 678

6 [1909] AC at 234, 235, [1908-10] All ER Rep at 18, 19

7 (1856) 11 Exch 781 at 784, [1843-60] All ER Rep 478 at 479, 480

Ought not the 'considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs' under some circumstances (and I would include those of the present case) produce the result that some duty is owed by an occupier of land towards those who if they proceed further may suffer injury at a time when they are trespassing?

That in a civilised community there is need to take thought as to the result of acts or omissions has long been recognised. Though in *Heaven v Pender*⁸ the colleagues of Sir Baliol Brett MR were unwilling to concur in 'laying down unnecessarily the larger principle' which he entertained his words may be recalled. He considered⁹ that from decided cases the proposition was to be deduced—

'that whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that every one of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognise that if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger.'

Sir Baliol Brett MR was of course not considering any question in regard to trespassers, but the question now arises whether there are not some trespassers for whom thought must be taken. The stress placed on the taking of thought by persons of 'ordinary sense' is today constantly reflected in decisions in the court. Lord Atkin in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁰ said:

'You must take reasonable care to avoid acts or omissions which you can reasonably foresee would be likely to injure your neighbour.'

The corporation in *Glasgow Corp'n v Taylor*¹¹ ought by taking thought to have realised that the poisonous berries deceptively presented a tempting and harmless appearance to a young boy who was entitled to be where he was; there was a case for trial as to whether the corporation had failed to take certain precautions that they ought to have taken. In *Haley v London Electricity Board*¹² it was held that those engaged in operations on the pavement of a highway ought to have foreseen that blind persons might walk along the pavement. So, by taking thought, should the danger have been appreciated of allowing the small child in *Carmarthenshire County Council v Lewis*¹³ to be out of care. So, by taking thought, should the consequences have been realised of failing to exercise reasonable control in the case *Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd*¹⁴.

I consider that it is abundantly clear that the appellants, if they had taken thought, must have realised that if they allowed the fence to be broken down at the particular place in question there was a considerable risk that a small child would pass through it and might as a result either be killed or come to serious harm. This was not a case in which a child could be said to have been invited or permitted to proceed with the result that he would as an invitee or licensee be proceeding towards what could be called a trap; nor do I think that any temptation to proceed could be said to have been in response to an allurement.

The present case is to be distinguished on its facts from *Edwards v Railway Executive*¹⁵, where the main issue was whether the boy could be said to have been a licensee. The layout of the land was in that case quite different from that in the present case and

⁸ (1883) 11 QBD 503, [1881-85] All ER Rep 35

⁹ (1883) 11 QBD at 509, [1881-85] All ER Rep at 39

¹⁰ [1932] AC 562 at 580, [1932] All ER Rep 1 at 11

¹¹ [1922] 1 AC 44, [1921] All ER Rep 1

¹² [1964] 3 All ER 185, [1965] AC 778

¹³ [1955] 1 All ER 565, [1955] AC 549

¹⁴ [1970] 2 All ER 294, [1970] AC 1004

¹⁵ [1952] 2 All ER 430, [1952] AC 737

a the fence in that case was repaired whenever it was observed to have suffered interference. There was evidence in that case that on the morning of the accident the fence was in proper repair.

Could a child such as the boy in the present case be regarded as a 'neighbour'? When Lord Atkin posed the question, who then in law is my neighbour? he said¹⁶ that the answer seemed to be—

b 'persons who are so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reasonably to have them in contemplation as being so affected when I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question.'

No one would suggest that every trespasser is a 'neighbour' but within these words was not the small boy in the present case a neighbour? When the railway track and its electrified rail were laid and at all times when they were maintained the risks of injury resulting if there was neither warning nor impediment such as a fence would provide would be clear to anyone who gave the matter a moment's thought. Yet when the boy went on to the track he undoubtedly became a trespasser. Does this mean that the strict edict of Addie's case¹⁷ prevents any kind of duty from arising towards such a neighbour, especially as Parliament has not legislated in terms which cover trespassers? In my view, while it cannot be said that the appellants owed a common duty of care to the young boy in the present case they did owe to him at least the duty of acting with common humanity towards him. In regard to the words that I have quoted from Addie's case¹⁸, I do not think that the appellants (through their servants) did any act with the deliberate intention of doing harm to the boy; their omission for a long time to repair the fence and their continuing distribution of electric power along their live rail did not, in my view, amount to a 'reckless disregard of the presence of a trespasser'. If those last quoted words can be said to cover the likely or expected or anticipated presence of a trespasser then the question arises whether the lamentable inaction of the appellants is to be characterised as 'reckless'. As to this I have doubt. The word 'reckless' seems more apposite in reference to positive conduct than to inaction.

f The duty that lay on the appellants was a limited one. There was no duty to ensure that no trespasser could enter on the land. And certainly an occupier owes no duty to make his land fit for trespassers to trespass in. Nor need he make surveys of his land in order to decide whether dangers exist of which he is unaware. The general law remains that one who trespasses does so at his peril. But in the present case there were a number of special circumstances: (a) the place where the fence was faulty was near to a public path and public ground; (b) a child might easily pass through the fence; (c) if a child did pass through and go on to the track he would be in grave danger of death or serious bodily harm; (d) a child might not realise the risk involved in touching the live rail or being in a place where a train might pass at speed. Because of these circumstances (all of them well known and obvious) there was, in my view, a duty which, while not amounting to the duty of care which an occupier owes to a visitor, would be a duty to take such steps as common sense or common humanity would dictate; they would be steps calculated to exclude or to warn or otherwise within reasonable and practicable limits to reduce or avert danger.

I would adopt the approach of my noble and learned friend Lord Pearson, in his judgment in the Court of Appeal in Videan's case¹⁹. In agreement with him, I do not think that there is any sound basis of principle for differentiating sharply between liability for the static condition of land and liability for current operations on land. In general, therefore, a trespasser has not only to take the land as he finds it but the

16 See Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC at 580, [1932] All ER Rep at 11

17 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

18 [1929] AC at 365, [1929] All ER Rep at 4

19 [1963] 2 All ER 860, [1963] 2 QB 650

current operations on land as he finds them. Yet a potential or actual trespasser may on occasion be a neighbour and, as my noble and learned friend said²⁰, the expression 'duty to a neighbour' is more appropriately used as an aid to ascertaining whether or not there is a duty of care owing by one person to another rather than as a definition of the content of such a duty. So¹:

'If the person concerned does not know of, or have good reason to anticipate, the presence of the trespasser, that person owes to him no duty of care because he is not within the "zone of reasonable contemplation" and is not a "neighbour". If the person concerned knows of, or has good reason to anticipate, the presence of the trespasser, that person owes to the trespasser a duty of care which is substantially less than the duty of care which is owing to a lawful visitor, because the duty to a trespasser is only a duty to treat him with common humanity and not a duty to make the land and operations thereon safe for the trespasser in his trespassing.'

The case of *Railways Comr (NSW) v Cardy*² amply repays study. Although the boy who was injured was a trespasser he recovered damages. In the course of his judgment Dixon CJ said³:

'In principle a duty of care should rest on a man to safeguard others from a grave danger of serious harm if knowingly he has created the danger or is responsible for its continued existence and is aware of the likelihood of others coming into proximity of the danger and has the means of preventing it or of averting the danger or of bringing it to their knowledge.'

Windeyer J expressed the view that the duty of an occupier is rooted at bottom in his duty to his neighbour in Lord Atkin's sense and he said⁴:

'No man has a duty to make his land safe for trespassers. But, if he has made it dangerous and the danger he has created is not apparent, he may have a duty to warn people who might come there of the danger of doing so. Whether there be such a duty in a particular case must depend upon the circumstances, including the likelihood of people coming there. But if they would be likely to come, the duty does not, in my view, disappear because in coming they would be trespassing. It is a duty owed to likely comers, to those who would be intruders as to those who would be welcome.'

He further said⁵:

'I do not see how, speaking generally, there can be a duty either to prevent people trespassing or to make the premises safe for those who do. But the duty that I think can, in appropriate circumstances, exist is a duty to warn persons coming upon premises of hidden dangers they may encounter there, when those dangers are not natural features of the land but arise from conditions created by the occupier. Such a duty is not necessarily discharged by posting notices such as "trespassers will be prosecuted"; for the warning required is not that trespassing is not tolerated but that entry may be dangerous.'

For the reasons which I have given I consider that the learned judge was warranted in deciding that the respondent was entitled to recover. My approach involves some departure from some of what was said in *Railways Comr v Quinlan*⁶. It involves also

²⁰ [1963] 2 All ER at 874, [1963] 2 QB at 678

¹ [1963] 2 All ER at 875, [1963] 2 QB at 680

² (1961) 104 CLR 274

³ (1961) 104 CLR at 286

⁴ (1961) 104 CLR at 321

⁵ (1961) 104 CLR at 322

⁶ [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054

a that, on its facts, the decision in *Addie's case*⁷ should in my view have been the other way. The colliery company knew that young children were in the habit of playing on the ground near to the wheel in question and knew that although at times there were warnings, children continued to frequent the place. They knew that children might be or were likely to be there. I consider that with such knowledge they should have taken reasonable care to avoid the risk of a child trespasser being killed or injured by reason of the wheel being suddenly and blindly put to work. It follows that I consider that the case was wrongly decided.

b I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD WILBERFORCE. My Lords, this is, unusually, a straight case of an infant trespasser. The six year old boy was trespassing on the railway when he came into contact with a live electric rail, was fortunately not killed, but was severely injured. There was no allurement on to the appellants' land; there is no basis, in reality or fiction, by which the child can be treated as a licensee. There was no wilful intention to injure him; nor (I shall return to this) reckless disregard of his presence. At most (and this has been found) there was a lack of care by the appellants as regards the maintenance of its fences.

c We have not, in England, any general law as to public enterprise liability. As regards fencing, such duty as the appellants have (Railway Clauses (Consolidation) Act 1845, s 68, which, it seems protects cattle but not children) dates from 1845 since when, even after electrification, Parliament has not thought it necessary to impose new obligations on railway companies. So if the respondent is to recover, he must rely on our outdated law of fault liability which involves the need to establish a duty of care towards him and a breach of it. At once he is faced by the formidable authority of *R Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck*⁷.

e There are perhaps two things about *Addie's case*⁷ which, out of many comments that have been made over the years are relevant here. First, the bulk of the criticism has been of it as a decision on its facts. It is claimed that it should have been decided the other way, in favour of the child, as it was decided in the Court of Session⁸, as, on very similar facts, *Excelsior Wire Rope Co Ltd v Callan*⁹ three years later was decided in the plaintiff's favour. The difference of opinion between the Inner House⁸ and this House⁷ was essentially as to whether the child should have been regarded as a licensee. The Lord President (Lord Clyde) said he should¹⁰—he compared him with the plaintiff in *Lowery v Walker*¹¹ and said, as to the user of the company's premises, that it was substantially acquiesced in and acquiescence is often a form of what may be called an unwilling consent. This House⁷ took a different view; he was, on the sheriff substitute's finding, a trespasser and nothing else. The wheel had been there long before the house in which he lived was built, so that there was no question of a dangerous thing having been placed in his proximity; the only relevant relationship was the occupier/trespasser relationship. I have referred to these factual points because I do not think that we should decide this case by meticulously comparing the facts here with the facts there. What we are concerned with is the principle of law which *Addie*⁷ established—to see what it is and what cases it governs.

g The second thing to be said about *Addie*⁷ is that it is a case to be considered in a context, the context of previous and subsequent cases of common law, and the context of bordering but not identical typical situations. This has often been forgotten. The prestige of the learned law Lords who gave the opinions in that case, and the clarity and emphasis of those opinions has led to its rules being treated as a code of

7 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

8 1928 SC 547

9 [1930] AC 404, [1930] All ER Rep 1

10 1928 SC at 555

11 [1911] AC 10, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12

law to be scrupulously applied to every situation where the defendant is an occupier of land whatever may be the set of facts out of which the injury, and the claim for damages, may have arisen. It is often the fate of clear pronouncements—in law as in science—to be treated in this way, with consequences more and more strained as different cases are forced within them by the use of fictions and other devices until there is a bursting of the seams and a cry that this case as a statement of the law must be overruled. That is what we are asked to do here.

I should say at once that, even apart from the argument against this which the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 provides, I should hesitate to support this course. We should first see whether we can move on from the position taken in 1929 by classical methods of experience, analogy and logic. We should approach this without the too complacent assumption that our present age is humaner than was that of 40 years ago; but we may take the benefit of experience and recognise fresh situations—especially those of extreme danger, which have become typical.

There can be no doubt that the law regarding occupiers' liability forms part of the general law of negligence. The earlier 19th century cases were actions on the case (*Deane v Clayton*¹² and *Lynch v Nurdin*¹³) and although attempts were made to treat some of them as based on nuisance this was not a tendency which prevailed.

Since these were what we now call actions in negligence, it was necessary to define the degree of care owed to persons coming on land in particular circumstances, and this led to the emergence, in progressively segregated divisions of the familiar tripartite classification—which in *Addie*¹⁴ was stated to be exhaustive, and the line separating them an absolutely rigid line (per Viscount Dunedin). The first duty of the court, it was said, was to fix once and for all into which class the plaintiff falls. The Scottish courts avoided this rigidity and proceeded upon the general principles governing the law of negligence (*Addie's case*¹⁵ per the Lord President (Lord Clyde)). The formulation by this House in *Addie*¹⁶ gave rise not only to dissatisfaction in Scotland but to difficulty since human conduct can rarely be squeezed into a predetermined slot; and if this is what courts are told to do, they will find ways, according to their views of the merits, of crossing the lines. So they have found means of converting trespassers into licensees by imputing licences, and in the case of children they have improved their status by a finding of allurement or by straining the facts.

We ought now to ask the question directly, what, in relation particularly to infant trespassers, is the duty of care? (see *Railways Comr (NSW) v Cardy*¹⁷) for the recognition of some duty of care, even towards trespassers, in certain limited cases, is what the imputation of a licence really means. We may, although here we are getting near the dangerous ground of legislation, be readier than our predecessors to see liability for injuries to individuals placed on society generally, of which the appellants effectively form part. And if we do not go so far as to recognise that special rules ought to be devised for child trespassers (cf *American Restatement*¹⁸), we can at least accept that fresh and more lethal dangers to their safety have appeared, and come nearer to them, and that somewhere more care has to be used to prevent them being hurt. I say 'somewhere' because the occupier of adjoining land is not the only, or indeed the first, person in the line of responsibility. Even today parents have some control and responsibility, and if children are on a playground which someone has provided for the purpose, that person has a responsibility to see that it is safe.

Does, then, *Addie*¹⁶ contain an exhaustive definition of an occupier's duties to persons on his land? One does not see why, in principle, this should be so. It could be so

¹² (1817) 7 Taunt 489

¹³ (1841) 1 QB 29, [1835-42] All ER Rep 167

¹⁴ [1929] AC at 371, [1929] All ER Rep at 8

¹⁵ 1928 SC at 551

¹⁶ [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

¹⁷ (1961) 104 CLR 274

¹⁸ Torts (2nd) s 339

a if the fact of occupation of land were to be the basis of exemption from any greater liability than the relevant rule prescribes. But this idea has been refuted more than once (see *Railways Comr v McDermott*¹⁹). The correct conception is that stated by the Privy Council²⁰ when through Viscount Radcliffe the Board said that the *Addie*¹ rules were expressive of certain consequences as regards proximity and foreseeability which flow from the given relationship (occupier and invitee—licensee—trespasser). Or, as was put by Barwick CJ², there is—

b ‘a quantitative element both in the extent of the foreseeability and of the reasonable steps required to fulfil any resultant duty arising from the circumstances in which the injured persons came on the scene.’

c If this is generally so, it must follow that the law can, particularly, take into account other relevant factors, if they exist, which bear on these matters of foresight and prudence. It does so when in the general case it considers it relevant to know whether the presence of the relevant person was known, ‘as good as known’ (*Railways Comr v Quinlan*³), or ‘extremely likely’ (*Excelsior Wire Rope Co Ltd v Callan*⁴), and it seems a necessary step from this to say that particular circumstances may exist in which an increased duty of ‘foreseeability’ may arise.

d There are other indications, in the law as it stands, of the relevance of particular factors as modifying the general rules. First there is the doctrine of allurements. It has been criticised, as a device, like imputed licences, for escaping from the *Addie*¹ rules. But it is older than *Addie*¹ and reflects the perfectly sound conception that as particular things are (‘foreseeably’) likely to be attractive to children, the occupier owes a duty, if they are dangerous, not to put them in the children’s way. The classic case is that of the berries in the park (*Glasgow Corp v Taylor*⁵). Secondly, there is the law as to fencing. In general an occupier is under no duty to fence his land so as to exclude trespassers, a rule of importance to railway companies and of validity as this House has decided (*Edwards v Railway Executive*⁶). The fact that Parliament has not imposed a duty securely to fence children or others out is a recognition that a compromise must be struck between the desire to save everyone from every danger and the cost to the community of doing so. It means that there are situations where even children will not recover. But the courts have qualified this exemption by reference to particular circumstances as, for example, that persons are known frequently to have access along a track, *Cooke v Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland*⁷ and *Lowery v Walker*⁸ which, although put on the imputation of a licence, really reflect the fact that some elementary duty is owed. Similarly, there are the cases of pitfalls—where an occupier makes an excavation near a highway (cf *Prentice v Assets Co Ltd*⁹) (the same would surely be true of other hazards, e.g. an electric wire); he is under a duty, even to trespassers, to take some steps to keep them off.

g Thirdly, there is the position of contractors carrying out work on land. A number of cases, *Davis v St Mary’s Demolition & Excavation Co Ltd*¹⁰, *Mooney v Lanarkshire County Council*¹¹, *A C Billings & Sons Ltd v Riden*¹², which I need not examine in detail

h 19 [1966] 2 All ER 162 at 167, [1967] 1 AC 169 at 186

20 In Railways Comr v Quinlan [1964] 1 All ER 897 at 904, [1964] AC 1054 at 1072

1 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

2 In Munnings v Hydro-Electric Commission of Tasmania (1971) 45 ALJR 378 at 382

3 [1964] 1 All ER at 906, [1964] AC at 1076

4 [1930] AC at 410, [1930] All ER Rep at 4

5 [1922] 1 AC 44, [1921] All ER Rep 1

j 6 [1952] 2 All ER 430, [1952] AC 737

7 [1909] AC 229, [1908-10] All ER Rep 16

8 [1911] AC 10, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12

9 (1890) 17 R 484

10 [1954] 1 All ER 578, [1954] 1 WLR 592

11 1954 SC 245

12 [1957] 3 All ER 1, [1958] AC 240

(some of them I think put the duty too high), have established their responsibility in principle, through a duty of care, toward trespassers, including infant trespassers. Their liability should not depend solely on whether they were, or were not, themselves occupiers of the land, and it would be absurd if there were one law for contractors doing work and another law if the occupier did the same work himself (cf *Buckland v Guildford Gas Light and Coke Co*¹³ and *Creed v John McGeoch & Sons Ltd*¹⁴) both perfectly sound decisions in themselves. This is not to say that the contractor's duty is to be imposed or measured regardless of the fact that the victim may have been a trespasser, but it is to say that there may be circumstances in which contractors and occupiers alike may have some (I am not saying the same) responsibility for trespassers' safety, outside the bare *Addie*¹⁵ principle. It is curious, in fact, that this point escaped attention so long after *Callan's case*¹⁶ had shown how easy it is to reach a just and sensible conclusion once one escapes from a narcotic preoccupation with the occupier/trespasser relationship.

These are merely examples to illustrate the proposition that *Addie*¹⁵ is not an all embracing code, but a piece in the larger whole of a man's duty of care to those who may come into his proximity, and may be injured by actions or events occurring on his land.

I have already referred briefly to the historical antecedents of the law of occupiers' liability. It would be possible to show, in my belief, that *Addie*¹⁵ to some extent represented a step back in the direction of categorisation from an earlier more general attitude to the duty of care. It is more significant for the present case to recall that it occurred precisely at a time when the law of negligence was being put on a generalised basis and that many of the eminent legal authorities of this time were parties, in differing combinations, to *Addie*¹⁵, *Callan's case*¹⁶ and *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁷. It is hard to believe that they regarded these cases as inconsistent, or as separating occupiers' cases, as such, from all other situations where care might be needed.

I pass over for the moment the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 in order to refer to four Australian cases, decided in the High Court, which give us valuable guidance in the search for a modern definition, or at least outline of the duty of care which may be owed to trespassers in cases such as the present. It will be necessary to supplement this by consideration of *Quinlan's case*¹⁸ in which the Privy Council, on a New South Wales appeal, may appear to have taken a step back. The High Court cases are *Thompson v Bankstown Municipal Council*¹⁹, *Rich v Railways Comr (NSW)*²⁰, *Railways Comr (NSW) v Cardy*¹ and *Munnings v Hydro-Electric Commission of Tasmania*².

*Rich*²⁰ was a level crossing case, *Cardy*¹ one of a child straying on to an attractive rubbish dump with hot ashes under the surface; *Thompson*¹⁹ and *Munnings*² are nearer the subject-matter of this case, being concerned with high tension electric wires placed in proximity to places where children might be. Although each case is difficult in its facts and required extensive legal argument, they can fairly be summarised into the generalisation that they reflect a tendency towards the recognition of a duty of care, appropriate to the circumstances, extracted from the situation and shaped by it, independent of such liability as might arise from the relation of occupier and licensee or trespasser. I cite some passages which clearly reflect this. In *Thompson*³ the judgments of Dixon CJ and Williams J contained this:

13 [1948] 2 All ER 1086, [1949] 1 KB 410

14 [1955] 3 All ER 123, [1955] 1 WLR 1005

15 [1929] 1C 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

16 [1930] AC 404, [1930] All ER Rep 1

17 [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

18 [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054

19 (1952) 87 CLR 619

20 (1959) 101 CLR 135

1 (1961) 104 CLR 274

2 (1971) 45 ALJR 378

3 (1952) 87 CLR at 628

a 'A man or child may be infringing upon another's possession of land or goods at the time he is injured and it will be no bar to his recovery, if otherwise he can make out the constituent elements of a cause of action.'

They cited in support of this *Callan's case*⁴, *Mourton v Poulter*⁵, *Buckland v Guildford Gas Light and Coke Co*⁶ and *Glasgow Corp'n v Taylor*⁷. In the same case the judgment of Kitto J contained an even more explicit passage. After mentioning, in terms of acceptance, the case of *Addie*⁸ and *Edwards*⁹, he said¹⁰:

b 'The respondent's contention appears to assume that the rule of law which defines the limits of the duty owed by an occupier to a trespasser goes so far as to provide the occupier with an effective answer to any assertion by the trespasser that during the period of the trespass the occupier owed him a duty of care. The assumption is unwarranted, for the rule is concerned only with the incidents which the law attaches to the specific relation of occupier and trespasser. It demands, as Lord Uthwatt said in Read v. J. Lyons & Co. Ltd.,¹¹ a standard of conduct which a reasonably-minded occupier with due regard to his own interests might well agree to be fair and a trespasser might in a civilized community reasonably expect. It would be a misconception of the rule to regard it as precluding the application of the general principle of *M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson*¹², to a case where an occupier, in addition to being an occupier, stands in some other relation to trespasser so that the latter is not only a trespasser but is also the occupier's neighbour, in Lord Atkin's sense of the word: see *New South Wales Transport Comrs v. Barton*¹³.'

c The clarity of this passage has caused it to be followed, in analogous situations, in Australia, but it received some criticism based I think on some misunderstanding in *Quinlan's case*¹⁴.

d The same conception of a duty of care, co-existing with the special duties arising from occupation, is developed in the judgment of Fullagar J in *Rich*¹⁵, and again by Dixon CJ in *Cardy*¹⁶. I quote two passages¹⁷:

e 'The rule remains that a man trespasses at his own risk and the occupier is under no duty to him except to refrain from intentional or wanton harm to him. But it recognizes that nevertheless a duty exists where to the knowledge of the occupier premises are frequented by strangers or are openly used by other people and the occupier actively creates a specific peril seriously menacing their safety or continues it in existence. The duty may be limited to perils of which the person so using the premises are unaware and which they are unlikely to expect and guard against. The duty is measured by the nature of the danger or peril but it may, according to circumstances, be sufficiently discharged by warning of the danger, by taking steps to exclude the intruder or by removal or reduction of the danger.'

f 4 [1930] AC 404, [1930] All ER Rep 1
5 [1930] 2 KB 183, [1930] All ER Rep 6
6 [1948] 2 All ER 1086, [1949] 1 KB 410
7 [1922] 1 AC 44, [1921] All ER Rep 1
8 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1
9 [1952] 2 All ER 430, [1952] AC 737
10 (1952) 87 CLR at 642, 643

g 11 [1946] 2 All ER 471, [1942] AC 156
12 [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1
13 (1933) 49 CLR 114
14 [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054
15 (1959) 101 CLR 135
16 (1961) 104 CLR 274
17 (1961) 104 CLR at 286

And later¹⁸:

'In principle a duty of care should rest on a man to safeguard others from a grave danger of serious harm if knowingly he has created the danger or is responsible for its continued existence and is aware of the likelihood of others coming into proximity of the danger and has the means of preventing it or of averting the danger or of bringing it to their knowledge.'

There are no doubt words and expressions here which can be discussed, I do not say improved on, for Dixon CJ is a master of language; but he would himself never claim that every possible case can be included in a formula. The principle is one which I am happy to adopt; *Addie's case*¹⁹ as the plain general rule; room, in circumstances to be carefully defined, for a special duty of care. The other judgments, particularly that of Fullagar J repay study: I take my two short excerpts from that of Windeyer J. Of a trespasser he says¹:

'The trespasser in his relation to the occupier thus really stands outside the law of negligence, for to him, considered simply as an entrant upon the land, the occupier has no duty of care. Such a duty may, however, arise from some circumstances beyond the mere fact of entry, as for example from the occupier's knowledge of the trespasser's presence and of his proximity to dangerous operations. It arises then not as a duty to him as a trespasser, but to him as an individual whose relation to the occupier has become that of a "neighbour".'

And later²:

'No man has a duty to make his land safe for trespassers. But, if he has made it dangerous and the danger he has created is not apparent, he may have a duty to warn people who might come there of the danger of doing so. Whether there be such a duty in a particular case must depend upon the circumstances, including the likelihood of people coming there. But if they would be likely to come, the duty does not, in my view, disappear because in coming they would be trespassing. It is a duty owed to likely comers, to those who would be intruders as well as to those who would be welcome.'

The recognition of a larger area surrounding *Addie's case*¹⁹, which I favour, is well summed up in the first two sentences of the latter citation.

*Quinlan's case*³ has been thought by later Australian cases, and some English authorities, to constitute an obstacle to a wider view of the law as regards trespassers. It was difficult and unusual in its facts, being concerned with a private railway crossing used by the respondent in conditions hard to define. No discussion of it would be fair unless it were squarely recognised that it came down firmly against the view that a duty of care (called in the judgment a 'general duty of care') can co-exist with the very limited duty to a trespasser stated in *Addie's case*¹⁹. But it is important to see what was meant by this disclaimer.

The previous history of the case and the form of the direction to the jury show very clearly, and importantly, that what the courts had to consider was whether Mr Quinlan, although a trespasser, might succeed in negligence under 'the duty of general care'. This the appellants rejected on a basis appearing early in the judgment. There is no principle, it is said, to be deduced from *Donoghue v Stevenson*⁴ which

¹⁸ (1961) 104 CLR at 286

¹⁹ [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

¹ (1961) 104 CLR at 318

² (1961) 104 CLR at 321

³ [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054

⁴ [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

a throws any particular light on the legal rights and duties that arise when a trespasser is injured on a railway level crossing where he has no right to be. More particularly the likelihood of a trespasser being present at some time or another is not sufficient to impose on the occupier any general duty of care towards such a trespasser. It is this proposition which the appellants are concerned to justify from the authorities. With this proposition I have no desire to disagree. I would accept that in such a case the b rules of Addie's case⁵ may adequately govern the situation. The trespasser is just a trespasser and there is no relevant set of circumstances—involving serious risk and proximity—sufficient to call in play a duty of care independent of the occupier-trespasser relationship. Indeed the proposition itself, by referring to 'the general duty of care' carries its own affirmation. A general duty, without supporting circumstances giving rise to this duty and measuring its extent, is a meaningless idea.

c *Donoghue v Stevenson*⁶ does not evoke it, Addie's case⁵ denies it. But it is a very different matter when proved circumstances exist sufficient to place a definable duty (however slight—for example to warn) on the person who is responsible for the existence of those circumstances, occupier or not, and I think that the judgment in *Quinlan*⁷ recognised this when it was, perhaps rather cryptically, said:

d ' . . . that, so long as the relationship of occupier and trespasser is or continues to be a relevant description of the relationship between the person who injures . . . and the person who is injured—an important qualification—the occupier's duty is limited in the accepted terms.'

(Can 'a relevant' here be read as 'the relevant'?) Whether sufficient circumstances of this kind were to be found in Quinlan's case⁸ is not a matter which need concern us. It is only when the judgment is invoked as a denial of the possibility of such circumstances and the correlative duty that I must part company with its interpreters.

e Further extensive citation is undesirable, but I must mention one passage where reference is made to the extract from the judgment of Kitto J in Thompson's case⁹. The criticism made¹⁰ is again that the limited duty of an occupier to a trespasser cannot f co-exist with 'the wider general duty of care appropriate to the *Donoghue v. Stevenson*⁶ formula': if there is to be another relation the grounds of it must admit of reasonably precise definition otherwise it will be impossible to direct juries in an adequate manner.

I think that Kitto J has here been misunderstood. I do not understand him (or those who have followed him) to be arguing for a general duty of care; nor do I think

g that he would disagree with the necessity for reasonably precise definition; certainly I would not, and I fully recognise that, unless that is possible, plaintiffs such as the present plaintiff cannot, if they are outside the Addie's rules, succeed. As was well said in the High Court, we should not be too ready to erode the general rule of Addie's case⁵ by discovering too easily special duties of care (Munnings's case¹¹ per Walsh J).

h There is one other point discussed in the judgment, on which I find myself in agreement with the appellants—that is the discussion of the (then) recent Court of Appeal case of *Videan v British Transport Commission*¹². This, too, was a case of an infant trespassing on a railway and of a rescuer. The infant's claim failed but the majority in the Court of Appeal made (obiter) a distinction between simple occupation

j 5 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1
6 [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1
7 [1964] 1 All ER at 905, [1964] AC at 1074
8 [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054
9 (1952) 87 CLR 619 at 642, 643
10 [1964] 1 All ER at 910, [1964] AC at 1081
11 (1971) 45 ALJR at 394
12 [1963] 2 All ER 860, [1963] 2 QB 650

of land and the carrying on of operations on land, and held that as regards the latter the occupier's duty as regards a trespasser was 'the common duty of care' or a duty to take 'reasonable care'. This duty arose whenever he 'ought to foresee' their presence. The appellants criticised this in two respects: first, as regards the words 'ought to foresee' which it pointed out begs the whole question at issue—namely, whether there is a duty towards trespassers at all, and imposes far too wide a duty on occupiers. Secondly, and this is consistent with the appellants' general approach, it rejected the imposition of a general or common duty of care; in this I would agree with it but in a full statement of the law it would, in my opinion, be necessary to recognise the possibility both of a duty to foresee and of a special and limited duty of care arising out of and quantitatively measured by particular circumstances (see citations above from *Quinlan's case*¹³ and *Munnings's case*¹⁴). I think that the judgment of Pearson LJ in *Videan*¹⁵ endorses this approach.

How does the matter rest? It is often said that the law on this topic is in confusion, but this is to do it less than justice. When one has eliminated from it complexities of fact situation (were the pedestrians in *Lowery v Walker*¹⁶ trespassers or licensees according to the judge's notes? how did the wheel in *Addie*¹⁷ differ from that in *Callan*¹⁸? were the children in *Cooke*¹⁹ licensees or trespassers?) and when once one has discarded fictions, rules can be seen to emerge from the mists with reasonable clarity, but I emphasise no greater clarity than we ought to expect from the common law, which always leaves a residue to be completed by common sense.

In general, an occupier of land owes no duty to trespassers, or intending trespassers; he is not obliged to make his land safe for their trespassing. If he knows, or 'as good as knows' (*Quinlan*²⁰) of the actual presence of a trespasser, he is under a duty—as defined in *Addie's case*¹⁷—not to act with the deliberate intention of doing harm to him or to act with reckless disregard of his presence. I must return to this matter of recklessness, but at present it is enough to say that reckless disregard as used by Lord Hailsham LC surely bears its normal meaning in the law—as akin to intentional injury, but instead of intention, not caring whether he does so or not. And this involves knowledge of the trespasser's presence.

I see no reason to discard the alternative test of 'extremely likely' (Lord Buckmaster in *Callan*²¹), in relation to the trespasser's presence. Apart from its origin it has received support from Dixon CJ¹ and Windeyer J² and other judges as well as the Privy Council in *Quinlan*¹³. It excludes necessarily any lower duty of foreseeability in the general case by an occupier of trespassers' presence (see *Quinlan*³).

This is the general rule as stated by Lord Hailsham LC. I think it is still a sound rule and I think that we must support it. The question remains whether, in particular circumstances, a man may be under some duty of a particular kind, other than to abstain from wilful injury, or reckless disregard. A test more specific than that of 'foresight of likelihood of trespass' and a definition of duty more limited than that of 'the common duty of care' is required.

The dangers of too precise, or exhaustive or codified, a definition are exemplified by *Addie's case*¹⁷ itself. On the other hand, to adopt the expedient of recoiling on the

13 [1964] 1 All ER 897 at 905, [1964] AC 1054 at 1074.

14 (1971) 45 ALJR 378 at 382.

15 [1963] 2 All ER 860, [1963] 2 QB 650.

16 [1911] AC 10, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12.

17 [1929] AC 358 at 364, [1929] All ER Rep 1 at 4.

18 [1930] AC 404, [1930] All ER Rep 1.

19 [1909] AC 229, [1908-10] All ER Rep 16.

20 [1964] 1 All ER at 903, [1964] AC at 1070.

21 [1930] AC at 410, [1930] All ER Rep at 4.

1 (1961) 104 CLR at 286.

2 (1961) 104 CLR at 320.

3 [1964] 1 All ER at 904, 905, [1964] AC at 1072, 1074.

- a comfortable concept of the reasonable man is hardly good enough. It evades the problem by throwing it into the lap of the judge. We must try at least to set up some boundary marks. I think it is safer to proceed by exclusion, and then to the facts of this case. An occupier is not under any general duty to foresee the possibility or likelihood of trespass on his land, or to carry out an inspection to see whether trespass is occurring or likely. To suppose otherwise would impose impossible burdens.
- b Nor can a trespasser by giving notice to the occupier that he may trespass at a particular place or time, by that fact create a duty towards him.

An occupier is under no general duty to fence his land against trespassers, or even against child trespassers; and in my opinion, in principle, this exclusion is valid whether or not the occupier is carrying on operations on the land or whether some danger exists through a static condition (eg a quarry, *Holland v District Committee of Middle Ward of Lanarkshire*⁴). A poisoned pool⁵ may give rise to a special duty.

- c Exceptions may be found (these are only examples) (a) in the case of pitfalls and analogous situations of dangers created near a place where the victim had a right to go, (b) in the case of allurements to children. The principle behind the latter is, in my opinion, not one of imputing a licence, but that of a duty to take reasonable steps not to place in the way of small children potentially hurtful and attractive objects.

- d In the particular case of railway companies, there is no general duty to erect or maintain fences sufficient to exclude adults or children—the case of *Edwards*⁶ is clear on this point and I respectfully think right; the only duty is to mark off the railway property. If more precautions are needed because of the proximity of a playground they may have to be taken by those in control of the playground fencing in, rather than fencing out.

- e Then on the positive side I think that we can best serve the development of the law by concentrating on the particular type of case which has engaged the courts, and on which the law has been tested by experience. Just as in the 19th century the introduction of turntables, attractive to children, accessible and dangerous, gave rise to a jurisprudence known by their name, so we must take account of the placing of electrical conductors above or on the ground all over our overcrowded island and

- f see where this leads as regards foresight and care. The ingredients of such duty as may arise must stem from the inevitable proximity to places of access, including highways, from the continuous nature of the danger, from the lethal danger of contact and from the fact that to children the danger may not be apparent. There is no duty to make the place safe, but a duty does arise because of the existence, near to the public, of a dangerous situation. The greater the proximity, the greater the risk, and correspondingly the need of foresight and a duty of care.

- g What is the nature of this duty of care? Again, it must be remembered that we are concerned with trespassers, and a compromise must be reached between the demands of humanity and the necessity to avoid placing undue burdens on occupiers. What is reasonable depends on the nature and degree of the danger. It also depends on the difficulty and expense of guarding against it. The law, in this context, takes account of the means and resources of the occupier or other person in control—
- h what is reasonable for a railway company may be very unreasonable for a farmer, or (if this is relevant) a small contractor. If a precedent is needed for this concept of relative responsibility I may venture to refer to the Privy Council judgment in *Goldman v Hargrave*⁷, where, in relation to another common law duty, it was said, inter alia:

- j ‘ . . . the standard ought to be to require of the occupier what it is reasonable to expect of him in his individual circumstances.’

4 1909 2 SLT 7

5 United Zinc & Chemical Co v Britt (1922) 258 US 268, 42 Sup Ct 299

6 [1952] 2 All ER 430, [1952] AC 737

7 [1966] 2 All ER 989 at 996, [1967] AC 645 at 663

My Lords, in my opinion, if the law is such as I have suggested, the law as stated in *Addie's case*⁸ is developed but not denied; not, I venture to think, developed beyond what is permissible and indeed required of this House in its judicial capacity. It was suggested that some difficulty arose from the passing of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, the argument being that, as Parliament deliberately changed the law about invitees and licensees but not that concerning trespassers, the House was bound hand and foot by *Addie's case*⁸ at its narrowest. I do not follow this. There might be some force in an argument that for this House to depart from (i.e. overrule) *Addie's case*⁸ would, in effect, be to legislate where Parliament has abstained, but I can see no sense in supposing that when Parliament left the law alone as regards trespassers the intention was to freeze the law as it was, or as it was taken to be, in 1929. As this Act itself shows, what Parliament left alone in the case of trespassers, while displacing them in the case of invitees or licensees, were the rules of common law. But the common law is a developing entity as the judges develop it, and so long as we follow the well tried method of moving forward in accordance with principle as fresh facts emerge and changes in society occur, we are surely doing what Parliament intends we should do. So long as liability continues to be based on fault we may, indeed must, adjust it to reason and experience. I do not think that any argument can be drawn from the passing by the same Parliament three years later of the Occupiers' Liability (Scotland) Act 1960, which (s 2) defined the occupier's duty towards trespassers as that of such care as in all the circumstances of his case is reasonable. But it is interesting to see that in a case⁹ on that section which reached this House, recognition was given to the differing standard of care which may be required towards invitees, licensees or trespassers. My noble and learned friend, Lord Reid, expressed¹⁰ this standard in words very appropriate to the issue in this appeal.

Dealing now with the case of the infant respondent. In the Court of Appeal¹¹ he succeeded on a basis of recklessness—that of the stationmaster at the nearest station who some time before had been informed some six weeks earlier that on one occasion children had been seen somewhere on the line. As to this, unless 'recklessness' means 'gross carelessness' and in my opinion not even then, there is no basis on which the appellants can be liable for this injury. But I agree with Salmon LJ and not with the majority in the Court of Appeal that recklessness, in this context, has its classical meaning.

In *Quinlan's case*¹² the Privy Council suggested that the way ahead lay through an extended scope of wanton and reckless conduct. This may be enough in some cases, but in others, and in a case such as the present, I prefer a direct acceptance of an appropriate duty of care. The use of 'recklessness' or imputed recklessness seems to me too like another fiction of the kind it is better to discard. However, if the approach I have suggested is correct, it will follow that a basis exists here on which, given satisfactory proof, an action in negligence could lie.

I feel bound to say that I have less confidence than your Lordships or the trial judge that the proved facts make the case good. The evidence as to the condition of the fence at the relevant time, the means of access to it and the use of the open spaces on either side of the line ('the meadow was not much used by children' said the only witness) is exiguous. Conclusion on it can hardly be reached without a degree of strain. Evidence as to the knowledge or lack of it as to the condition of the fence or the so-called path to the fence by the appellants (much less conspicuous than the official path leading to a footbridge over the railway close by, whose existence seems largely to be forgotten) or as to the system of maintenance, or lack of it, hardly

⁸ [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

⁹ M'Glone v British Railways Board 1966 SC (HL) 1

¹⁰ 1966 SC (HL) at 11

¹¹ [1971] 1 All ER 897, [1971] 2 QB 107

¹² [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054

- a exists. That it was necessary to call in aid the fact that six weeks before the accident the presence had been reported of some children of unspecified age, somewhere on the two mile stretch of the line between Morden and Mitcham (the fact relied on as showing 'recklessness') does not reassure me as to the solidity of the case. But there remains the fact of this electrified line lying between two open spaces albeit linked by a bridge and of the broken down chain link fence at a point near to where children
- b might play and I think that there is force in the point that the appellants, once they knew of the gap, took immediate steps to repair it and indeed contended at one time that it was in repair at the critical time. The case is not therefore (as in Edwards's case¹³) one of a barrier erected in accordance with statute but in fact inadequate to keep children out, but of a barrier designed to be adequate, in view of the existing risk, and become inadequate through lack of maintenance. The distinction is, I think,
- c a real, as well as a fine one. I am not prepared, especially in view of the judge's finding, to differ from your Lordships' view that, in relation to the special duty of care incumbent on the appellants in the relevant place, there was a breach of that duty amounting to legal negligence, but I am left with the feeling that cases such as these would be more satisfactorily dealt with by a modern system of public enterprise liability devised by Parliament.
- d I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD PEARSON. My Lords, in relation to an occupier of premises the position of a trespasser must be radically different from that of a lawful visitor. The broad effect of s 2 of the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 is that an occupier of premises owes to his lawful visitors, i.e. the persons who come on the premises at his invitation or with his permission, the common duty of care; and that is a duty to take such care as e in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is invited or permitted to be there. In my opinion, the occupier of premises does not owe any such duty to a trespasser: he does not owe to the trespasser a duty to take such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the trespasser will be reasonably f safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is trespassing. That seems to me to be the fundamental distinction, and it should be fully preserved.

It does not follow that the occupier never owes any duty to the trespasser. If the presence of the trespasser is known to or reasonably to be anticipated by the occupier, then the occupier has a duty to the trespasser, but it is a lower and less onerous duty than the one which the occupier owes to a lawful visitor. Very broadly stated, it is a duty to treat the trespasser with ordinary humanity: *Bird v Holbrook*¹⁴, *Grand Trunk Ry Co of Canada v Barnett*¹⁵ and *Latham v Johnson*¹⁶. But that is a vague phrase. What is the content of the duty to treat the trespasser with ordinary humanity? The authoritative formulation of the duty, as given in *R Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck*¹⁷, is severely restrictive and is, I think, now inadequate. Subject to the difficulty created by that formulation, I think one can deduce from decided cases h that, normally at any rate, the occupier is not at fault, he has done as much as is required of him, if he has taken reasonable steps to deter the trespasser from entering or remaining on the premises, or the part of the premises, in which he will encounter a dangerous situation. In simple language, it is normally sufficient for the occupier to make reasonable endeavours to keep out or chase off the potential or actual intruder who is likely to be or is in a dangerous situation. The erection and maintenance of suitable notice boards or fencing or both, or the giving of suitable oral

j

13 [1952] 2 All ER 430, [1952] AC 737

14 (1828) 4 Bing 628 at 641

15 [1911] AC 361 at 369

16 [1913] 1 KB 398 at 411, [1911-13] All ER Rep 117 at 124, 125

17 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

warning, or a practice of chasing away trespassing children, will usually constitute reasonable endeavours for this purpose: *Ilott v Wilkes*¹⁸, *Bird v Holbrook*¹⁹, *Morran v Waddell*¹, *Ross v Keith*², *Cooke v Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland*³, *Lowery v Walker*⁴, *Hardy v Central London Ry Co*⁵, *Mourton v Poulter*⁶, *Excelsior Wire Rope Co Ltd v Callan*⁷, *Edwards v Railway Executive*⁸ (where Lord Porter said:

'In any case I cannot see that the respondents were under any obligation to do more than keep their premises shut off by a fence which was duly repaired when broken and obviously intended to keep intruders out.');

*Perry v Thomas Wrigley Ltd*⁹ and *M'Glone v British Railways Board*¹⁰. If the trespasser, in spite of the occupier's reasonable endeavours to deter him, insists on trespassing or continuing his trespass, he must take the condition of the land and the operations on the land as he finds them and cannot normally hold the occupier of the land or anyone but himself responsible for injuries resulting from the trespass, which is his own wrongdoing. But that statement is subject to this proviso: if the occupier knows or as good as knows that some emergency has arisen whereby the trespasser has been placed in a position of imminent peril, ordinary humanity requires further steps to be taken; the very obvious example is that, if the driver of a train sees a trespasser fallen on the line in front of him, he must try to stop the train. The variety of possible situations is so great that one cannot safely try to formulate for all cases what steps an occupier is required to take for the protection or rescue of a trespasser, but the decided cases show what is required in typical situations, and that I have endeavoured to summarise. In *Railways Comr (NSW) v Cardy*¹¹ Dixon CJ said:

'The duty is measured by the nature of the danger or peril but it may, according to circumstances, be sufficiently discharged by warning of the danger, by taking steps to exclude the intruder or by removal or reduction of the danger.'

In the case of the poisonous berries in the public park (*Glasgow Corp'n v Taylor*¹²) the simplest and cheapest and most effective way of protecting children who might be tempted to eat them would have been, not the erection of a fence or warning notices, but to dig up and remove the tree or shrub on which the poisonous berries grew. But as an illustration of the duty to trespassers normally being sufficiently discharged by reasonable measures designed to exclude them from the situation of danger, I will cite a passage from the judgment of Windeyer J in *Munnings v Hydro-Electric Commission of Tasmania*¹³. He said:

'The duty of care that the Commission owed to the plaintiff was not a duty to have its pole safe for trespassers. It was a duty which arose from the very fact that it was dangerous to trespassers. High voltage electricity is a highly

18 (1820) 3 B & Ald 304, [1814-23] All ER Rep 277

19 (1828) 4 Bing 628

1 (1883) 11 R 44

2 (1888) 16 R 86

3 [1909] AC 229, [1908-10] All ER Rep 16

4 [1911] AC 10 at 13, 14, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12 at 15

5 [1920] 3 KB 459, [1920] All ER Rep 205

6 [1930] 2 KB 183, [1930] All ER Rep 6

7 [1930] AC 404, [1930] All ER Rep 1

8 [1952] 2 All ER 430 at 435, [1952] AC 737 at 744

9 [1955] 3 All ER 243, [1955] 1 WLR 1164

10 1966 SC (HL) 1

11 (1961) 104 CLR 214 at 286

12 [1922] 1 AC 44, [1921] All ER Rep 1

13 (1971) 45 ALJR 378 at 389

a dangerous thing. To bring such a dangerous thing to a locality frequented by members of the public imposed a duty of care. That duty could be discharged by putting live wires beyond easy reach and not enabling unauthorised persons to come to them.'

There are several reasons why an occupier should not have imposed on him onerous obligations to a trespasser.

b (1) There is the unpredictability of the possible trespasser both as to whether he will come on the land at all and also as to where he will go and what he will do if he does come on the land. I enlarged on this point in *Videan v British Transport Commission*¹⁴, and I will only summarise it shortly here. As the trespasser's presence and movements are unpredictable, he is not within the zone of reasonable contemplation (*Hay (or Bourhill) v Young*¹⁵) and he is not a 'neighbour' (*Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁶) to the occupier, and the occupier cannot reasonably be required to take precautions for his safety. Occupiers are entitled to farm lands, operate quarries and factories, run express trains at full speed through stations, fell trees and fire shots without regard to the mere general possibility that there might happen to be in the vicinity a trespasser who might be injured. The occupiers do not have to cease or restrict their activities in view of that possibility, which is too remote to be taken into account and could not fairly be allowed to curtail their freedom of action.

d (2) Even when his presence is known or reasonably to be anticipated, so that he becomes a neighbour, the trespasser is rightly to be regarded as an underprivileged neighbour. The reason for this appears, I think, most clearly from a consideration of the analogous position of a lawful visitor who exceeds his authority, going outside the scope of his licence or permission. In *Hillen and Pettigrew v ICI (Alkali) Ltd*¹⁷, Lord Atkin said:

'... this duty to an invitee only extends so long as and so far as the invitee is making what can reasonably be contemplated as an ordinary and reasonable use of the premises by the invitee for the purposes for which he has been invited. He is not invited to use any part of the premises for purposes which he knows are wrongfully dangerous and constitute an improper use. As Scrutton L.J. has pointedly said: "When you invite a person into your house to use the staircase you do not invite him to slide down the bannisters."¹⁸ So far as he sets foot on so much of the premises as lie outside the invitation or uses them for purposes which are alien to the invitation he is not an invitee but a trespasser, and his rights must be determined accordingly. In the present case the stevedores knew that they ought not to use the covered hatch in order to load cargo from it; for them for such a purpose it was out of bounds; they were trespassers. The defendants had no reason to contemplate such a use; they had no duty to take any care that the hatch when covered was safe for such a use; they had no duty to warn any one that it was not fit for such use.'

h In *Munnings v Hydro-Electric Commission of Tasmania*¹⁹ Barwick CJ said:

'Of course in determining what ought to have been foreseen, as well as in deciding what steps ought to have been taken or omitted in the particular case, the right, or absence of right, of the injured person to have been at the place where he was injured, or at the point from which his injuries stemmed, would be material factors. Though the rigid categories of invitee, licensee and trespasser

i 14 [1963] 2 All ER 860 at 874, [1963] 2 QB 650 at 670

15 [1942] 2 All ER 396, [1943] 3 AC 92

16 [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

17 [1936] AC 65 at 69, 70, [1935] All ER Rep 555 at 558

18 The Carlgarth [1927] P 93 at 110

19 (1971) 45 ALJR a 1382

may not be applicable as such, there must remain a quantitative element both in the extent of the foreseeability and of the reasonable steps required to fulfil any resultant duty arising from the circumstances in which the injured person came upon the scene.' a

(3) It would in many, if not most, cases be impracticable to take effective steps to prevent (instead of merely endeavouring to deter) trespassers from going into or remaining in situations of danger. The cost of erecting and maintaining an impenetrable and unclimbable, or as it has been put, 'boy-proof' fence would be prohibitive, if it could be done at all. The cases of *M'Glone v British Railways Board*²⁰, *McCarthy v Wellington City*¹ and *Munnings v Hydro-Electric Commission of Tasmania*² illustrate the agility, ingenuity and persistence of boy trespassers. As Lord Goddard said in *Edwards v Railway Executive*³, referring to the Railway Executive: b

'Had they to provide watchmen to guard every place on the railways of the Southern Region where children may and do get on to embankments and lines, railway fares would be a great deal higher than they are already.' c

(4) There is also a moral aspect. Apart from trespasses which are inadvertent or more or less excusable, trespassing is a form of misbehaviour, showing lack of consideration for the rights of others. It would be unfair if trespassers could by their misbehaviour impose onerous obligations on others. One can take the case of a farmer. He may know well from past experience that persons are likely to trespass on his land for the purpose of tearing up his primroses and bluebells, or picking his mushrooms or stealing his turkeys, or for the purpose of taking country walks in the course of which they will tread down his grass and leave gates open and watch their dogs chasing the farmer's cattle and sheep. It would be intolerable if a farmer had to take expensive precautions for the protection of such persons in such activities. d

I have said that an occupier does not owe to a trespasser the 'common duty of care', which is now the relevant statutory expression for the occupier's duty to lawful visitors. It can also be said that the occupier does not owe to the trespasser any general duty of care. This question was fully considered and decided in the case of *Railways Comr v Quinlan*⁴. The question was directly raised by the trial judge's directions to the jury. Viscount Radcliffe said⁵: e

'... their lordships think that there is no doubt that the jury must have received the definite impression that the law that they were to apply to the facts was that, once they thought that there was a "likelihood" of people coming to the crossing and that the appellant was aware of such a likelihood, the appellant owed a general duty to the respondent as "a member of the public" to take reasonable precautions to secure his safety, and that this duty was not affected by the fact that the respondent was a trespasser. In their lordships' opinion this direction was not in accordance with law ... The court had ... ordered a new trial, because in their view the case, if retried, might show that the respondent, though a trespasser, was nevertheless entitled to claim from the appellant the duty of general care and a liability in negligence for a breach of it: such a duty, it was suggested, might be founded on a general principle derived from the House of Lords' decision in *Donoghue v. Stevenson*⁶. Their lordships think this view mistaken. They cannot see that there is any general principle to be deduced f

²⁰ 1966 SC (HL) 1 g

¹ [1966] NZLR 481

² (1971) 45 ALJR 378

³ [1952] 2 All ER at 437, [1952] AC at 747

⁴ [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054 h

⁵ [1964] 1 All ER at 902, 903, [1964] AC at 1069, 1070

⁶ [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1 i

- a from that decision which throws any particular light on the legal rights and duties that arise when a trespasser is injured on a railway level crossing where he has no right to be: more particularly, they consider that it is not correct in principle to suppose that the mere fact that there was a likelihood, apparent to the occupier, of a trespasser being present on the crossing at some time or another is sufficient to impose on the occupier any general duty of care towards such a trespasser.
- b The consequences of such a supposition would be far-reaching indeed.'

I respectfully agree with that passage. Viscount Radcliffe also said, referring to what he described as 'the accepted formulation of the occupier's duty to a trespasser'⁷.

- '... what is intended is an exclusive or comprehensive definition of the duty. Indeed there would be no point in it if it were not. It follows then that, so long as the relationship of occupier and trespasser is or continues to be a relevant description of the relationship between the person who injures or brings about injury and the person who is injured—an important qualification—the occupier's duty is limited in the accepted terms.'
- c

There is economy of doctrine, simplicity of principle, in having one exclusive and comprehensive formula defining the duty of occupier to trespasser. But the formula itself has created difficulties and aroused criticism, and I think it is not now adequate or defensible as applying to modern conditions. Before coming to the formula, I will attempt a summary of the principles so far dealt with.

d

- It seems to me that there is rational justification for the common law attitude towards trespassers, in so far as it has recognised that (a) in relation to an occupier the position of a trespasser is radically different from that of a lawful visitor; (b) the unknown and merely possible trespasser is not a 'neighbour' in the sense in which that word 'neighbour' was used by Lord Atkin in *Donoghue v Stevenson*⁸, and the occupier owes to such a trespasser no duty to take precautions for his safety; and (c) if the presence of the trespasser is known to or reasonably to be anticipated by the occupier, then the occupier (i) does not owe to the trespasser the common duty of care (which is the single statutory substitute for the different duties formerly owing to invitees and licensees); (ii) does not owe to the trespasser a general duty of care; but (iii) does owe to the trespasser a lower and less onerous duty, which has been described as a duty to treat him with ordinary humanity.
- e
- f

- So far so good. Insofar as those are the rules of the common law on this subject, they seem to be fully acceptable. The difficulty, however, arises from the narrow formulation of the duty to trespassers in *R Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck*⁹. Lord Hailsham LC, after stating the duties of occupiers towards invitees and licensees, said¹⁰:
- g

- 'Towards the trespasser the occupier has no duty to take reasonable care for his protection or even to protect him from concealed danger. The trespasser comes on to the premises at his own risk. An occupier is in such a case liable only where the injury is due to some wilful act involving something more than the absence of reasonable care. There must be some act done with the deliberate intention of doing harm to the trespasser, or at least some act done with reckless disregard of the presence of the trespasser.'
- h

- j Viscount Dunedin said¹¹:

⁷ [1964] 1 All ER at 905, [1964] AC at 1074
⁸ [1932] AC at 580, [1932] All ER Rep at 11
⁹ [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1
¹⁰ [1929] AC at 365, [1929] All ER Rep at 4
¹¹ [1929] AC at 376, 377, [1929] All ER Rep at 10

'In the present case, had the child been a licensee I would have held the defenders liable: secus if the complainer had been an adult. But if the person is a trespasser, then the only duty the proprietor has towards him is not maliciously to injure him: he may not shoot him; he may not set a spring gun, for that is just to arrange to shoot him without personally firing the shot. Other illustrations of what he may not do might be found, but they all come under the same head—injury either directly malicious or an acting so reckless as to be tantamount to malicious acting.'

The formulation is too narrow and inadequate in at least three respects.

First, it appears to hold the occupier liable only for positive acts and not in respect of omissions. Suppose that the occupier is running an electrified railway, with an exposed live rail, in the vicinity of a public playground, and that he has not provided any warning notice or fence to deter children from straying on to the railway, and in consequence a child strays on to the live rail and is seriously injured. Surely common sense and justice require that the occupier must be held liable in such a case for his nonfeasance. I doubt, however, whether it was intended to confine liability to positive acts. Perhaps the words 'act' and 'acting' in *Addie v Dumbreck*¹² can be interpreted as including omissions.

Secondly, the formulation appears to say that the occupier has no duty to do anything for the protection of trespassers until there is a trespasser actually on the land and the occupier knows he is there. But again the case of a child straying on the live rail of an electrified railway shows that there must be a duty on the occupier to take some steps in advance to deter children from trespassing on the railway.

Thirdly, the formulation makes the occupier liable only in respect of deliberate or reckless acts. I think the word 'reckless' in the context does not mean grossly negligent but means that there must be a conscious disregard of the consequences—in effect deciding not to bother about the consequences. Thus a subjective, mental element, a sort of mens rea, is required as a condition of liability. Mere negligence would not be enough to create liability, according to this formulation. There would be no duty to take care, but only a duty to abstain from deliberately or recklessly causing injury. That is plainly inadequate.

It must be conceded that *Addie v Dumbreck*¹² does not stand alone. There is other authority to the effect that a man trespasses at his own risk and must take the land as he finds it. Hamilton LJ said in *Latham v Johnson*¹³:

'The rule as to trespassers is most recently indicated in *Lowery v. Walker*¹⁴ and is stated and discussed in *Grand Trunk Ry. Co. of Canada v. Barnett*¹⁵. The owner of the property is under a duty not to injure the trespasser wilfully: "not to do a wilful act in reckless disregard of ordinary humanity towards him"; but otherwise a man "trespasses at his own risk." On this point Scotch law is the same. In English and Scotch law alike, when people come on the lands of others for their own purposes without right or invitation, they must take the lands as they find them, and cannot throw any responsibility upon the person on whose lands they have trespassed: per Lord Kinnear, *Devlin v. Jeffray's Trustees*¹⁶.'

The rule was applied to child trespassers in *Hardy v Central London Ry Co*¹⁷.

Nevertheless the rule was evidently found to be unsatisfactory in cases both before and after *Addie v Dumbreck*¹² especially in cases where child trespassers were concerned. Where there had been frequent trespassing and no effective prevention of it,

¹² [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

¹³ [1913] 1 KB 398 at 411, [1911-13] All ER Rep at 124, 125

¹⁴ [1911] AC 10, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12

¹⁵ [1911] AC 361

¹⁶ 1902 40 SCLR 92

¹⁷ [1920] 3 KB 459, [1920] All ER Rep 205

a a licence was held to be implied, although there was no voluntary grant of permission. Instances are *Cooke v Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland*¹⁸, *Lowery v Walker*¹⁹ and *Excelsior Wire Rope Co Ltd v Callan*²⁰. In such cases the licence was a legal fiction by which the harsh rule of law was circumvented and, one may say, eroded. (See per Viscount Dunedin in *Excelsior Wire Rope Co Ltd v Callan*¹ and per Lord Denning in *Miller v South of Scotland Electricity Board*², and in *Videan's case*³.) As Dixon CJ pointed out in *Railways Comr (NSW) v Cardy*⁴, that is how the b common law develops. See also *Quinlan's case*⁵. Also in more recent times there has been another development or attempted development of the law to circumvent the harsh rule in *Addie v Dumbreck*⁶. Distinctions have been made (a) between the liability of the occupier and the liability of other persons who carry out active operations on the land; (b) between the liability of the occupier qua occupier and his liability qua operator himself carrying out active operations on the land. The theory c is that, whereas the occupier qua occupier has a large measure of exemption from liability in respect of the static condition of the land, the occupier or any other person carrying out active operations on the land has the full duty of care even towards a trespasser under the 'neighbour' principle of *Donoghue v Stevenson*⁷. (See per Lord Denning in *Miller's case*², *Dunster v Abbott*⁸ and *Videan's case*⁹. See also *Buckland v Guildford Gas Light and Coke Co*¹⁰, *Davis v St Mary's Demolition & Excavation Co Ltd*¹¹ and *Creed v John McGeoch & Sons Ltd*¹²). Reservations or doubts about this theory were expressed in *Miller's case*¹³, in *Perry v Thomas Wrigley*¹⁴ and in *Videan's case*¹⁵. Insofar as the theory has gained acceptance, it constitutes another circumvention and erosion of the rule in *Addie v Dumbreck*⁶.

I should, however, make it plain that I do not accept the theory. I doubt whether there is any major distinction for the present purpose (i) between the static condition of the land and active operations on the land; (ii) between the occupier and other persons (such as his servants or agents or independent contractors or employees of public authorities) lawfully carrying out operations on the land and having control of the operations and perhaps of the land as well for the time being; (iii) between trespass on land and trespass on installations or railway vehicles. Occupation is associated with control and is a ground of liability, not of exemption from liability.

f The trespasser's movements are unpredictable and he goes into places where he has no business to be and imposes his unwanted presence; these considerations affect what can reasonably be required not only in the case of the occupier but also in the case of such other persons.

g It seems to me that the rule in *Addie v Dumbreck*⁶ has been rendered obsolete by changes in physical and social conditions and has become an incumbrance impeding the proper development of the law. With the increase of the population and the

18 [1909] AC 229, [1908-10] All ER Rep 16

19 [1911] AC 10, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12

20 [1930] AC 404, [1930] All ER Rep 1

1 [1930] AC at 411, [1930] All ER Rep at 4

h 2 1958 SC (HL) 20

3 [1963] 2 All ER at 860, [1963] 2 QB at 663

4 (1961) 104 CLR at 285

5 [1964] 1 All ER at 911, 912, [1964] AC at 1083, 1084

6 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

7 [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

8 [1953] 2 All ER 1572 at 1574

i 9 [1963] 2 All ER at 865, [1963] 2 QB at 664

10 [1948] 2 All ER 1086, [1949] 1 KB 410

11 [1954] 1 All ER 578, [1954] 1 WLR 592

12 [1955] 3 All ER 123, [1955] 1 WLR 1005

13 1958 SC (HL) at 35, 36

14 [1955] 3 All ER at 243, 244, [1955] 1 WLR at 1166

15 [1963] 2 All ER at 874, [1963] 2 QB at 678

larger proportion living in cities and towns and the extensive substitution of blocks of flats for rows of houses with gardens or back yards and quiet streets, there is less playing space for children and so a greater temptation to trespass. There is less supervision of children, so that they are more likely to trespass. Also with the progress of technology there are more and greater dangers for them to encounter by reason of the increased use of, for instance, electricity, gas, fast-moving vehicles, heavy machinery and poisonous chemicals. There is considerably more need than there used to be for occupiers to take reasonable steps with a view to deterring persons, especially children, from trespassing in places that are dangerous for them. a

In my opinion the *Addie v Dumbreck*¹⁶ formulation of the duty of occupier to trespasser is plainly inadequate for modern conditions, and its rigid and restrictive character has impeded the proper development of the common law in this field. It has become an anomaly and should be discarded. But in my opinion the duty of occupier to trespasser should remain limited in the ways that I have endeavoured to indicate. b

I need not lengthen this already long opinion by describing again the facts of the present case which have been described by my noble and learned friends. The appellants in the circumstances had a duty to take reasonable steps to deter children from straying from the public space on to the electrified railway line. Obviously, reasonable steps for this purpose included proper maintenance of the fence. But the appellants failed to repair the broken down fence even after they had been notified that children had been seen on the line. There was a clear breach of the duty. c

I would dismiss the appeal. d

LORD DIPLOCK. My Lords, in a heavily populated suburban area of London there are two public open spaces in which children of all ages are accustomed to play. Between them runs a line of the appellants' railway equipped with live electric rail which would cause serious injury or even death to anyone who came into contact with it. Its dangerous character would not be appreciated by little children. It is within a few yards of the boundary between the railway and one of the open spaces —Bunces Meadow. Along the boundary is a chain link fence four feet high. But at one point, approached by a well-trodden path across the meadow it had, for several weeks before 7th June 1965, been pressed down to a height of no more than ten inches from the ground. It presented no obstacle to access to the live rail by children too young to appreciate the danger. On 7th June 1965 the respondent, a child aged six years, crossed the fence at this point, came into contact with the live rail and sustained very serious injuries. e

If the facts as to the use of the meadow and the condition of the fence which I have just recited were known to those responsible for running the railway, I believe that anyone endowed with common humanity would say that the common law ought to afford to the injured child a legal right to compensation against the railway authorities; and that if it did not there was something wrong with the common law. f

The appellants, who are a public corporation, elected to call no witnesses, thus depriving the court of any positive evidence as to whether the condition of the fence and the adjacent terrain had been noticed by any particular servant of theirs or as to what he or any other of their servants either thought or did about it. This is a legitimate tactical move under our adversarial system of litigation. But a defendant who adopts it cannot complain if the court draws from the facts which have been disclosed all reasonable inferences as to what are the facts which the defendant has chosen to withhold. g

A court may take judicial notice that railway lines are regularly patrolled by linesmen and gangers. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is entitled to infer that one or more of them in the course of several weeks noticed what was plain h a for all to see. Anyone of common sense would realise the danger that the state of the fence so close to the live rail created for little children coming to the meadow to play. As the appellants elected to call none of the persons who patrolled the line there is nothing to rebut the inference that they did not lack the common sense to realise the danger. A court is accordingly entitled to infer from the inaction of the appellants that one or more of their employees decided to allow the risk to continue of some child crossing the boundary and being injured or killed by the live rail rather than to incur the trivial trouble and expense of repairing the gap in the fence.

b Even if these inferences are drawn, it is the submission of the appellants that the common law affords no remedy to the injured. Such is said to be the ineluctable consequence of the decision of this House over 40 years ago in *R Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck*¹⁷ and, in particular, is said to follow from the lapidary statement in the speech of Lord Hailsham LC¹⁸:

c 'Towards the trespasser the occupier has no duty to take reasonable care for his protection or even to protect him from concealed danger. The trespasser comes on to the premises at his own risk. An occupier is in such a case liable only where the injury is due to some wilful act involving something more than the absence of reasonable care. There must be some act done with the deliberate intention of doing harm to the trespasser, or at least some act done with reckless disregard of the presence of the trespasser.'

d *Addie v Dumbreck*¹⁷ was a case of trespass by a child aged four and a half years. It was decided in the year that I started to read for the Bar. Even at that time it offended against what Lord Atkin, only three years later, was to call 'a general public sentiment of moral wrongdoing for which the offender must pay.' (*Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁹). I well recall the disappointment with which it was received by those who thought that previous cases in this House had shown the common law as moving towards a less draconian treatment of those who trespassed innocently on other people's land.

e If the facts in the instant appeal are compared with those in *Addie v Dumbreck*²⁰ as stated by Lord Hailsham LC I do not think it possible to say that, judged by current standards of behaviour, the conduct of those engaged in operating the appellants' railway in the instant case was any more blameworthy than the conduct of those engaged in running the colliery of the successful appellant in *Addie v Dumbreck*¹⁷. Yet all nine judges who have been concerned with the instant case in its various stages are convinced that the plaintiff's claim ought to succeed; and, if I may be permitted to be candid, are determined that it shall. The problem of judicial technique is how best to surmount or to circumvent the obstacle presented by the speeches of Lord Hailsham LC and Viscount Dunedin in *Addie v Dumbreck*¹⁷ and the way in which those speeches were dealt with in the Privy Council in the comparatively recent Australian appeal of *Railways Comr v Quinlan*¹.

f By the time that *Addie v Dumbreck*¹⁷ was decided the law as to an occupier's duty towards trespassers had made some advance since Best CJ in *Bird v Holbrook*² had laid it down that an occupier was not entitled intentionally and maliciously to injure a trespasser. For present purposes the significance of that case, which arose out of setting of spring guns to injure trespassers, is twofold. First, it recognised that the duty, whatever its content, was owed by the occupier to an unknown but expected trespasser as well as to a trespasser actually known to the occupier to be trespassing on his land. Secondly, Best CJ based the duty on its being the object of English law

j 17 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

18 [1929] AC at 365, [1929] All ER Rep at 4

19 [1932] AC 562 at 580, [1932] All ER Rep 1 at 11

20 [1929] AC at 359, 360, [1929] 3 All ER Rep at 3

1 [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054

2 (1828) 4 Bing 628

to uphold humanity. This expression found its echo in Lord Robson's reference in *Grand Trunk Ry Co of Canada v Barnett*³ to 'a wilful or reckless disregard of ordinary humanity', which was adopted by Lord Sumner, then Hamilton LJ, as the definition of the duty of an occupier to a trespasser, in his judgment in *Latham v Richard Johnson & Nephew Ltd*⁴—a judgment which was expressly approved by both Lord Hailsham LC and Viscount Dunedin in *Addie v Dumbreck*⁵.

But attention had been diverted from the development of the content of an occupier's duty towards trespassers by the adoption of the technique of re-classifying as 'licensees' persons whom the occupier had not made sufficiently effective efforts to exclude from his land, so as to give them the benefit of the ready-made duty of care for their safety owed at common law by an occupier to those who, in reality, entered on his land by his permission and not against his will. This technique had been accepted without adverse comment in cases in this House itself. *Cooke v Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland*⁶ and *Lowery v Walker*⁷ are noteworthy examples. The resulting duty may be briefly summarised as a duty to take reasonable steps to enable the licensee to avoid a danger known to the occupier.

In *Addie v Dumbreck*⁸ the First Division of the Court of Session had departed from this technique and sought to recognise as a separate category of persons to whom a duty was owed, members of a class whom the occupier knew to be in the habit of resorting to his land without his permission. The majority had held that to such trespassers the occupier owed a duty to take reasonable steps to deter their intrusion if it was likely to result in serious injury to them. The decision of this House in *Addie v Dumbreck*⁵ was primarily directed to asserting the propositions: that persons present on an occupier's land could be assigned to one of three mutually exclusive categories only, i.e invitees, licensees and trespassers; that there was no sub-division of the category of trespassers; and that the duty owed by an occupier to a person on his land was determined solely by the category into which that person fell. In order to decide the appeal, however, it was also necessary to state the content of the duty towards trespassers—the category into which it was held that the respondent fell—in order to determine whether the appellant was in breach of it. This Lord Hailsham LC did in the passage that I have cited⁹.

In *Addie v Dumbreck*⁸ the child had not been found by the Court of Session to be a licensee. The decision of this House⁵ did not therefore directly impugn the technique of inferring the tacit permission of the occupier to an intruder's presence on his land from his failure to take effective steps to manifest to the intruder his objection to it. Indeed *Addie v Dumbreck*⁵ appeared to confirm this as the only way of mitigating the lot of meritorious trespassers; although the actual decision on the facts showed a greater reluctance to make use of it than had been evinced by the members of this House who had decided *Lowery v Walker*⁷.

The technique accordingly continued to be used. Appellate courts confined themselves to preventing what was felt to be its misuse—as this House did in Edwards v Railway Executive. Lord Porter there¹⁰ refers to it in terms as 'the doctrine of implied licence' and says:

'... where the owner (sc. occupier) of the premises knows that the public or some portion of it is accustomed to trespass over his land he must take steps to show that he resents and will try to prevent the invasion'

3 [1911] AC 361 at 370

4 [1913] 1 KB 398 at 411, [1911-13] All ER Rep 117 at 124, 125

5 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

6 [1909] AC 229, [1908-10] All ER Rep 16

7 [1911] AC 10, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12

8 1928 SC 547

9 [1929] AC at 365, [1929] All ER Rep at 4

10 [1952] AC 737 at 744; cf [1952] 2 All ER 430 at 435

a if he is to avoid the implication. Lord Goddard¹¹, with whose speech my noble and learned friend Lord Reid agreed, based the implied licence on estoppel: the occupier must have 'so conducted himself that he cannot be heard to say that he did not give it' (sc permission to go on his land); Lord Oaksey said¹²:

b 'The circumstances must be such that the suggested licensee could have thought, and did think, that he was not trespassing, but was on the property in question by the leave and licence of its owner.'

It is implicit in each of these statements that even when there is no real consent by the occupier to a person's entry on his land, there may be circumstances in which a mere failure to take reasonable steps to deter entry will confer on a person entering, the same common law rights as respects his personal safety as if he had been the occupier's licensee.

c That the 'licence' treated as having been granted in such cases was a legal fiction employed to justify extending to meritorious trespassers, particularly if they were children, the benefit of the duty which at common law an occupier owed to his licensees, was explicitly acknowledged by Dixon CJ in *Railways Comr (NSW) v Cardy*¹³. What he said on this topic was approved by the Privy Council in Railways Comr v
d *Quinlan*¹⁴, who added:

'... those conceptions of licence or permission ... are virtually without meaning at any rate as applied to children.'

The facts in *Lowery v Walker*¹⁵ stated at the beginning of the report show that in the case of adults the so-called 'licence' could be equally fictitious.

e By use of the fiction of a 'licence' to persons who would otherwise be trespassers the courts were enabled to recognise that there were circumstances which imposed on an occupier a duty either (a) to take reasonable steps to deter such persons from entering on a part of his land where he knew they would be exposed to serious risk of personal injury; or, if he did not do so, (b) to take reasonable steps to enable them to avoid the danger. Breach of the former duty entitled them to the status of f 'licensees'; the acquisition of that status entitled them to the benefit of the latter duty. Once the circumstances which impose these duties have been identified in a sufficient number of cases to form a body of precedent on their own, the fiction has served its purpose in the development of the common law and is ripe for discard. The misfortune of *Addie v Dumbreck*¹⁶ was that the majority of the Court of Session tried to discard the fiction before the time was ripe to do so. The need to retain it g persisted so long as it continued to be accepted doctrine that a duty to regulate one's conduct towards one's neighbour so as to reduce the risk of injuring him, could only arise if there were some pre-existing legal relationships between the parties which fell within some category already recognised at common law. This obstacle to the rational development of an occupier's duty towards trespassers was penetrated by the decision of this House in *Donoghue v Stevenson*¹⁷ and broken down h by *Hay (or Bourhill) v Young*¹⁸. The significance of these two cases for present purposes is not the content of the duty there discussed but the recognition that conduct likely to cause injury to another person could in itself create the legal relationship between the parties to which the duty attached.

j ¹¹ [1952] All ER at 437, [1952] AC at 747

¹² [1952] All ER at 437, 438, [1952] AC at 748

¹³ (1961) 104 CLR 274

¹⁴ [1964] 1 All ER 897 at 911, [1964] AC 1054 at 1083

¹⁵ [1911] AC 10, [1908-10] All ER Rep 12

¹⁶ 1928 SC 547

¹⁷ [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

¹⁸ [1942] 2 All ER 396, [1943] 3 AC 92

It is surely time now for this House to follow the example of Dixon CJ¹⁹ and of the Privy Council in *Quinlan's case*²⁰ and to discard the fiction of a 'licence' to meritorious trespassers. Once the conduct of the occupier is recognised as being capable in itself of creating a legal relationship to another person which attracts duties owed to that person in respect of his safety, it is no longer necessary in cases where that conduct attracts a duty to take reasonable steps to deter another person from entering a dangerous part of the occupier's land, to sub-divide his duties to that person into a duty to deter his entry, a breach of which gives rise to a subsequent duty to take reasonable steps to enable him to avoid the danger. To deter his entry is merely one way of enabling him to avoid the danger. The whole duty can be described as a duty to take reasonable steps to enable him to avoid the danger.

My Lords, this approach clearly runs counter to that of this House in *Addie v Dumbreck*¹. It rejects categorisation of the injured person as a trespasser or licensee as the source of any duty owed to him by the occupier to take steps for his safety and looks instead to the conduct of the occupier as creating the relevant relationship. *Addie v Dumbreck*¹ asserts the necessity for such categorisation; but by leaving intact the technique of inferring a licence by the occupier to a person to whose presence on his land he does not really consent, it transfers from the category of trespassers to that of licensees persons who for the purposes of all other incidents of the legal relationship between them and the occupier, except his duty to take steps for their safety, would remain in the category of trespassers. But, as each of the previous citations from the speeches in *Edwards's case*² confirms, the criteria for eligibility for transfer from one category to the other depended on the conduct of the occupier. So, even on this approach, the enquiry necessarily started with an examination of the occupier's conduct before the person subsequently injured enters on his land. These criteria were not defined or analysed in the speeches in this House in *Addie v Dumbreck*¹. It simply held that the particular facts found in that case did not justify treating the trespassing child as if she were a licensee.

My Lords, this House has since 1966³ abandoned its former practice of adhering rigidly to the ratio decidendi of its previous decisions. There is no longer any need to discuss whether to discard the fiction of a so-called 'licence' to enter granted by the occupier of land to the person who suffers personal injury on it, should be characterised as overruling *Addie v Dumbreck*¹ or as doing no more than explaining its reasoning in terms which are in harmony with the general development of legal concepts since 1929 as to the source of one man's duty to take steps for the safety of another. For my part I would reject the fiction and direct attention to the kind of conduct of an occupier of land which attracts the duty to take reasonable steps to enable a person who enters on his land without his actual consent, to avoid a danger of which the occupier knows.

I come now to *Quinlan's case*²⁰. Owing to the way in which it had proceeded in the courts of New South Wales, no question arose in the Privy Council as to the status of Mr Quinlan as a 'trespasser' on the level crossing where he was injured. The judgment of the Board was mainly directed to rejecting the proposition that there were circumstances in which a person entitled only to the status of 'trespasser' might be owed by the occupier on whose land he was trespassing the common duty of care laid down in *Donoghue v Stevenson*⁴ which was a higher duty than that which is owed by an occupier of land to his licensees in Australia where the common law has not been replaced by statutory provisions such as those to be found in the English Occupiers' Liability Act 1957. In the course of examining three recent decisions of

19 (1961) 104 CLR 274

20 [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054

1 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

2 [1952] 2 All ER 430, [1952] AC 737

3 See Note [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234

4 [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1

a the High Court of Australia on which the rejected proposition was said to be based, the Privy Council⁵ expressly approved the actual decision in *Cardy's case*⁶ on the ground that:

'The circumstances seemed to place the case squarely among those "children's cases", in which an occupier who has placed a dangerous "allurement" on his land is liable for injury caused by it to a straying child.'

b It was in the context of such cases that the Privy Council recognised the unreality of the 'licence' to the straying child. But although recognising the 'licence' as a fiction, they accepted the correctness of the conclusions as to the legal consequences of the conduct of the occupier which had hitherto previously been accepted as constituting an implied 'licence' to the person trespassing and so entitling him to the benefit of the higher duty owed by an occupier to take steps for the safety of his licensees.

c My Lords, *Quinlan's case*⁷ is authority for the proposition that an occupier does not owe to a person who is unlawfully on his land the common duty of care and foresight as respects dangerous activities which he carries out there, that he owes to persons who are lawfully present there, as was the successful plaintiff in the contrasting Australian level crossing case (*Railways Comr v McDermott*⁸) which came to the Privy Council a few years later.

d I have no quarrel with *Quinlan's case*⁷ as an authority for this proposition. What I regard as defective in its reasoning is that, although it is recognised that, in the case of children at any rate, their categorisation as 'licensees' instead of 'trespassers' was a mere legal fiction, it failed to recognise that it was a necessary corollary that 'the general formula as laid down in *Addie's case*⁹' was not, as had been stated earlier in the judgment, 'an exclusive or comprehensive' statement of the duty owed by an occupier to those who entered on his land, otherwise than in the exercise of a legal right or with his actual consent.

e But although the *Addie*⁹ test (there must be some act done with the deliberate intention of doing harm to the trespasser or at least some act done with reckless disregard of the presence of the trespasser) was accepted as being exclusive or comprehensive, the Privy Council went on to say¹⁰:

f 'That formula may embrace an extensive and, it may be, an expanding interpretation of what is wanton or reckless conduct towards a trespasser in any given situation, and, in the case of children, it will not preclude full weight being given to any reckless lack of care involved in allowing things naturally dangerous to them to be accessible in their vicinity.'

g A formula which is both exclusive and expansive seems to me, as a matter of linguistics, to be a contradiction in terms. For my part I would not follow the alternative route thus hinted at by which an amelioration of the law in favour of meritorious trespassers might be attained. I think it preferable to seek to identify the underlying principles which had been tacitly accepted in *Addie v Dumbreck*⁹ as justifying exclusion from the category of intruders to whom the Addie test applies, those persons to whom judges have hitherto managed to ascribe the status of licensee without acknowledging the fictitious character of their imputed 'licence' from the occupier.

h Any duty imposed by common law on one person to take steps to avoid harming another arises out of some relationship recognised by the common law as subsisting between the two persons. Where the harm to be avoided is personal injury a necessary characteristic of the relationship is one of physical proximity between the person

j 5 [1964] 1 All ER at 911, [1964] AC at 1084

6 (1961) 104 CLR 274

7 [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054

8 [1966] 2 All ER 162, [1967] 1 AC 169

9 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

10 [1964] 1 All ER at 912, [1964] AC at 1084

to whom the duty is owed and the person by whom the duty is owed or some thing whose dangerous condition that person has played a part in creating or continuing. Where the dangerous thing is situate on land in private occupation and is dangerous only to persons who come on to the land, the necessary characteristic of proximity between the occupier of the land and a person who sustains harm from the dangerous thing is created by that person's own act in coming on to the land. a

There is thus a relevant distinction between a person who is lawfully on the occupier's land with the occupier's consent and a trespasser. In the case of the former the occupier has consented to the creation of the relationship from which the duty flows; in the case of the trespasser the relationship has been forced on the occupier against his will and as the result of a legal wrong inflicted on him by the trespasser himself. b

This distinction, as it seems to me, supplies the jurisprudential basis for the proposition, implicit in the Scots cases about fencing land against trespassers, which were cited with the approval by Viscount Dunedin in *Addie v Dumbreck*¹¹ and explicit in *Quinlan's case*¹², that the occupier is not under any duty to take any precautions in advance to acquaint himself as to the likelihood or otherwise of trespassers coming on to any part of his land. He is entitled to assume that persons will not inflict a wrong on him unless he has actual knowledge of the likelihood that they will do so. It would be an unjustifiable burden for the law to impose on an occupier for the benefit of wrongdoers, a duty to make inspections and enquiries in order to ascertain whether or not trespassers were likely to come on to his land. So in the ordinary case of a person to whom the occupier has not given permission to come on his land, keeping the danger within the boundaries of his own land is itself a fulfilment of any duty he may owe to such a person to take reasonable steps to enable him to avoid such danger. The test of whether an occupier is under any duty to a trespasser to do more than to keep the danger within the boundaries of his land is whether he is actually aware of facts which make it likely that some trespasser will come on to that part of his land where the danger is. It is not what the occupier would have been aware of if he had exercised more diligence or foresight than he did. c
d
e

My Lords, the degree of expectation that a trespasser will come on his land that is sufficient to impose on him a duty to take any additional steps to enable such a trespasser to avoid the danger and whether there are any elements in it which require recourse to the standards of a reasonable man, can best be discussed after considering what is the content of that duty when it arises. f

The duty at common law owed by an occupier to a licensee as it was explained a 100 years ago by Willis J in the two leading cases of *Indermaur v Dames*¹³ and *Gautret v Egerton*¹⁴ was restricted to a duty to warn the licensee of traps or concealed dangers actually known to the occupier but not to the licensee. What constituted an adequate warning depended on the circumstances, including the age and understanding of the licensee. Since the licensee, unlike the invitee, came on to the premises for his own purposes it was his own responsibility to avoid dangers of which he knew or could have known by the exercise of reasonable care himself. It is for this reason that I have summarised the duty as a duty to take reasonable steps to enable a licensee to avoid a danger known by the occupier to exist on his land. g
h

The result of the technique of imputing a 'licence' to trespassers of a class whom the occupier knew were in the habit of coming on to his land was to extend to them the benefit of this duty. In contrast to the common law duty owed by an occupier to an invitee the test of a breach of the duty was in modern legal parlance 'subjective' rather than 'objective'. The duty to warn extended to concealed dangers of which the occupier actually knew and not to those of which he did not know, although he i

¹¹ [1929] AC at 374-376, [1929] All ER Rep at 9, 10

¹² [1964] 1 All ER at 910, [1964] AC at 1076

¹³ (1866) LR 1 CP 274, [1861-73] All ER Rep 15

¹⁴ (1867) LR 2 CP 371

would have done if he had exercised more diligence in inspecting his land than he did.

- a This 'subjective' duty was owed by an occupier to licensees of whose actual presence on the land and consequent exposure to danger he was unaware but ought to have foreseen because he had given them permission to go there. As respects licensees of whose presence and exposure to danger he was actually aware the content of his duty as I have summarised it differs very little in substance from Lord Hailsham LC's description in *Addie v Dumbreck*¹⁵ of conduct of an occupier which renders him
- b liable to a trespasser leaving aside intentional injury. He stated the occupier's duty to a trespasser whom he knew to be present, in the negative form of a duty to refrain from doing an act 'with reckless disregard of the presence of the trespasser', whereas I have summarised the occupier's duty to a trespasser whom he knows to be exposed to danger, in the positive form of a duty to take reasonable steps to enable the trespasser to avoid the danger. But positive and negative descriptions of duties of this
- c kind may be ways of describing the two sides of the same coin. In the passage immediately before that which I have quoted Lord Hailsham LC had stated the occupier's duty to his licensee in the negative form¹⁵:

'He is bound not to create a trap or to allow a concealed danger to exist upon the said premises which is known—or ought to be known—to the occupier.'

- d Although the inclusion of the words 'or ought to be known' does, I think, overstate the accepted definition of the common law duty to licensees.

- It is possible to conceive of circumstances where the concealed danger is due to the natural condition of the land, but all the actual cases in the books are about man-made dangers and it is to these that the language of the judgments is directed. Man-made danger may be the result of an act done while the trespasser is actually present
- e on the land, as was the case in *Addie v Dumbreck*¹⁶ itself, or an act done before the trespasser came on to the land. It can hardly be supposed that Lord Hailsham LC intended to draw a distinction between the liability of the occupier for setting the haulage machinery in motion when the child was known to be close to the pulley wheel and allowing it to continue in motion after the child was known to
- f have approached the wheel. In either case his conduct would manifest 'a reckless disregard of ordinary humanity'. In the context of recklessness of conduct there is no rational distinction between activity and inactivity.

The practical effect of the technique of imputing a 'licence' to trespassers of whose actual presence on the land the occupier was not aware was thus to put them in the same position vis-à-vis the occupier as if he had actually known of their presence and consequent exposure to a concealed danger of which he had actual knowledge.

- g Actual knowledge of a concealed danger, however, may involve two different mental elements: actual knowledge of an activity carried out on the land or of its physical condition, which constitutes a concealed danger to a person on the land; and actual appreciation that the known activity or condition does constitute a concealed danger. The relevance of this analysis, particularly in cases in which any
- h activities on the land are carried out by servants of the occupier for whose fault he is vicariously liable, does not appear to have been appreciated until comparatively recently, when the current vogue for classifying the tests of legal duties as either 'subjective' or 'objective' made it desirable to identify who the relevant 'subject' was. It played no part in judicial reasoning at the time of *Addie v Dumbreck*¹⁶. The possibility of drawing a distinction between knowledge of physical facts and appreciation of danger was first suggested in argument in *Baker v Bethnal Green Corp*¹⁷. It was eventually accepted by the Court of Appeal in *Hawkins v Coulsdon & Purley Urban District Council*¹⁸ in order to impose on a corporation as occupier liability based on the actual knowledge of the physical facts from which the danger arose. It was held

¹⁵ [1929] AC at 365, [1929] All ER Rep at 4

¹⁶ [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

¹⁷ [1945] 1 All ER 135

¹⁸ [1954] 1 All ER 97, [1954] 1 QB 319

that although the test of knowledge of the physical facts which constituted the concealed danger was subjective (did the occupier either personally or vicariously by his servants actually know them?), the test of appreciation of the danger resulting from the known facts was objective (would a reasonable man possessed of that knowledge of the physical facts appreciate the danger?).

If this can be characterised as an enlargement rather than a mere explanation by judicial decision of an occupier's duty to his licensees it was a development which had taken place before the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957 had substituted a statutory duty of care for the common law duty previously owed to licensees. That Act did not touch the occupier's duty to trespassers at common law. It left it to continue to be developed by judicial decision. Actual knowledge of concealed danger is a factor common to the duty previously owed at common law by an occupier to his licensees and to the duty still owed by an occupier to trespassers.

There is, in any event, a certain artificiality in ascribing an appreciation of risk to a fictitious person, a corporation—as this defendant is and as nowadays most defendants are. Knowledge of facts call for the use of eyes and ears; and these a corporation has through its employees, even the humblest. If any of them learns of the facts in the course of his employment, his knowledge is the knowledge of the corporation. But appreciation of risk of danger calls for the exercise of intelligent judgment; and it is the judgment of the corporation itself which is relevant. What human minds are to be treated as those of the corporation for the purpose of exercising that judgment? To take an example of what may have been the facts of the present case if the appellants had chosen to disclose them. The linesman when he saw the broken fence may have appreciated the risk of danger to trespassing children but have failed to report the state of the fence out of laziness or forgetfulness. Or, whether or not he himself appreciated the risk, he may have reported the state of the fence in terms which did not draw the attention of the recipient of his report to the danger involved. Or the recipient may himself have appreciated the risk but to save himself trouble decided to do nothing about it. And so on up the chain of responsibility to the employee of the corporation endowed with authority to order the fence to be repaired. Is appreciation of the risk by any one employee in this chain to be treated as appreciation of risk by the corporation itself?

One possible solution in the case of a corporation is to apply the objective standard of the reasonable man, by attributing to the fictitious person, the fictitious mind and judgment of a reasonable man. It would, however, be more consistent with the way in which English law develops, to apply to 'actual knowledge of a danger' as a factor in the duty of an occupier to trespassers the same analysis as was adopted in relation to the occupier's duty at common law to his licensees. This avoids differentiating between the real and the fictitious person as occupier and solves the metaphysical difficulties of ascribing to the latter an actual appreciation of the risk. To see the danger signal yet not to take the trouble to give some thought to it is conduct which the law ought to condemn.

My Lords, I conclude therefore that there is no duty owed by an occupier to any trespasser unless he actually knows of the physical facts in relation to the state of his land or some activity carried out on it, which constitute a serious danger to persons on the land who are unaware of those facts. He is under no duty to any trespasser to make inspections or enquiries to ascertain whether there is any such danger. Where he does know of physical facts which a reasonable man would appreciate involved danger of serious injury to the trespasser his duty is to take reasonable steps to enable the trespasser to avoid the danger. What constitute reasonable steps will depend on the kind of trespasser to whom the duty is owed. If the duty is owed to small children too young to understand a warning notice the duty may require the provision of an obstacle to their approach to the danger sufficiently difficult to surmount as to make it clear to the youngest unaccompanied child likely to approach the danger, that beyond the obstacle is forbidden territory.

Such being, as I would hold, the content of the occupier's duty to a trespasser, I a return to the consideration of the class of trespassers to whom the duty is owed and, in particular, to the degree of expectation on the part of the occupier that the trespassers will come on to his land which, in the absence of actual knowledge of his presence, is sufficient to give rise to the duty. It is a problem which does not arise in the case of licensees to whom he has given permission to come there.

In Quinlan's case¹⁹ a variety of expressions were used to describe the necessary degree of expectation. The occupier must 'as good as know' that the trespasser is present at the time of the injury. His presence must be fairly described as 'extremely likely' or 'very probable'. I do not find these latter phrases helpful save as a warning that the presence of trespassers being unpredictable as compared with that of licensees, this unpredictability must not be allowed to impose on the occupier a duty to give his mind to all the possible circumstances in which a trespasser might come on to his land. If this branch of the law is based on 'ordinary humanity' it would seem c evident that there must be a relationship between the degree of expectation and the degree of danger. In the case of a minefield, as in *Adams v Naylor*²⁰, or a live electric rail, an ordinarily humane man would regard it as incumbent on him to take precautions to protect intruders against the mortal danger which these objects present although the likelihood of there being intruders was much less than that which would cause him to take precautions to protect intruders against more innocuous d perils. Furthermore, the relevant likelihood is that of the trespasser's presence at the place and time of danger. If the danger is created by an occasional or intermittent activity on the land, such as putting machines or vehicles in motion, the test of the creation of the occupier's liability to the injured trespasser is his expectation of a trespasser's presence at the point of danger at that moment of activity. Whereas e if the danger lies in some permanent condition of the land, such as a live rail, the test is his expectation of some trespasser's presence at the point of danger at any time while that condition continues to exist. Thirdly, in the case of children, the degree of attractiveness to children of something present on the land, is relevant to the occupier's expectation that child trespassers will come on to his land and will approach the point of danger, as well as being relevant to the kind of precaution he must take f to protect them from the danger.

My Lords, an occupier's expectation of a trespasser's presence, like his knowledge of a concealed danger, also involves two mental elements: actual knowledge of physical facts which indicate that trespassers are likely to come on to the land; and appreciation of the resulting likelihood. For reasons similar to those which I have indicated I think that, as the law has now developed, the test of appreciation of the likelihood of trespass is whether a reasonable man knowing only the physical facts g which the occupier actually knew, would appreciate that a trespasser's presence at the point and time of danger was so likely that in all the circumstances it would be inhumane not to give to him effective warning of the danger or, in the case of a child too young to understand a warning, not to take steps to convey to his infant intelligence that he must keep away. I do not think that a judge or jury would find any difficulty in applying this test.

h I would then seek to summarise the characteristics of an occupier's duty to trespassers on his land which distinguishes it from the statutory 'common duty of care' owed to persons lawfully on his land under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, and from the common law duty of care owed by one man to his 'neighbour', in the Atkinian sense, where the relationship of occupier and trespasser does not subsist between them. To do so does involve rejecting Lord Hailsham LC's formulation i of the duty in *Addie v Dumbreck*²¹ as amounting to an exclusive or comprehensive statement of it as it exists today. It takes account, as this House as the final expositor of the common law should always do, of changes in social attitudes and circumstances and gives effect to the general public sentiment of what is 'reckless' conduct as it has expanded over the 40 years which have elapsed since the decision in that case.

19 [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054

20 [1944] 2 All ER 21, [1944] 1 KB 750, aff'd [1946] 2 All ER 241, [1946] AC 543

21 [1929] AC at 365, [1929] All ER Rep at 4

First, the duty does not arise until the occupier has actual knowledge either of the presence of the trespasser on his land or of facts which make it likely that the trespasser will come on to his land; and has also actual knowledge of facts as to the condition of his land or of activities carried out on it which are likely to cause personal injury to a trespasser who is unaware of the danger. He is under no duty to the trespasser to make any enquiry or inspection to ascertain whether or not such facts do exist. His liability does not arise until he actually knows of them.

Secondly, once the occupier has actual knowledge of such facts, his own failure to appreciate the likelihood of the trespasser's presence or the risk to him involved, does not absolve the occupier from his duty to the trespasser if a reasonable man possessed of the actual knowledge of the occupier would recognise that likelihood and that risk.

Thirdly, the duty when it arises is limited to taking reasonable steps to enable the trespasser to avoid the danger. Where the likely trespasser is a child too young to understand or heed a written or a previous oral warning, this may involve providing reasonable physical obstacles to keep the child away from the danger.

Fourthly, the relevant likelihood to be considered is of the trespasser's presence at the actual time and place of danger to him. The degree of likelihood needed to give rise to the duty cannot, I think, be more closely defined than as being such as would impel a man of ordinary humane feelings to take some steps to mitigate the risk of injury to the trespasser to which the particular danger exposes him. It will thus depend on all the circumstances of the case: the permanent or intermittent character of the danger; the severity of the injuries which it is likely to cause; in the case of children, the attractiveness to them of that which constitutes the dangerous object or condition of the land; the expense involved in giving effective warning of it to the kind of trespasser likely to be injured, in relation to the occupier's resources in money or in labour.

My Lords, on the findings of the trial judge in the instant appeal, I find no difficulty in inferring that through the eyes or ears of one or other of their servants the appellants did know the physical facts that made it likely that little children playing in Bunces Meadow would trespass on their line and that if they did so would run a serious risk of grave if not mortal injury from the electric rail. Breach of the other characteristics of the duty which then arose, is in my view, established. I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal.

It might, however, leave this branch of the common law of England still in confusion if this House did not state categorically the respects in which the test of an occupier's duty to a trespasser differs from that stated by the majority of the Court of Appeal in *Videan v British Transport Commission*¹ and reiterated by the whole court in *Kingzett v British Railways Board*² despite the intervening adverse comment by the Privy Council in *Quinlan's case*³.

In the instant case the trial judge felt that he was bound to follow the reasoning of *Videan's case*¹ and *Kingzett's case*². The Court of Appeal⁴ felt able to decide it without recourse to *Videan's case*¹, by treating the stationmaster's failure to do anything except to warn the police when children had trespassed on the land two months before, as falling within Lord Hailsham LC's formula in *Addie v Dumbreck*⁵ as 'an act done with reckless disregard of the presence of a trespasser'. This was, I think, unduly censorious of the stationmaster as an individual. It was unnecessary to apportion among their individual servants the blame which lay on the appellants. The reckless act was that of the fictitious person, the appellants themselves, in allowing the deadly current to flow through the live rail when, through one or more of their servants they knew the physical facts which made it likely that a little child would stray from Bunces Meadow and come in contact with the rail.

The test propounded by the majority of the Court of Appeal in *Videan's case*¹ is,

1 [1963] 2 All ER 860, [1963] 2 QB 650

4 [1971] 1 All ER 897, [1971] 2 QB 107

2 (1968) 112 Sol Jo 625

5 [1929] AC at 365, [1929] All ER Rep at 4

3 [1964] 1 All ER 897, [1964] AC 1054

a in my view, wrong in three respects. (1) It draws an unwarrantable distinction between a 'static' condition of the occupier's land and an 'activity' which the occupier carries out on it. In respect of activities of the occupier on the land it accords the trespasser the status of 'neighbour' vis-à-vis the occupier despite the fact that he has forced this relationship on the occupier against the latter's will and by a wrongful act done to the occupier. (2) It treats the source of the relationship which gives rise to the occupier's duty towards a trespasser in respect of 'activities' as mere foreseeability of the trespasser's presence, just as in the case of someone lawfully on his land. This suggests that there is some duty on the occupier to make inspections or enquiries in order to acquaint himself of the likelihood of a trespasser's coming on to his land. There is no such duty. (3) It treats the duty of the occupier to the trespasser in respect of 'activities' as identical with his duty to persons lawfully on his land instead of the more restricted duty to take reasonable steps to enable the trespasser to avoid concealed dangers resulting from the existence of facts actually known to the occupier.

In the instant appeal your Lordships are concerned only with the liability of an occupier of land towards a trespasser whose presence on the land is a legal wrong committed by the trespasser on the occupier himself. This is not necessarily the same as the liability of some other person, who carries on an activity on the land with the permission of the occupier, towards a person who, although a trespasser vis-à-vis the occupier, commits no legal wrong on him who carries on the activity. There are three cases at first instance in which it has been held by judges of great eminence that a contractor, who is not the occupier of land, owes to trespassers on the land the ordinary common law duty of care owed by one man to his neighbour. That he is a trespasser vis-à-vis the occupier was treated as relevant only to the foreseeability of his presence. (See *Buckland v Guildford Gas Light and Coke Co*⁶, *Davis v St Mary's Demolition & Excavation Co*⁷ and *Creed v John McGeoch & Sons Ltd*⁸.) In Videan's case⁹ it was asserted baldly that there was neither rhyme nor reason why the occupier's liability to a trespasser should differ from that of a contractor. There is at least one possible reason in logic and in law. Disapproval of the ratio decidendi of Videan's case⁹ does not necessarily involve any conflict with the decisions in the three contractors' cases to which I have referred. The instant case is not an appropriate one in which to deal with the liability to a trespasser of persons who are not the occupiers of the land on which the trespass is committed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Evan Harding (for the appellants); Parker, Fogg & Pinsent (for the respondent).

S A Hatteea Esq Barrister.

Practice Direction

FAMILY DIVISION

Ward of court – Practice – Proof of date of birth of the minor.

At or before the time of the first hearing of an originating summons for wardship proof of the date of birth of the minor should, wherever possible, be given by lodgment of a birth certificate (which, unless otherwise directed, need not be exhibited to an affidavit). Failing this, directions as to proof of birth will be given by the registrar. When it is established, the date of birth will be recorded in the Register of Wards.

COMPTON MILLER
Senior Registrar

18th February 1972

6 [1948] 2 All ER 1086, [1949] 1 KB 410	8 [1955] 3 All ER 123, [1955] 1 WLR 1005
7 [1954] 1 All ER 578, [1954] 1 WLR 592	9 [1963] 2 All ER 860, [1963] 2 QB 650

Note

Libman v General Medical Council

PRIVY COUNCIL

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST MARYLEBONE LC, LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA AND LORD KILBRANDON
5th, 6th, 7th, 20th OCTOBER 1971

Privy Council – Medical Act appeal – Appeal from determination of disciplinary committee of General Medical Council – Right of appeal – Nature of appeal – Circumstances in which Privy Council may reverse a decision of disciplinary committee.

Note

For appeals from the disciplinary committee of the General Medical Council, see 9 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 377, para 882, and 26 ibid 71, 72, para 149.

Cases referred to in opinion

Bhattacharya v General Medical Council [1967] 2 AC 259, [1967] 3 WLR 498, Digest (Cont Vol C) 664, 26c.

Felix v General Dental Council [1960] 2 All ER 391, [1960] AC 704, [1960] 2 WLR 934, 33 Digest (Repl) 567, 299.

Fox v General Medical Council [1960] 3 All ER 225, [1960] 1 WLR 1017, 124 JP 467, Digest (Cont Vol A) 521, 520a.

Sivarajah v General Medical Council [1964] 1 All ER 504, [1964] 1 WLR 112, Digest (Cont Vol B) 519, 47Aa.

Appeal

This was an appeal by Julius Libman against a determination of the disciplinary committee of the General Medical Council dated 4th March 1971 whereby the appellant was found guilty of serious professional misconduct and his registration was suspended for six months. The disciplinary committee found that the appellant, a registered medical practitioner, had committed sexual intercourse with a patient, Mrs Jean Wroe, on 11th March 1970 at his consulting room, and subsequently, both personally and through his solicitors, had made improper attempts, including the offer of sums of money, to persuade Mr and Mrs Wroe to refrain from making and pursuing a complaint of his conduct to the General Medical Council.

J P Comyn QC and J Hamilton for the appellant.

A B Hidden for the General Medical Council.

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST MARYLEBONE LC. This is an appeal from the disciplinary committee of the General Medical Council given on 4th March 1971 by which the appellant was found guilty of serious professional misconduct and the disciplinary committee directed the suspension of his registration for six months.

The appellant is a consultant physician of hitherto unblemished reputation who had been carrying on practice as a medical practitioner since 1929. The complainants were a married couple referred to hereafter, and respectively, as Mr and Mrs Wroe. It was conceded that, at the time of the matters complained of in the charges against the appellant, Mrs Wroe was the patient of the appellant, having been referred to him as consultant by her general practitioner, Dr Kay, for advice on an asthmatic condition which may have been partly psychological in origin. There were a number of matters in the complaint which were not sustained. The order of the disciplinary committee was based on two principal findings, the first that the appellant had sexual intercourse with Mrs Wroe on 11th March 1970 at his consulting room at 28 St John Street, Manchester; the second that he subsequently made, both personally and through his solicitors, improper attempts, including the offer of money, to a persuade Mr and Mrs Wroe to refrain from making and pursuing a complaint of his conduct to the General Medical Council.

As regards the latter of the two adverse findings, it was common ground that the appellant had in fact offered sums up to £10,000 to Mr and Mrs Wroe as the price of their silence about the matter complained of. The appellant conceded that, in the event of the finding of the disciplinary committee on the alleged sexual intercourse of 11th March 1970 being sustained in the course of this appeal, the appeal also failed in relation to this additional adverse finding. It was also conceded by the appellant that, in the event of the findings being sustained the penalty inflicted could not be complained of on the ground of undue severity. Before dealing with the merits of the appeal it is appropriate to explain that, at the conclusion of his argument, their Lordships were invited by counsel for the appellant to make some general observations on the nature of the jurisdiction exercised by the judicial committee in proceedings of this nature. In fact, in order to give full weight to the appellant's argument, it is necessary to do so.

The discipline of the medical profession is based on the provisions of Part V of the Medical Act 1956 (ss 32-39) as amended, and in particular as amended by the Medical Act 1969. The appellate jurisdiction of the Board is defined under s 36 of the principal Act as amended by s 14 of the 1969 Act. The relevant section is s 36 (3) of the principal Act and this reads as follows:

(3) At any time within twenty-eight days of the service of a notification under subsection (1) of this section, the person on whom it was served may, in accordance with such rules as Her Majesty in Council may by Order provide for the purposes of this section, appeal to Her Majesty in Council; and the Judicial Committee Act, 1833, shall apply in relation to the Disciplinary Committee as it applies to such courts as are mentioned in section three of that Act (which provides for the reference to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of appeals to Her Majesty in Council).

'The power conferred by this subsection to make an Order shall include power to vary or revoke the Order by a subsequent Order made in the like manner, and any Order in Council under this subsection shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'

The proceedings before the disciplinary committee are governed by the General Medical Council Disciplinary Committee (Procedure) Rules Order of Council 1970¹ and the proceedings for the hearing of an appeal before the Judicial Committee by the Judicial Committee (Medical Rules) (No 2) Order 1971². Both these statutory instruments are under Parliamentary control and possess the legal force of Acts of Parliament. During the course of argument on the extent and exercise of this jurisdiction their Lordships were referred to *Felix v General Dental Council*³, a decision under the parallel provisions of the Dentists Act 1957; to *Fox v General Medical Council*⁴; to *Sivarajah v General Medical Council*⁵; and to *Bhattacharya v General Medical Council*⁶. Of these authorities, the account of the jurisdiction by Lord Radcliffe in *Fox v General Medical Council*⁷ is the fullest and perhaps the best, but their Lordships draw the following general propositions from all four decisions:

(1) The appeal lies of right by the statute and the terms of statute do not limit or qualify the appeal in any way, so that the appellant is entitled to claim that it is in a

1 SI 1970 No 596

2 SI 1971 No 393

3 [1960] 2 All ER 391 at 397, [1960] AC 704 at 716

4 [1960] 3 All ER 225, [1960] 1 WLR 1017

5 [1964] 1 All ER 504, [1964] 1 WLR 112

6 [1967] 2 AC 259 at 265

7 [1960] 3 All ER at 226-228, [1960] 1 WLR at 1020-1022

general sense nothing less than a rehearing of his case and a review of the decision. See per Lord Radcliffe in *Fox v General Medical Council*⁸.

(2) Notwithstanding the generality of the above language, the actual exercise of the jurisdiction is severely limited by the circumstances in which it can be invoked. The appeal is not by way of re-hearing in the sense that the witnesses are heard afresh or the evidence gone over again (see per Lord Radcliffe⁶). This, amongst other things, means that there is a heavy burden on an appellant who wishes to displace a verdict on the grounds that the evidence alone makes the decision unsatisfactory.

(3) Beyond a bare statement of its findings of fact, the disciplinary committee does not in general give reasons for its decision as in the case of a trial in the High Court by judge alone from which an appeal by way of rehearing lies to the Court of Appeal (see per Lord Radcliffe⁹). It follows from this that the only circumstances in which an appellate court can reverse a view of the facts taken by the disciplinary committee would be a case where, on examination, it would appear that the committee had misread the evidence to such an extent that they were not entitled to make a finding in the state of the evidence presented before them.

(4) The legal assessor who assists the committee at its hearing is not a judge, and his advice to the committee is not a summing up, and no analogy with a criminal appeal against a conviction before a judge and jury can properly be drawn. The legal assessor simply advises the committee in camera on points of law and reports his advice in open court after he has given it. The committee under its president are masters both of law and of the facts and what might amount to misdirection in law by a judge to a jury at a criminal trial does not necessarily invalidate the committee's decision. Where a criticism is made of the legal adviser's account of his advice the question is whether it can fairly be thought to have been of sufficient significance to the result to invalidate the decision. See *Fox v General Medical Council*¹⁰ and per Lord Guest in *Sivarajah v General Medical Council*¹¹.

In the result, although the jurisdiction conferred by the statute is unlimited, the circumstances in which it is exercised in accordance with the rules approved by Parliament are such as to make it difficult for an appellant to displace a finding or order of the committee unless it can be shown that something was clearly wrong either (i) in the conduct of the trial or (ii) in the legal principles applied or (iii) unless it can be shown that the findings of the committee were sufficiently out of tune with the evidence to indicate with reasonable certainty that the evidence had been misread. Or, of course, an appellant can rely cumulatively or in the alternative on any combination of the three. In the present case, for instance, counsel for the appellant relied on criticisms of the assessor's advice to supplement what he alleged was the weakness of the evidence against the appellant.

It is against this background and within this legal framework that the present appeal falls to be considered. [His Lordship then considered the grounds of appeal and concluded:] The result must be that the appeal fails, being basically an appeal against the findings of a committee on the matter of fact on which there was ample evidence to entitle them to come to the conclusion they did. In the result their Lordships have humbly advised Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs of the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Hempsons (for the appellant); Waterhouse & Co (for the General Medical Council).

S A Hatteea Esq Barrister.

⁸ [1960] 3 All ER at 226, [1960] 1 WLR at 1020

⁹ [1960] 3 All ER at 227, 229, [1960] 1 WLR at 1021, 1023

¹⁰ [1960] 3 All ER 225, [1960] 1 WLR 1017

¹¹ [1964] 1 All ER at 507, [1964] 1 WLR at 116, 117

Cassell & Co Ltd v Broome and another

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST MARYLEBONE LC, LORD REID, LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, VISCOUNT DILHORNE, LORD WILBERFORCE, LORD DIPLOCK AND LORD KILBRANDON

26th, 29th, 30th NOVEMBER, 1ST, 2ND, 3RD, 6TH, 7TH, 8TH, 9TH, 10TH, 13TH, 15TH, 16TH, 17TH
20TH DECEMBER 1971, 23RD FEBRUARY 1972

Libel – Damages – Exemplary or punitive damages – Principles on which exemplary damages awarded – Whether appropriate cases for award restricted to categories laid down in Rookes v Barnard^a.

c Libel – Damages – Exemplary or punitive damages – Categories in Rookes v Barnard^a – Calculation that profit would exceed compensation payable to the injured person – Necessity to show knowledge that what was done was against law and decision to persist with it because prospects of material advantage outweighed prospects of material loss – Unnecessary to show defendant had made arithmetical calculation that profit would exceed loss.

d Libel – Damages – Exemplary or punitive damages – Categories in Rookes v Barnard^a – Direction to jury – Direction that exemplary damages to be awarded ‘if, but only if’ proposed compensatory damages insufficient to punish defendant – Direction to jury that exemplary damages to be additional to compensatory damages – Whether sufficient.

e Libel – Damages – Exemplary or punitive damages – Joint defendants – Award of single sum – Degrees of blameworthiness – One defendant more blameworthy than other – No necessity to split damages between defendants according to blameworthiness – Sum to be that appropriate for least blameworthy.

f Damages – Exemplary damages – Oppressive, arbitrary or unconstitutional conduct by servants of the government – Servants of the government – Class extending to local government officials, police and others exercising governmental functions.

Damages – Exemplary damages – Deceit – Whether exemplary damages can be awarded.

Pleading – Damages – Exemplary damages – No need to plead.

g Judgment – Judicial decision as authority – Decision of House of Lords – Decision per incuriam – Whether Court of Appeal bound to follow decision.

h A wrote a book entitled ‘The Destruction of Convoy PQ17’. The book was about one of the great naval disasters of the second world war in which a large number of merchant vessels in convoy PQ17 were destroyed and many lives lost. B was the officer commanding the naval ships escorting the convoy at the time of the disaster. The book placed the blame for the disaster on B, and contained grave imputations on his conduct. In writing the book A knew fully what he was doing and persisted with it in spite of repeated warnings from the most authoritative sources that the relevant passages in the book were defamatory of B. A’s view was that it was possible to say ‘some pretty near the knuckle things about’ B and others involved in the episode j ‘but if one says it in a clever enough way, they cannot take action’. Nevertheless A’s thesis was stated sufficiently plainly for an experienced publisher to understand perfectly well its meaning. A’s original publishers, W K Ltd, refused to publish the book on the ground that it was ‘a continuous witch hunt of B’. They had been advised that ‘the book reeks of defamation’. A then offered the book to C Ltd who agreed to publish it. C Ltd were warned by W K Ltd that they had rejected the book on the ground that it was libellous. B himself also warned C Ltd on several occasions that if they published the book without substantial modification they must expect an action for libel from him. Nevertheless C Ltd went ahead and published a hardback edition of the book with a dust jacket, the advertisement on which in terms indicated that C Ltd were well aware of the full implication of the passages complained of and were prepared to sell the book on the basis of this sensational interpretation of the naval disaster. B issued a writ for libel against C Ltd and A and included in his reamended statement of claim the following plea: '[B] will assert that the defendants and each of them calculated that the money to be made out of the said book containing the passages complained of would probably exceed the damages at risk (if any) and that [B] is consequently entitled to exemplary damages'. In his summing-up the judge directed the jury that having considered whether B was entitled to compensatory damages they were to go on and ask whether B had proved that he was entitled to exemplary damages and to ask, 'What additional sum should be awarded him by way of exemplary damages?' The judge asked them to underline the word 'additional' because he wanted to know 'how much more do you award over and above the compensatory damage'. He also directed the jury that they should award a single sum by way of exemplary damages and stated that, if they were to ask whether they should award a larger sum against one of the defendants if they thought him more blameworthy, the answer to that question was No. He further explained that a single sum was to be awarded against both defendants. The jury, having found that the words complained of were defamatory and untrue, awarded B damages of £40,000 against both defendants, assessing the compensatory damages at £15,000 and the exemplary damages at £25,000. A and C Ltd appealed against the award of damages contending inter alia that the judge's direction on the question of exemplary damages failed to comply with the requirements laid down by the House of Lords in Rookes v Barnard^b. The Court of Appeal^c dismissed the appeal, holding that the decision of the House in Rookes v Barnard^b was not good law since it had been arrived at per incuriam and without argument on the point by counsel. The court further held that in any event the judge's direction complied with the requirements of Rookes v Barnard^b. C Ltd appealed on the question of exemplary damages to the House of Lords.

Held – (i) (Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Wilberforce dissenting) The decision of the House in Rookes v Barnard^b had correctly formulated the principles of law governing the circumstances in which exemplary damages, i.e. damages by way of punishment of the defendant in excess of those necessary to compensate the plaintiff for the injury done to him, might be awarded to a plaintiff in the case of certain torts; the principles enunciated in that decision were applicable to defamation cases; the decision could not be said to have been made per incuriam since it had been arrived at after a full consideration of the authorities and the House was not bound to limit its conclusions within any formulation which counsel had thought fit to formulate (see p 807 f, p 823 c, p 827 d to g, p 833 j, p 835 j to p 836 a, p 841 g and h, p 842 h, p 846 f, p 847 c, p 870 f and g, p 872 c, p 873 d and e, p 875 a and b and p 877 f, post).

Rookes v Barnard [1964] 1 All ER 367 followed.

McCarey v Associated Newspapers Ltd [1964] 3 All ER 947, Broadway Approvals Ltd v Odhams Press Ltd [1965] 2 All ER 523, Fielding v Variety Incorporated [1967] 2 All ER 497 and Mafo v Adams [1969] 3 All ER 1404 approved.

E Hulton & Co v Jones [1908-10] All ER Rep 29 and Ley v Hamilton (1935) 153 LT 384 distinguished.

Uren v John Fairfax & Sons Pty Ltd (1967) 117 CLR 118 and Australian Consolidated Press Ltd v Uren [1967] 3 All ER 523 considered.

^b [1964] 1 All ER 367

^c [1971] 2 All ER 187

a (ii) (Viscount Dilhorne, Lord Wilberforce and Lord Diplock dissenting) On the basis of the principles formulated in Rookes v Barnard^d the jury's award of £25,000 exemplary damages against the defendants should be upheld for the following reasons—

b (a) there was ample evidence to leave to the jury on which they could find that the case fell within the second category of cases laid down in Rookes v Barnard^d in which it was permissible to award exemplary damages, ie that the defendants' conduct had been calculated to make a profit for them which might well exceed the compensation payable to B as damages; to bring a case within the second category it was necessary to show (1) knowledge that what was proposed to be done was against the law or a reckless disregard whether what was proposed to be done was illegal or legal, and (2) a decision to carry on doing it because the prospects of material advantage outweighed the prospects of material loss; it was not necessary that the defendant should have made an arithmetical calculation that the plaintiff's damages if he sued to judgment would be smaller than the defendant's profit (see p 812 a and b, p 813 d and g to j, p 830 g and h, p 831 a to d, p 839 b and c, p 843 e to h and p 875 to p 876 c and e, post);

d (b) although not as clear as it might have been, the judge's direction was adequate to convey to the jury that they should make an award of exemplary damages 'if, but only if' they were satisfied that the sum they had in mind to award as compensation was inadequate to punish the defendants for their conduct; the emphasis placed by the judge on the word 'additional' in explaining to the jury that an award of exemplary damages would be additional to any compensatory damages was sufficient, taken in the context of the summing-up as a whole, to convey to the jury the necessary requirements for an award of exemplary damages (see p 816 a to e, p 839 h, e p 844 g and h, p 845 c and e and p 877 h, post);

f (c) when a plaintiff elected to sue more than one defendant in the same action in respect of the same publication only one sum could be awarded against the defendants by way of exemplary damages; in such circumstances the sum awarded could not be higher than the lowest sum for which any of the defendants could be held liable; the judge's direction was sufficient to make clear to the jury that, if different sums by way of exemplary damages were appropriate for each of the two defendants, they were to award the lower against both (see p 817 c to f, p 818 e and f, p 840 d to g, p 845 f, and p 877 h, post);

g (d) since the jury was the only legal and constitutional tribunal for deciding on the award of damages in libel cases an appellate court should only interfere with an award where it was so manifestly too large that no reasonable jury, properly directed, could possibly have come to it; although the award of exemplary damages was exceptionally high it was impossible to say that no jury of reasonable men could have reached that sum (see p 819 a to d, p 820 f, p 841 b, p 845 f and h, p 846 b and p 878 b, post).

h Per Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC, Lord Reid, Lord Wilberforce, Lord Diplock and Lord Kilbrandon. Decisions of the House of Lords are binding on the Court of Appeal and it is not open to that court to advise judges to ignore decisions of the House on the ground that they were decided per incuriam or are unworkable (see p 809 d to g, p 835 h, p 859 h, p 874 f and p 878 f, post. Furthermore (per Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC and Lord Diplock) although it is open to an appellate court to decline to follow one of its own previous decisions on the ground that it was decided per incuriam, the Court of Appeal is not entitled to disregard a decision of the House of Lords, nor is a judge of the High Court entitled to disregard a decision of the Court of Appeal, on that ground (see p 809 h and p 874 h, post).

i Per Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC, Lord Reid, Lord Diplock and Lord Kilbrandon. The first category of cases in which exemplary damages may be awarded, ie cases of oppressive, arbitrary or unconstitutional action by servants of the government, should not be limited to servants of the government in the strict sense of the word but should be extended to others, such as local government officials or the police, who may be described as exercising governmental functions (see p 829 j to p 830 a, p 838 f, p 873 h and p 877 d, post).

Per Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC and Lord Diplock. The decision in Rookes v Barnard^e did not have the effect of extending the power to award exemplary damages to torts, such as deceit or negligence, where exemplary damages could not previously have been awarded (see p 828 g and h and p 874 f, post); dictum of Lord Widgery LJ in Mafo v Adams [1969] 3 All ER at 1410 disapproved.

Per Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC. The jury should normally be asked to award a single sum whether as solatium, ie full compensation to the plaintiff, or as exemplary damages. If, in order to avoid a second trial, they are asked a second question, they should be asked, in the event of their awarding exemplary damages, what smaller sum they would have awarded if they had confined themselves to solatium (see p 833 h, post).

Per Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC. In accordance with current practice exemplary damages need not be pleaded (see p 834 h, post).

Decision of the Court of Appeal sub nom Broome v Cassell & Co Ltd [1971] 2 All ER 187 affirmed on different grounds.

Notes

For the award of exemplary damages, see 11 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 223-225, para 391, and for cases on the subject, see 17 Digest (Repl) 76, 11-13.

For appeals in relation to excessive damages in actions for libel, see 24 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 121, para 225, and for damages against joint tortfeasors, see ibid 115, para 213, and for cases on these subjects, see 17 Digest (Repl) 180-189, 752-859, 175-177, 691-717.

Cases referred to in opinions

Addie (R) & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1, 98 LJPC 119, 140 LT 650; rvsg sub nom Dumbreck v Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd 1928 SC 547, 36 Digest (Repl) 120, 604.

Addis v Gramophone Co Ltd [1909] AC 488, [1908-10] All ER Rep 1, 78 LJKB 1122, 101 LT 466, 17 Digest (Repl) 74, 1.

Ashby v White (1703) 2 Ld Raym 938, Holt KB 524, 6 Mod Rep 45, 1 Salk 19; rvsd on other grounds (1704) 1 Bro Parl Cas 62, 17 Digest (Repl) 79, 22.

A-G for New South Wales v Perpetual Trustee Co Ltd [1955] 1 All ER 846, [1955] AC 457, [1955] 2 WLR 707, 119 JP 312, Digest (Cont Vol A) 978, *372a.

Australian Consolidated Press Ltd v Uren [1967] 3 All ER 523, [1969] AC 590, [1967] 3 WLR 1338, Digest (Cont Vol C) 285, 13b.

Bell v Midland Ry Co (1861) 10 CBNS 287, 30 LJCP 273, 4 LT 293, 17 Digest (Repl) 105, 200.

Benham v Gambling [1941] 1 All ER 7, [1941] AC 157, 110 LJKB 49, 164 LT 290, 36 Digest (Repl) 231, 1227.

Bocock v Enfield Rolling Mills Ltd [1954] 3 All ER 94, [1954] 1 WLR 1303, [1954] 2 Lloyd's Rep 103, Digest (Cont Vol A) 471, 763a.

Broadway Approvals Ltd v Odhams Press Ltd [1965] 2 All ER 523, [1965] 1 WLR 805, Digest (Cont Vol B) 493, 1910a.

Bulli Coal Mining Co v Osborne [1899] AC 351, [1895-99] All ER Rep 506, 68 LJPC 49, 80 LT 430, 33 Digest (Repl) 788, 618.

Chapman v Ellesmere (Lord) [1932] 2 KB 431, [1932] All ER Rep 221, 101 LJKB 376, 146 LT 538, 17 Digest (Repl) 175, 698.

Clark v Newsam (1847) 1 Exch 131, 16 LJEx 296, 9 LTOS 199, 11 JP 840, 17 Digest (Repl) 176, 704.

^e [1964] 1 All ER 367

- a Crouch v Great Northern Ry Co (1856) 11 Exch 742, 25 LJEx 137, 26 LTOS 293, 8 Digest (Repl) 16, 79.
Dawson v McClelland [1899] 2 IR 486, 50 Digest (Repl) 445, 1431.
Dougherty v Chandler (1946) 46 SR (NSW) 370.
Egger v Viscount Chelmsford (or Davies) [1964] 3 All ER 406, [1965] 1 QB 248, [1964] 3 WLR 714, Digest (Cont Vol B) 493, 1998a.
- b English and Scottish Co-op Properties Mortgage and Investment Society Ltd v Odhams Press Ltd [1940] 1 All ER 1, [1940] 1 KB 440, 109 LJKB 273, 162 LT 82, 32 Digest (Repl) 88, 1103.
Fay v Parker (1873) 53 NH 342.
Fielding v Variety Incorporated [1967] 2 All ER 497, [1967] 2 QB 841, [1967] 3 WLR 415, Digest (Cont Vol C) 632, 2127b.
- c Forsdike v Stone (1868) LR 3 CP 607, 37 LJCP 301, 18 LT 722, 17 Digest (Repl) 193, 902.
Greenlands Ltd v Wilmshurst and London Association for Protection of Trade [1913] 3 KB 507, 83 LJKB 1, 109 LT 487; rvsd HL sub nom London Association for Protection of Trade v Greenlands Ltd [1916] 2 AC 15, [1916-17] All ER Rep 452, 17 Digest (Repl) 175, 697.
Heydon's Case (1612) 11 Co Rep 5a, 77 ER 1150, 17 Digest (Repl) 175, 692.
- d Hill v Goodchild (1771) 5 Burr 2790, 98 ER 465, 17 Digest (Repl) 175, 691.
Huckle v Money (1763) 2 Wils 205, 95 ER 768, 17 Digest (Repl) 188, 832.
Hulton (E) & Co v Jones [1910] AC 20, [1908-10] All ER Rep 29, 79 LJKB 198, 101 LT 831, 32 Digest (Repl) 18, 84.
James v Baird 1916 SC 510.
Jones v Secretary of State for Social Services, Hudson v Secretary of State for Social Services p 145 ante, [1972] 2 WLR 210.
- e Leith v Pope (1779) 2 Wm Bl 1327, 96 ER 277, 17 Digest (Repl) 188, 836.
Lewis v Daily Telegraph Ltd, Same v Associated Newspapers Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 151, [1964] AC 234, [1963] 2 WLR 1063; affg [1962] 2 All ER 698, [1963] 1 QB 340, [1962] 3 WLR 50, 32 Digest (Repl) 85, 1073.
Ley v Hamilton (1935) 153 LT 384; rvsg (1934) 151 LT 360, 17 Digest (Repl) 188, 838.
- f Livingstone v Rawyards Coal Co (1880) 5 App Cas 25, 42 LT 334, 44 JP 392, 17 Digest (Repl) 80, 30.
Loudon v Ryder [1953] 1 All ER 741, [1953] 2 QB 202, [1953] 2 WLR 537, 17 Digest (Repl) 76, 13.
McCarey v Associated Newspapers Ltd [1964] 3 All ER 947, [1965] 2 QB 86, [1965] 2 WLR 45, Digest (Cont Vol B) 492, 1769a.
M'Grath v Bourne (1876) IR 10 CL 160, 17 Digest (Repl) 184, *652.
- g Mafo v Adams [1969] 3 All ER 1404, [1970] 1 QB 548, [1970] 2 WLR 72, Digest (Cont Vol C) 706, 583a.
Manson v Associated Newspapers Ltd [1965] 2 All ER 954, [1965] 1 WLR 1038, Digest (Cont Vol B) 494, 2121a.
Mechanical and General Inventions Co Ltd and Lehwess v Austin and the Austin Motor Co Ltd [1935] AC 346, [1935] All ER Rep 22, 104 LJKB 403, 153 LT 153, 51 Digest (Repl) 863, 4134.
- h Mediana, (Owners) v Comet (Owners etc), The Mediana [1900] AC 113, [1900-3] All ER Rep 126, 69 LJP 35, 82 LT 95, 9 Asp MLC 41, 17 Digest (Repl) 76, 10.
Merest v Harvey (1814) 5 Taunt 442, [1814-23] All ER Rep 454, 1 Marsh 139, 128 ER 761, 17 Digest (Repl) 105, 203.
- j Minister of Social Security v Amalgamated Engineering Union [1967] 1 All ER 210, [1967] AC 725, [1967] 2 WLR 516, Digest (Cont Vol C) 704, 4585a.
Morey v Woodfield [1963] 3 All ER 533n, [1964] 1 WLR 16n, Digest (Cont Vol A) 1190, 1051b.
Praed v Graham (1889) 24 QBD 53, 59 LJQB 230, 38 WR 103, 17 Digest (Repl) 101, 160.
Rookes v Barnard [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129, [1964] 2 WLR 269, Digest (Cont Vol B) 217, 13a.

Scott v Musial [1959] 3 All ER 193, [1959] 2 QB 429, [1959] 3 WLR 437, Digest (Cont Vol A) 464, 165b.

Sears v Lyons (1818) 2 Stark 317, 2 Digest (Repl) 302, 98.

Smith v Streatfeild [1913] 3 KB 764, [1911-13] All ER Rep 362, 82 LJKB 1237, 109 LT 173, 17 Digest (Repl) 176, 706.

Smith's Newspapers Ltd v Becker (1932) 47 CLR 279, 6 ALJ 195, [1933] ALR 196, 33 Digest (Repl) 541, *192.

Uren v John Fairfax & Sons Pty Ltd (1967) 117 CLR 118, [1967] ALR 25, Digest (Cont Vol C) 285, *6d.

Ward v James [1965] 1 All ER 568, [1966] 1 QB 289, [1965] 2 WLR 461, [1965] 1 Lloyd's Rep 145, Digest (Cont Vol B) 219, 783a.

Wilkes v Wood (1763) Lofft 1, 98 ER 489, 17 Digest (Repl) 105, 194.

Williams v Currie (1845) 1 CB 841, 135 ER 774, 17 Digest (Repl) 105, 204.

Williams v Settle [1960] 2 All ER 806, [1960] 1 WLR 1072, Digest (Cont Vol A) 313, 685a.

Young v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd [1944] 2 All ER 293, [1944] KB 718, 113 LJKB 513, 171 LT 113; aff'd HL [1946] 1 All ER 98, [1946] AC 163, 115 LJKB 63, 174 LT 39, Digest (Cont Vol A) 967, 698a.

Yousouppoff v Metro-Goldwyn-Meyer Pictures Ltd (1934) 50 TLR 581, 32 Digest (Repl) 11, 26.

Appeal

This was an appeal by Cassell & Co Ltd against an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning MR, Salmon and Phillimore LJJ) dated 4th March 1971 and reported [1971] 2 All ER 187 dismissing an appeal by the appellants against so much of the verdict and judgment for the first respondent, John Egerton Broome ('Captain Broome'), before Lawton J and a jury on 17th February 1970, as awarded Captain Broome £25,000 by way of exemplary damages for libel, in addition to an award of £15,000 by way of compensatory damages, against the appellants and second respondent, David Irving ('Mr Irving'), the publishers and author respectively of a book entitled 'The Destruction of Convoy PQ17' in which the libels were contained. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC.

R J Parker QC and Robert Alexander for the appellants.

David Hirst QC and A J Bateson for Captain Broome.

Mr Irving did not appeal and was not represented.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

23rd February. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD HAILSHAM OF ST MARYLEBONE LC.

NATURE OF THE PROCEEDINGS

My Lords, this appeal arises out of two consolidated actions for libel on the publication of a book. The first action was in respect of the 60 proof copies of the book, the second in respect of the principal or hardback edition of the book. We were told that there are separate proceedings still pending in respect of a paperback edition, published under licence by separate publishers. This paperback edition was mentioned at all stages in the proceedings as being potentially relevant to the question of damages. The House is not otherwise concerned with it.

The plaintiff in the action (the first respondent to this appeal) is a retired captain in the Royal Navy of unblemished reputation, who, at the time of the matters referred to in the book, held the rank of commander, and occupied the responsible position of officer commanding the escorts in the ill-fated convoy PQ17. He held active command throughout the war, and ended his wartime naval career with his present rank of captain in command of the battleship Ramillies. The subject-matter of the book, and its title, was 'The Destruction of Convoy PQ17' which, as is well known, was one of the great naval disasters of the war, in which all but 11 out of over 35 merchant vessels were sunk on their way to the Soviet Union and about 153 merchant seamen killed by enemy action and a vast quantity of war material lost. The

- a defendants in the action were respectively the author of the book, David Irving, who is the second respondent in the appeal, and was not represented before us, and the publishers of the book, Cassell & Co Ltd, who are the appellants.

THE RESULT OF THE TRIAL

- The trial of the action took, we were told, 17 days before Lawton J and a jury. In the result, on 17th February 1970, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff and awarded against both defendants (1) the sum of £1,000 in respect of publication of the proof copies of the book, counsel for the plaintiff having waived any claim to exemplary damages on the proof copies, (2) £14,000 described as 'compensatory damages' in respect of the hardback edition, and, (3) in respect of the hardback edition a further sum of £25,000, described as 'by way of exemplary damages'. Judgment was entered for the sum of £40,000 against both defendants. The present appeal relates solely to the above sum awarded 'by way of exemplary damages' of £25,000.

- So far as relevant to this appeal, the entire proceedings before Lawton J were conducted by all the counsel concerned and summed up by the judge to the jury on the basis of the remarks of Lord Devlin in *Rookes v Barnard*¹ and of the direction following Lord Devlin's remarks by Widgery J in *Manson v Associated Newspapers Ltd*². This was not surprising since all the other members of the House of Lords had expressly concurred in Lord Devlin's opinion on this point, although without adding reasons of their own, and the opinion in *Rookes v Barnard*³ which was strictly an intimidation case, although obviously intended to apply generally, had been expressly applied to defamation proceedings by the Court of Appeal in *McCarey v Associated Newspapers Ltd*⁴ by Willmer, Pearson and Diplock LJ; in *Broadway Approvals Ltd v Odhams Press Ltd*⁵ by Sellers, Davies and Russell LJ; in *Fielding v Variety Incorporated*⁶, by Lord Denning MR, Harman and Salmon LJ; and in *Mafo v Adams*⁷, a case of deceit and other causes of action, the principles enunciated in *Rookes v Barnard*³ were accepted as applicable where the evidence justified it by Sachs, Widgery LJ and Plowman J.

- Except for two important passages and one minor passage of which complaint is made, and to which I will come later, Lawton J's direction to the jury was unexceptionable as an exposition of the law as it has been declared in the House of Lords by an unanimous House in *Rookes v Barnard*³ and applied by the Master of the Rolls, ten Lords Justices and one puisne judge in the above cases in the Court of Appeal and as it had been expounded by Widgery J in his direction to the jury in *Manson v Associated Newspapers Ltd*².

g

THE APPEAL TO THE COURT OF APPEAL⁸

- At the end of the 17 day trial the costs of the proceedings which, as between party and party, followed the event, must have already been enormous. Both defendants accepted the verdict on liability. The defendant Irving appealed on all the damages awarded. The present appellants appealed on the award of £25,000 'by way of exemplary damages'. The appeal lasted nine days before the Court of Appeal⁸ (Lord Denning MR, and Salmon and Phillimore LJ) and judgment was given on 4th March 1971 dismissing both appeals with costs, which must by this time, with the costs of the trial, even on a party and party basis, have greatly exceeded the amount of the award. Before the appellate committee of this House the appeal

- j 1 [1964] 1 All ER 367 at 407, 408, [1964] AC 1129 at 1220-1223
 2 [1965] 2 All ER 954, [1965] 1 WLR 1038
 3 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129
 4 [1964] 3 All ER 947, [1965] 2 QB 86
 5 [1965] 2 All ER 523, [1965] 1 WLR 805
 6 [1967] 2 All ER 497 [1967] 2 QB 841
 7 [1969] 3 All ER 1404, [1970] 1 QB 548
 8 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

lasted 13 working days, thus again greatly increasing the sum at stake, although by this time the defendant Irving had given up the struggle. a

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT OF APPEAL⁹

The Court of Appeal⁹ took a somewhat unusual course. On the view which they formed of the matter, which, as will appear, I have come to share although with greater hesitation than they expressed, they were for dismissing the appeal on the grounds that the criticisms of the direction by Lawton J failed, and that the mere size of the award was not one which, on accepted principles, could be attacked. If they had stopped there, it is possible, and perhaps likely, that the proceedings would have come to an end. It is doubtful if leave to appeal to this House would have been given, and if it had not, the two remaining parties would have been spared the costs of the 13 days' hearing in your Lordships' House. Even if leave to appeal had been given in the above circumstances a great deal of the time occupied before us would have been saved. b

The Court of Appeal⁹, however, did not stop at dismissing the appeal on these grounds. Whether or not they were encouraged by the zeal of plaintiff's counsel, they put in the forefront of their judgments the view that *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁰ was wrongly decided by the House of Lords and was not binding even on the Court of Appeal. It was, so they said, arrived at per incuriam and without argument from counsel. It ignored, they claimed, two previous decisions, in the House of Lords, *Ley v Hamilton*¹¹ and *E Hulton & Co v Jones*¹², which had approved awards of punitive or exemplary damages on lines inconsistent with Lord Devlin's opinion in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁰. They felt themselves fortified in this view with the somewhat cool reception in the Commonwealth of *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁰, particularly in the Australian Supreme Court decision in *Uren v John Fairfax & Sons Pty Ltd*¹³ which had been affirmed, so far as regards Australian law, by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the associated case of *Australian Consolidated Press Ltd v Uren*¹⁴. Neither Lord Denning MR nor Salmon LJ seem to have been in any way inhibited or embarrassed by the fact that each had been party to at least one of the decisions of the Court of Appeal applying *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁰ without question. Not content with all this, all three members of the Court of Appeal went further still and, besides declaring *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁰ to have been decided per incuriam and ultra vires, proceeded to say that it was 'unworkable', and, in the meantime, therefore, 'judges should direct juries in accordance with the law as it was understood before *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁰' which the court considered, to use the phrase of Lord Denning MR, as 'settled'. c

As sent to us by the Court of Appeal⁹, therefore, the appeal before us raised several questions of wide ranging importance. Quite apart from the merits of the respective litigants, these questions include the status of judgments and the relevance of precedent in this House, the circumstances when, if at all, decisions of this House may be questioned by the Court of Appeal, and judges of first instance directed by the Court of Appeal to disregard them. There is also the whole question of exemplary damages as canvassed in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁰ and subsequent decisions. What began as a simple proceeding between a plaintiff and two defendants has assumed, at the expense of two of the litigants, the dimensions of a constitutional question and a general enquiry into one aspect (and perhaps more than one aspect) of the law of damages. d

THE COURSE TAKEN BY THE COURT OF APPEAL⁹

In view of their importance it is unavoidable that before entering into the merits e

⁹ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

¹⁰ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹¹ (1935) 153 LT 384

¹² [1910] AC 20, [1908-10] All ER Rep 29

¹³ (1967) 117 CLR 118

¹⁴ [1967] 3 All ER 523, [1969] AC 590 f

a of the appeal I should discuss in a few paragraphs both the propriety and the desirability of the course taken by the Court of Appeal¹⁵. I desire to do so briefly and with studied moderation.

b From the point of view of the litigants it is obvious, I would have thought, that, on the view taken by the Court of Appeal¹⁵, the course taken was unnecessary. Private litigants have been put to immense expense, of which most must be borne by the loser, discussing broad issues of law unnecessary for the disposal of their dispute. If the Court of Appeal¹⁵ felt, as they were well entitled to do, that in the light of the Australian and other Commonwealth decisions *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶ ought to be looked at again by the House of Lords, either generally or under the practice declaration of 1966¹⁷ they were perfectly at liberty to say so. More, they could have suggested that so soon as a case at first instance arose in which the ratio decidendi of *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶ was unavoidably involved, the parties concerned might wish to make use of the so-called 'leap-frogging' procedure now available to them under the Administration of Justice Act 1969, and thus avoid one stage in our three-tier system of appeals. But to impose on these litigants, to whom the question was, on the court's view, unnecessary, the inevitable burden of further costs after all they had been through up to date was not, in my view, defensible.

d Moreover, it is necessary to say something of the direction to judges of first instance to ignore *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶ as 'unworkable'. As will be seen when I come to examine *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶ in the latter part of this opinion, I am driven to the conclusion that when the Court of Appeal described the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶ as decided 'per incuriam' or 'unworkable' they really only meant that they did not agree with it. But, in my view, even if this were not so, it is not open to the Court of Appeal to give gratuitous advice to judges of first instance to ignore decisions of the House of Lords in this way and, if it were open to the Court of Appeal to do so, it would be highly undesirable. The course taken would have put judges of first instance in an embarrassing position, as driving them to take sides in an unedifying dispute between the Court of Appeal or three members of it (for there is no guarantee that other Lords Justices would have followed them and no particular reason why they should) and the House of Lords. But, much worse than this, litigants would not have known where they stood. None could have reached finality short of the House of Lords, and, in the meantime, the task of their professional advisers of advising them either as to their rights, or as to the probable cost of obtaining or defending them, would have been, quite literally, impossible. Whatever the merits, chaos would have reigned until the dispute was settled, and, in legal matters, some degree of certainty is at least as valuable a part of justice as perfection.

g The fact is, and I hope it will never be necessary to say so again, that, in the hierarchical system of courts which exists in this country, it is necessary for each lower tier, including the Court of Appeal, to accept loyally the decisions of the higher tiers. Where decisions manifestly conflict, the decision in *Young v Bristol Aeroplane Co Ltd*¹⁸ offers guidance to each tier in matters affecting its own decisions. It does not entitle it to question considered decisions in the upper tiers with the same freedom. Even this House, since it has taken freedom to review its own decisions, will do so cautiously. That this is so is apparent from the terms of the declaration of 1966 itself where Lord Gardiner LC said¹⁷:

j 'Their lordships regard the use of precedent as an indispensable foundation upon which to decide what is the law and its application to individual cases. It provides at least some degree of certainty upon which individuals can rely in the conduct of their affairs, as well as a basis for orderly development of legal rules.

15 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

16 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

17 See Note [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234

18 [1944] 2 All ER 293, [1944] KB 718

Their lordships nevertheless recognise that too rigid adherence to precedent may lead to injustice in a particular case and also unduly restrict the proper development of the law. They propose therefore to modify their present practice and, while treating former decisions of this House as normally binding, to depart from a previous decision when it appears right to do so. In this connexion they will bear in mind the danger of disturbing retrospectively the basis on which contracts, settlements of property and fiscal arrangements have been entered into and also the especial need for certainty as to the criminal law. This announcement is not intended to affect the use of precedent elsewhere than in this House.' a

It is also apparent from the recent case of *Jones v Secretary of State for Social Services*¹⁹, where the decision in *Minister of Social Security v Amalgamated Engineering Union*²⁰ came up for review under the 1966 declaration¹, that the House will act sparingly and cautiously in the use made of the freedom assumed by this declaration. In addition, the last sentence of the declaration¹ as quoted above clearly affirms the continued adherence of this House to the doctrine of precedent as it has been hitherto applied to and in the Court of Appeal. b

THE MERITS OF THE APPEAL

It is now possible to turn to the merits of the case so far as these were canvassed before us on the assumption of the continued authority of the *Rookes v Barnard*² decision. Before us the appellants made three contentions: (i) that there was no evidence to be left to the jury that the conditions were fulfilled to bring the case within one of the three 'categories' of case listed by Lord Devlin in *Rookes v Barnard*³ as being appropriate for an award of punitive damages, and in particular the second, which was admittedly the only relevant category; (ii) that, even on the assumption that the first contention was wrong, Lawton J had misdirected the jury in at least two important matters; (iii) that in any event the award of £25,000 was excessive, and could not be sustained. In order to understand these contentions it is necessary to say something about the facts. c

THE FACTS ON WHICH THE BOOK WAS FOUNDED

The fate of the PQ 17 convoy is one of the most publicised, as well as one of the most tragic, naval operations of the second world war. The evidence showed that it had been written about many times, notably by Captain Roskill, RN, the official naval historian, and by the late Mr Godfrey Winn, whose book was said to have sold half a million copies. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the facts here. They are graphically described in the judgment of Lord Denning MR⁴. d

It is sufficient to say that the primary cause of the disaster flowed from an order to the convoy to scatter, which made the ships in it an easy prey to the aircraft and submarines by which they were attacked. This order to scatter was issued by the Admiralty in Whitehall and was due to a faulty appreciation by the Naval Staff, in particular, as is now known, by the then First Sea Lord himself, that the German battleship Tirpitz was at sea, and to a decision, also by the then First Sea Lord, to take the responsibility for the order on himself rather than leave the decision to the discretion of the naval officers on the spot. The naval officers on the spot, including Admiral Hamilton in command of the cruiser squadron, and Captain Broome, had no option but to obey, and the convoy was thus left to fan out on individual courses covering a vast area of sea. e

So far there can be no controversy. But the two naval officers, rightly considering that the order to scatter must denote the approach of a superior hostile surface force f

¹⁹ Page 145 ante, [1972] 2 WLR 210

²⁰ [1967] 1 All ER 210, [1967] AC 725

¹ See Note [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234

² [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

³ [1964] 1 All ER at 410, 411, [1964] AC at 1226, 1227

⁴ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853 g

- a sailed west in company. Admiral Hamilton was acting under precise orders from the Admiralty. Captain Broome was not. Captain Broome had proposed and Admiral Hamilton accepted that he should put himself under command of the Admiral commanding the cruisers. That this decision was courageous there can be no doubt. What has been subsequently disputed was whether it was as wise as it was certainly brave. Some have thought that it was no more than the inevitable reaction of gallant and experienced naval officers to the threat of surface action. Others have thought that its effect was to remove from the area of the convoy the only naval elements, which might have countered the U boat and air attacks, and thus to contribute to the extent of the convoy's losses. Which of these two views be correct it is not appropriate here to discuss. But what is relevant to the present appeal is that those who criticised the decision had previously fastened the responsibility on Admiral Hamilton.
- c It was one of the distinctive features of Mr Irving's book (which it may have shared with a German work with whose author he had collaborated) that it attempted to place responsibility for the withdrawal of the destroyers entirely or mainly on the shoulders of Captain Broome. This was a difficult thesis to sustain since Captain Broome was the junior officer of the two, and had only 'proposed' the course which both forces ultimately pursued. It also involved the propositions, both disputable, that the decision was wrong in the light of the information then available, and that the absence of the destroyers made a significant difference to the loss of life and material.
- d

From the start Captain Broome contended that the passages in the book relating to himself which it is not necessary to set out at length were defamatory. In his statement of claim he said that they meant and were intended and understood to mean:

- e ' . . . that [Captain Broome] was disobedient, careless, incompetent, indifferent to the fate of the merchants ships and/or by virtue thereof had wrongly withdrawn his destroyer force from the convoy and/or taken it closer to the German airfields than he had been ordered to and had thereby been largely responsible for or contributed extensively to the loss of the aforesaid ships and the effective destruction of more than two-thirds of the Convoy P.Q.17.'
- f In addition, at the trial it was contended that the ordinary and natural meaning of one of the relevant passages was that Captain Broome was a coward and for this reason 'needed no second bidding' to desert the convoy. The defendants both disputed that the book bore any of these meanings, but contended that without them the passages in the book were true. It is evident from their verdict and from the magnitude of the award of damages that the jury rejected the contentions of the defence, although how far and to what extent must be to some extent a matter of speculation.
- g

THE MATERIAL BEFORE THE JURY

- h From the commencement of the trial it was contended for Captain Broome that notwithstanding the limitations of *Rookes v Barnard*⁵, he was entitled to 'exemplary' or 'punitive' damages. The trial judge⁶ ruled (although on this point he was subsequently overruled by the Court of Appeal⁷) that, if so, he was bound to include a plea to this effect in his statement of claim, and the pleading consequently introduced into the statement of claim by way of reamendment affords a convenient summary of the way the case was then put. The pleader wrote:

- j 'The plaintiff will assert that the defendants and each of them calculated that the money to be made out of the said book containing the passages complained of would probably exceed the damages at risk (if any) and that the plaintiff is consequently entitled to recover exemplary damages.'

5 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

6 [1971] 1 All ER 262

7 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

He then went on to give particulars. If established, the plea clearly puts the case within the second of the three exceptional categories listed by Lord Devlin in *Rookes v Barnard*⁸. The question for the judge was whether there was evidence to leave to the jury on which they could find that the case was indeed to be placed in this category. If there was such evidence, and if the jury were not misdirected, inclusion within the second category would have entitled (although not compelled) them to make some award on this account.

The appellants contended before the Court of Appeal⁹ and before us that there was no such evidence. In my opinion, this contention wholly fails. To convince us, they would in practice have to establish that there was no evidence on which a properly directed jury could find that at the time of publication they were fully aware the words bore and were intended and understood to bear the meanings, attached to them, in the statement of claim, since, if at the time of publication the words were known to bear these meanings, they were false to the knowledge of the appellants and published with that knowledge for profit. In my view, the meanings, or most of them, are sufficiently obvious from a casual reading of the book, and the inadequate attempts by the author or the publishers to provide an alternative meaning or an escape route by which they could argue the alternative before a jury by small modifications or carefully phrased ambiguities, are less an indication of innocence or naiveté than a clear-sighted appreciation of the danger that they faced. Mr Irving was not represented before us, but his case was strenuously advanced before the Court of Appeal⁹, and in another context (to be discussed later) we had to consider his case when counsel for the appellants expressly accepted as accurate Lord Denning MR's colourful account of his behaviour. It is abundantly plain from this account that Mr Irving at least knew, and carefully planned, what he was doing, that he went on with it in spite of repeated warnings from the most authoritative sources, that he conceived the book 'as a book with a difference as all men [that is including Captain Broome] were shown to be cowards', and that he prided himself on being able to say—

'some pretty near the knuckle things about these people [he was directly referring to Captain Broome's threat of proceedings] but if one says it in a clever enough way, they cannot take action'.

The rules of evidence preclude us from taking these admissions of his state of mind as evidence against the appellants. But, in my opinion, the 'near the knuckle things' said about Captain Broome in the course of this book, including the allegation that he was a coward, were said sufficiently plainly for an experienced publisher to know perfectly well what their meaning was and the fact that they were said 'in a clever enough way' should have told them plainly that they were said with deliberate intent to convey the meanings without incurring heavy damages.

But the case against the appellants does not stop at the obvious meanings to be attached to the passages in the book. Even if, which I could not easily accept, they did not understand the drift of the book at a first reading, they acquired the right to publish and they went on actually to publish in circumstances from which the jury were clearly entitled to infer that they went ahead with the most cold-blooded and clear-sighted appreciation of what they were doing.

The appellants were not the first publishers selected by Mr Irving. His original publishers were William Kimber Ltd, who ultimately refused to publish the book on the ground that the book was 'a continuous witch hunt of Captain Broome' having been advised by Captain Roskill, who gave evidence for Captain Broome, and perhaps by others, that 'the book reeks of defamation'. In the absence of evidence by either defendant at the trial, it is impossible to say how much of this was known to the a appellants. But it is certain that Mr William Kimber warned the appellants in unmistakable terms that his house had rejected the book precisely on the grounds that it was libellous, amongst others of Captain Broome. The undisputed response of the appellants was either flippant or cynical. Moreover, Captain Broome himself had warned them on several occasions that, if they published the book, as they did, in substantially the form in which he had seen it, they must expect an action for libel from himself. That they took these threats seriously can be seen from their reaction to the latest of them which followed the issue of the proof copies. On receipt of this, the appellants placed a stop on the book in the following terms:

8 [1964] 1 All ER 367 at 410, 411, [1964] AC 1129 at 1226, 1227

9 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

'Will you please note that absolutely and positively not one single copy, on any pretext whatsoever, is to be removed from the House without reference to me.'

c In attempts to sell the serial rights their efforts were 'shot down' by three national Sunday newspapers presumably on the same grounds.

d What the full explanation of their subsequent publication may have been will never be known, since the appellants did not elect to give evidence. But, in the absence of any explanation, the jury were perfectly entitled to infer that they had calmly calculated that the risks attendant on publication did not outweigh the chances of profit. What is certain is that, insofar as they were aware that the passages complained of could be reasonably understood to bear the meanings attached to them by Captain Broome, including the allegation of cowardice, they published them knowing them in this sense to be false, since no effort was made at any stage to suggest that there was any material on which a reasonable publisher could base the belief that the passages complained of, if they bore these meanings, were true. In his judgment in the Court of Appeal¹⁰ Lord Denning MR lists other features of the case against the appellants on which the jury were entitled to base inferences. With most of these, except the reference to the paperback edition, which, contrary to what he says (perhaps per incuriam), was not published by the appellants but under licence by another publisher, I find myself in agreement. In particular, I concur in what was said in the Court of Appeal¹⁰ about the dust cover of the book, which, making every allowance for the popular style in such productions, and putting the most favourable interpretation on every phrase in it, seems, to my mind, in the absence of explanation, to indicate that the appellants were well aware of the full implication of the passages complained of and were prepared to sell the book on this sensational interpretation. In such circumstances to argue that there was no evidence from which the jury could infer that—g 'the appellants had calculated that the money to be made out of the book containing the passages complained of would probably exceed the damages at risk (if any)'

h was, to my mind a somewhat forlorn hope, and nothing which counsel for the appellants said in the course of his strenuous and ably conducted argument has convinced me to the contrary. I will refer to the passage from Lord Devlin's speech in *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ relating to the categories later for its proper interpretation, but I cannot see how, on any view, if these facts were proved to the satisfaction of a jury, properly directed, they are not sufficient to enable the jury to base inferences bringing the publication within the second category.

j THE DIRECTION ON THE RELATION BETWEEN THE TWO AWARDS

There was much more substance in, and I find much greater difficulty in deciding on, the appellants' second contention, which was based, not on Lord Devlin's three listed categories, but on his exposition of the general conditions under which exemplary damages may be awarded after the conclusion of the three 'considerations' listed in the report¹², which, he says, ought always to be borne in mind. At this point, Lord Devlin said¹³:

¹⁰ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

¹¹ [1964] 1 All ER 367 at 410, 411, [1964] AC 1128 at 1226, 1227

"Thus a case for exemplary damages must be presented quite differently from one for compensatory damages; and the judge should not allow it to be left to the jury unless he is satisfied that it can be brought within the categories which I have specified. But the fact that the two sorts of damage differ essentially does not necessarily mean that there should be two awards. In a case in which exemplary damages are appropriate, a jury should be directed that if, but only if, the sum which they have in mind to award as compensation (which may of course be a sum aggravated by the way in which the defendant has behaved to the plaintiff) is inadequate to punish him for his outrageous conduct, to mark their disapproval of such conduct and to deter him from repeating it, then they can award some larger sum. [The italics are mine.] If a verdict given on such direction has to be reviewed on appeal, the appellate court will first consider whether the award can be justified as compensation, and, if it can, there is nothing further to be said. If it cannot, the court must consider whether or not the punishment is in all the circumstances excessive. There may be cases in which it is difficult for a judge to say whether or not he ought to leave to the jury a claim for exemplary damages. In such circumstances and in order to save the possible expense of a new trial, I see no objection to his inviting the jury to say what sum they would fix as compensation and what additional sum, if any, they would award if they were entitled to give exemplary damages. That is the course which he would have to take in a claim to which the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, applied."

In my opinion, this passage contains a most valuable and important contribution to the law of exemplary damages which, prior to *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁴, had not, so far as I am aware, been adequately stressed in any previous case, and which, in my view, would retain, and possibly even increase, its value even if the categories in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁴ were to be wholly rejected.

In essence the doctrine is that the award of a punitive element in damages, if it is ever permissible, must also remain discretionary, and, in order to give effect to the second of the three 'considerations'¹⁵, the judge should always warn a jury that they need not award anything, and must not do so unless they are satisfied that a purely compensatory award (in a sense which I will explain) is inadequate. It follows that whatever they do award should only be a sum which has taken into account the award of damages already notionally allowed as compensation, including, where appropriate, the 'aggravated' element required by a defendant's bad conduct, and should never exceed the amount by which the required penalty (if that is the right word) exceeds the required compensation. I shall revert to this feature of *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁴ later. But what is said in substance by the appellants in this case is that the summing-up failed to give effect to this important and, in my view, vital principle.

The learned judge directed the jury over two days and much that he said was irrelevant to the question of exemplary damages. Of what was relevant to exemplary damages, most was a direction to the jury about the second category and the evidence in the case relevant to it. This reflected the balance of argument by counsel during the case and it appears from a remark in the judgment of Phillimore LJ in the Court of Appeal¹⁶ that, in some sense at least, both counsel agreed that, dependent on the view which the jury took of the facts, Lawton J should leave the question of exemplary

¹² [1964] 1 All ER at 411, [1964] AC at 1227, 1228

¹³ [1964] 1 All ER at 411, [1964] AC at 1228

¹⁴ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹⁵ [1964] 1 All ER at 411, [1964] AC at 1227

¹⁶ [1971] 2 All ER at 214, [1971] 2 WLR at 887

a damages to the jury. But there were two passages in the summing-up relevant to the present issue. The first was a passage on the first day of the summing-up when the judge, having directed the jury that punitive damages were in the nature of a fine, went on to give two examples from the criminal law carrying the moral that the punishment must neither be excessive nor inadequate to the gravity of the offence and said:

b 'If you are going to punish a man to show him that libel does not pay, provided, of course, it comes within Mr. Justice Widgery's definition [he was referring to *Manson v Associated Newspapers Ltd*¹⁷], what you do must be reasonable in all the circumstances, bearing in mind that it is a penalty.'

c The second, and more important, of the passages was on the second day of the summing-up when, after leaving an agreed list of questions to the jury, the learned judge said:

d '... as you will see, the issue of damages has been divided into two questions. The first one is No. 3, "What compensatory damages do you award the plaintiff?" You will remember that compensatory damages are compensation for something, they are not given to you. When you come to consider that question you must remember that this is a joint publication by [the appellants] and Mr. Irving. You do not award two different sums. You award one sum and you will leave the lawyers to work out what it means, but it is one sum. Do you all follow that? Then having decided what are the proper additional compensatory damages then you will go on and consider the fourth question, namely, "Has [Captain Broome] proved that he is entitled to exemplary damages?". It is for him to prove that he is entitled to it, not for the defendants to prove that he is not.

e This question has got to be divided up into a number of subsidiary questions and the reason for this is problems of law which arise, but you do not have to concern yourselves with those. That is my responsibility. There are two defendants and, as I have been at pains to point out to you during my summing-up, the case against each defendant on the issue of punitive damages is different, so you will have to consider the case against each defendant separately. I suggest you start with Mr. Irving and then go on to [the appellants]. In respect of each of them you will ask yourselves this question: "Has [Captain Broome] proved his entitlement against that defendant?". If the answer is Yes then you will have to go on and assess how much punitive damages should be awarded. If the answer is No he will get no punitive damages. At least that will be your finding. What the law is is another matter, but that will be your finding. Having carried out that f operation in relation to Mr. Irving you should carry out exactly a similar operation in relation to [the appellants]. Remember all the time that letters written by Mr. Irving or to Mr. Irving, other than by [the appellants], are not evidence against [the appellants]. I cannot stress that too much. You will have to ask yourselves: "Has he proved that he is entitled to punitive damages against [the appellants]?". If the answer is No that is that. If the answer is Yes you will have to assess the damages. I have put all that into an omnibus lawyers' series of questions. I could have put it all into one question, but I came to the conclusion that it would probably be better for you. I will read paragraph 4 again. "Has [Captain Broome] proved that he is entitled to exemplary damages? If Yes, has he proved his entitlement against one or both of the defendants? If one only, against which one?". Then you see the last question under this heading, "What additional sum should be awarded him by way of exemplary damages?". Would g you be good enough to underline the word "additional", because I want to know, and learned counsel want to know, if you do decide to award punitive damages, how much more do you award over and above the compensatory damage.'

h

i

What was said against this passage on behalf of the appellants was that this summing-up was defective in that it did not make it absolutely plain to the jury that before making any punitive award against the defendants they must first take into account and assess the punitive effect of any compensatory award (including any element of 'aggravated' damage) and only award such amount (if any) by which the appropriate penalty exceeded such award.

I am bound to say that I have found the greatest difficulty in accepting the summing-up on this point as adequate, and my difficulties were increased by two passages in the final speech of counsel for Captain Broome which, as counsel for the appellants persuasively argued, seemed to indicate that the respective awards of compensatory and punitive damages were entirely separate assessments and that one should not be balanced against the other. Insofar as counsel said this, and he appears to have done so, he was, in my opinion, entirely wrong. In the end, however, I have come to the conclusion that the judge's direction was just adequate to convey the impression intended in the passage of Lord Devlin's speech¹⁸ which had been accurately read to the jury by counsel for Mr Irving and that the jury were not in fact misled. In coming to this conclusion I have been impressed, as was the Court of Appeal¹⁹, by the stress the judge laid on the word 'additional' in the passage cited, by the fact that the form of the questions left to the jury (which did not include as it should have done, the words 'if any' in that relating to punitive damages) was agreed by counsel and by the fact that the line of the judge's summing-up was entirely in accord with the case for the appellants as it was put to the jury on their behalf, and that everyone seems to have assumed that the result of the jury's answers was that which in fact obtained. I desire, however, to say that the direction on this point, if sufficient, as I am constrained to say it was, was only barely sufficient, and that I trust that in future cases of this kind trial judges will stress the matter a good deal more clearly and with greater emphasis than was done here. In the present case I do not think that the judge can be blamed for putting the matter compendiously in a form which seems to have misled no one, which accorded with the way and with the emphasis with which it had been put to the jury on behalf of the appellants, and which, according to Phillimore LJ's observation²⁰ referred to above had, in some sense, been agreed.

A SINGLE AWARD OR TWO?

Less meritorious, in my view, was the second criticism of the direction put before us. This was in effect that the judge did not correctly direct the jury as to the principles on which a joint award of exemplary damages can be made against two or more defendants guilty of the joint publication of a libel in respect of which their relevant guilt may be different, and their means of different amplitude. With high regard for the judgments of Lord Denning MR and of Salmon LJ, I differ from both in what they said on this aspect of the matter, both as to the effect of the judge's summing-up and to what it ought to be in such cases. Lord Denning MR said¹:

'There is, of course, a difficulty. How is a jury to assess the one figure against two defendants? Are they to fix it at a high sum which they think the more blameworthy ought to pay or a low sum for the least blameworthy? That must be left to the jury. They may, if they choose, fix a figure in between. The judge can, I think, tell them that they can fix it as against the more blameworthy, expecting him to pay it; and leave the least blameworthy (if he is called on to pay) to recover contribution. In this case the judge left it to them without any specific direction. That was, I think, quite legitimate; and is no ground for disturbing the verdict.' [The italics are mine.]

Lord Denning MR then added:

¹⁸ [1964] 1 All ER at 411, [1964] AC at 1228

¹⁹ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

²⁰ [1971] 2 All ER at 214, [1971] 2 WLR at 887. See footnote 16, p 814, ante

¹ [1971] 2 All ER at 201, [1971] 2 WLR at 873

a 'In any case, however, I think [the appellants] are not at liberty to take this point. They did not ask judge or jury to split the damages. The judge told counsel the question he was going to put to the jury; and asked for their comments. That was the time for counsel to ask for the exemplary damages to be split. Not having asked, it is too late to ask in this court.'

b Salmon LJ appears to have thought that the award should reflect the amount due by the most guilty of the tortfeasors and he said²:

c '... it is well settled that where there are several defendants who have all committed a joint tort, there can be only one award of one sum of damages against all of them: *Greenlands Ltd v Wilmshurst*³. It may bear hardly on one or more of the defendants. The moral may be that you must be as careful in choosing your companions in tort as you are in choosing your companions when you go out shooting.' [The italics are again mine.]

d With respect to both judgments which, as will be seen, are arguably not quite consistent with one another, I think the effect of the law is exactly the opposite and that awards of punitive damages in respect of joint publications should reflect only the lowest figure for which any of them can be held liable. This seems to me to flow inexorably both from the principle that only one sum may be awarded in a single proceeding for a joint tort, and from the authorities which were cited to us by counsel for the appellants in detail in the course of his argument. Counsel referred us to *Heydon's case*⁴, *Clark v Newsam*⁵, *Hill v Goodchild*⁶, *Dawson v McClelland*⁷, *Greenlands Ltd v Wilmshurst*⁸, *Smith v Streatfeild*⁹, *Chapman v Lord Ellesmere*¹⁰ per Slessor LJ, *Dougherty v Chandler*¹¹, *Egger v Viscount Chelmsford*¹² and to the current edition of *Gatley*¹³. I think that the inescapable conclusion to be drawn from these authorities is that only one sum can be awarded by way of exemplary damages where the plaintiff elects to sue more than one defendant in the same action in respect of the same publication, and that this sum must represent the highest common factor, that is the lowest sum for which any of the defendants can be held liable on this score. Although we were concerned with exemplary damages, I would think that the same principle applies generally and in particular to aggravated damages, and that dicta or apparent dicta to the contrary can be disregarded. As counsel conceded, however, plaintiffs who wish to differentiate between the defendants can do so in various ways, for example, by electing to sue the more guilty only, by commencing separate proceedings against each and then consolidating, or, in the case of a book or newspaper article, by suing separately in the same proceedings for the publication of the manuscript to the publisher by the author. Defendants, of course, have their ordinary contractual or statutory remedies for contribution or indemnity so far as they may be applicable to the facts of a particular case. But these may be in applicable to exemplary damages.

g Having established this principle, counsel for the appellants went on to argue that the judge had misdirected the jury, seeking to encourage us in this belief by the submission that, if he had persuaded at least two members of the Court of Appeal

2 [1971] 2 All ER at 210, [1971] 2 WLR at 882

3 [1913] 3 KB 507

4 (1612) 11 Co Rep 5a

5 (1847) 1 Exch 131

6 (1771) 5 Burr 2790

7 [1899] 2 IR 486

8 [1913] 3 KB 507, especially at 521

9 [1913] 3 KB 764 at 769, [1911-13] All ER Rep 362 at 364

10 [1932] 2 KB 431 at 471, [1932] All ER Rep 221 at 237

11 (1946) 46 SR (NSW) 370

12 [1964] 3 All ER 406 at 411, [1965] 1 QB 248 at 262

13 Libel and Slander, 6th Edn, para 1390 to defend it on one of two possibly inconsistent and erroneous bases, the learned judge might well have succeeded in making the jury accept one of them as the ground of their award. a

The passage in the summing-up on which the appellants relied for this purpose was as follows. It occurs immediately after the passage already quoted in which the judge directs the jury to regard the exemplary damages as a sum additional to the compensatory award. Lawton J went on: b

'You may be saying to yourselves: if we do take the view that both these defendants should pay something by way of punitive damages, should we take into consideration the relative culpability of each one? Again, and I merely say this by way of illustration, and certainly not by way of guidance to you, say, for example you took the view that Mr. Irving was more to blame than [the appellants], or to be fair, you took the view that [the appellants] being an experienced firm of publishers were more to blame than this young man, Mr. Irving, should you make [the appellants] pay a larger sum by way of punitive damages than Mr. Irving? The answer to that is No. [The italics are mine.] Whatever damages, if any, you decide should be awarded by way of punitive damages must be the same sum in respect of both Mr. Irving and [the appellants], if you find them both liable to pay punitive damages. Have I made that clear?' c
d

This direction is in many ways defective as a piece of clear English prose. In particular, it contains an ambiguity, later cured by an exchange in the presence of the jury between counsel and the bench as to whether the jury is to award a single sum against both defendants or two sums, each against one of the defendants. But, on the crucial point whether this sum, when awarded, should represent the higher or the lower figure for which the jury found either guilty, I myself find no difficulty in thinking that the jury would have been clear that they were to award the lower. I would hope that on other occasions this would be made even plainer, but I find it difficult to criticise an experienced judge for not being absolutely crystal clear on this point at the end of a two day direction over a wide range of different topics following a 17 day trial. I would not disturb the verdict on these grounds. e

I also consider that, having agreed to the form of the questions left to the jury, it was not really open to the appellants to contend, on appeal, that the awards should be split. In any case I am fortified in my view of the matter by the fact that I find the same difficulty as did the Court of Appeal¹⁴ in differentiating in any way between the moral culpability of the two defendants. Mr Irving may have been the author of the defamatory matter. But the appellants published it, on the jury's finding, with their eyes open as to what it contained. It may be that Mr Irving had fewer means, and, if the jury were looking on the exemplary damages from the point of view of deterring him, they could have awarded a smaller sum. But there seems to have been no evidence concerning the means of either party, and I do not see how at this late date we can properly be invited to speculate. The enterprise was essentially a joint one, and if the appellants had not all the information available to Mr Irving, they had enough to make sure that they knew exactly what they were doing. It is difficult to know on what principle the jury could have differentiated between the two defendants. f
g
h

WAS THE AWARD EXCESSIVE?

The final point taken for the appellants was that the award of £25,000 exemplary damages or, as it was equally properly and possibly better put, the total award of £40,000 (which included the exemplary element) was so far excessive of what 12 reasonable men could have awarded that it ought to be set aside and a new trial ordered. I cannot disguise from myself that I found this an extremely difficult point in the case, and have only decided that the verdict should not be disturbed with great i hesitation because I am very conscious of the fact that I would certainly have awarded far less myself, and possibly, to use a yardstick which some judges have adopted as a rule of thumb, less than half the £25,000.

A number of factors lead me, however, to the belief that the verdict should not be disturbed. The first, and paramount, consideration in my mind is that the jury is, where either party desires it, the only legal and constitutional tribunal for deciding libel cases, including the award of damages. I do not think the judiciary at any level should substitute itself for a jury, unless the award is so manifestly too large, as were the verdicts in *Lewis v Daily Telegraph Ltd*¹⁵, or manifestly too small, as in *English and Scottish Co-op Properties Mortgage and Investment Society Ltd v Odhams Press Ltd*¹⁶, that no sensible jury properly directed could have reached the conclusion. I do not think much depends on the exact formula used to describe the test to be applied, whether the traditional language 'so large [or small] as that twelve sensible men could not reasonably have given them' (per Lord Esher MR in *Praed v Graham*¹⁷) or that of Palles CB in *M'Grath v Bourne*¹⁸ cited by Lord Wright in *Mechanical and General Inventions Co Ltd and Lehwess v Austin and the Austin Motor Co Ltd*¹⁹, that 'no reasonable proportion existed between it and the circumstances of the case'. The point is that the law makes the jury and not the judiciary the constitutional tribunal, and if Parliament had wished the roles to be reversed in any way, Parliament would have said so at the time of the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1933, since s 6 of that Act expressly excepts defamation actions (otherwise than in a limited class of case) from the general change which it then authorised.

In addition to the above cases counsel for Captain Broome cited *Youssoupoff v Metro-Goldwyn-Meyer Pictures Ltd*²⁰, *Bocock v Enfield Rolling Mills Ltd*¹, *Scott v Musial*², *Morey v Woodfield*³, *McCarey v Associated Newspapers Ltd*⁴ and *Broadway Approvals Ltd v Odhams Press Ltd*⁵. I do not see anything in the above cases which alters the principle involved, nor am I aware of anything in the nature of exemplary damages to alter it in this limited class of case. It may very well be that, on the whole, judges, and the legal profession in general, would be less generous than juries in the award of damages for defamation. But I know of no principle of reason which would entitle judges, whether of appeal or at first instance, to consider that their own sense of the proprieties is more reasonable than that of a jury, or which would entitle them to arrogate to themselves a constitutional status in this matter which Parliament has deliberately withheld from them, for aught we know, on the very ground that juries can be expected to be more generous on such matters than judges. I speak with the greater conviction because my own view is that the legal profession is right to be cautious in such matters and juries are wrong if they can be said to be more generous. But that is not the law and I do not think that judges who hold my view are any more entitled to change the law on this topic than they have been in the past.

Counsel very rightly drew our attention to observations of Lord Devlin in *Rookes v Barnard*⁶ when he said:

'I should not allow the respect which is traditionally paid to an assessment of damages by a jury to prevent me from seeing that the weapon is used with

¹⁵ [1963] 2 All ER 151, [1964] AC 234

¹⁶ [1940] 1 All ER 1, [1940] 1 KB 440

¹⁷ (1889) 24 QBD 53 at 55

¹⁸ (1876) IR 10 CL 160 at 164

¹⁹ [1935] AC 346 at 378, [1935] All ER Rep 22 at 37

²⁰ (1934) 50 TLR 581 at 583, 584

¹ [1954] 3 All ER 94, [1954] 1 WLR 1303

² [1959] 3 All ER 193 at 194, [1959] 2 QB 429 at 436

³ [1963] 3 All ER 533n, [1964] 1 WLR 16n

⁴ [1964] 2 All ER 947, [1965] 2 QB 86

⁵ [1965] 2 All ER at 536, 537, [1965] 1 WLR at 818, 820

⁶ [1964] 1 All ER at 411, [1964] AC at 1227

restraint. It may even be that the House may find it necessary to follow the precedent it set for itself in *Benham v. Gambling*⁷, and place some arbitrary limit on awards of damages that are made by way of punishment.' a

I regard *Benham v Gambling*⁷ as setting an absolutely necessary but wholly arbitrary rule to solve an absolutely insoluble problem, and I do not think it could readily be extended to exemplary damages for libel simply on the ground that judges do not agree with juries on quantum. I do not think the first sentence in Lord Devlin's observation means more than that the House will use its legitimate powers to interfere with awards by juries with particular regard to the need for preserving liberty, which he was concerned to express, and, if it means that the House was conferring on itself greater powers than it previously possessed, I would have regarded it as an usurpation of the function of the legislature as a whole. We were also referred to the observations of the Court of Appeal in *Ward v James*⁸. If the passage quoted there means more than that court, in exercising its undoubted right to interfere with unreasonable verdicts, will have more regard than heretofore to the general level of damages in cases of a similar nature, and particularly personal injury cases, it may need further consideration. b

The second reason which leads me to decline to interfere with the jury's verdict in this case is the peculiar gravity of the facts of this case. I share with Phillimore LJ the view that the jury must have found that⁹— c

'these were grave libels perpetrated quite deliberately and without regard to their truth by a young man and a firm of publishers interested solely in whether they would gain by the publication of this book. They did not care what distress they caused.' d

It is true, and I have been constrained to say, that I would have treated this heinous offence against public decency with far less severity than did the jury in this case. But, at the end of the hearing, I found myself as unable to say as were the three eminent judges in the Court of Appeal¹⁰ that no 12 reasonable jurors could have come to a different conclusion from myself. These matters are very highly subjective, and I do not feel myself entitled to substitute my own subjective sense of proportion for that of the constitutional tribunal appointed by law to determine such matters. e

I should add, lest I be thought to have overlooked the point that, to avoid the expense and anxieties of a new trial counsel on both sides agreed to leave to us, in case the appeal should succeed, the assessment of any sum to be awarded. I doubt myself how satisfactory this would have been but, quite obviously, before we embarked on such a task we should have to be first satisfied that the original verdict could not stand, and to this preliminary issue the agreement between counsel is necessarily irrelevant. f

THE DECISION IN *ROOKES V BARNARD*¹¹

These considerations really conclude the result of this appeal. It must, in my view, be dismissed. But, lest other litigants be put to expense and uncertainty comparable to that which the parties to this case have, in my view, unnecessarily suffered, it is now unavoidable that I should deal at length with the wider issues in the law of damages on which the Court of Appeal¹⁰ founded the greater part of its judgment. Before I do so I ought to remark that, although counsel for the appellants took the point that the trial judge should have withdrawn the question of the paperback edition from the jury, I regard the way in which he left it to them as so favourable to the appellants as not to justify a new trial on that ground alone. g

The judgment of the Court of Appeal¹⁰ was based on the simple proposition that h

7 [1941] 1 All ER 7, [1941] AC 157

8 [1965] 1 All ER 568 at 575, [1966] 1 QB 289 at 301

9 [1971] 2 All ER at 215, [1971] 2 WLR at 887

10 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

11 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129 j

a the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹² so far as it affected punitive or exemplary damages was made per incuriam and without prior argument by counsel and that judges should in future ignore it as unworkable, and that, in directing juries, judges of first instance should return to the status quo ante *Rookes v Barnard*¹² as if that case had never been decided at all. I have already said, and will not repeat, what I think about the propriety of the Court of Appeal¹³ in doing this at all, and the appropriateness, in view of the consequences to the parties, of their doing it in this case. I now proceed to consider how far their opinions are correct.

b I make no complaint of their view that *Rookes v Barnard*¹² clearly needs reconsideration by this House, if only because of the reception it has received in Australia, Canada and New Zealand. I view with dismay the doctrine that the common law should differ in different parts of the Commonwealth, which is the effect of the decision in *Australian Consolidated Press Ltd v Uren*¹⁴ and anything one can do in this case to bring the various strands of thought in different Commonwealth countries together ought to be done. Moreover, as I shall show, many of Lord Devlin's statements¹⁵ have been misunderstood, particularly by his critics, and the view of the House may well have suffered to some extent from the fact that its reasons were given in a single speech. Whatever the advantages of a judgment of an undivided court delivered by a single voice, the result may be an unduly fundamentalist approach to the actual language employed. Phrases which were clearly only illustrative or descriptive can be treated in isolation from their context, as being definitive or exhaustive. I am convinced that this has happened here and that to some extent at least, the purpose and nature of Lord Devlin's exposition has been misunderstood.

THE LAW BEFORE ROOKES V BARNARD¹²

e Whatever else may be said, the Court of Appeal's judgment¹³ is based on one assumption which is plainly incorrect. This assumption is, to quote its most characteristic expression on the lips of Lord Denning MR¹⁶: 'Prior to *Rookes v Barnard*¹², the law as to exemplary damages was settled.' In point of fact, it was nothing of the kind. Lord Denning MR went on immediately to quote from Mayne and MacGregor on Damages the following passage¹⁷:

f 'Such damages are variously called punitive damages, vindictive damages, exemplary damages, and even retributory damages. They can apply only where the conduct of the defendant merits punishment, which is only considered to be so when his conduct is wanton, as when it discloses fraud, malice, violence, cruelty, insolence, or the like, or, as it is sometimes put, where he acts in contumelious disregard of the plaintiff's rights . . . Such damages are recognised to be recoverable in appropriate cases in defamation . . .'

g If Lord Denning MR had gone on to quote from a subsequent passage¹⁸ of the same edition he would have read the following passage, inconsistent with his construction of the foregoing, under the heading 'A Double Rationale' which should, I hope, have disabused him of the idea that the law of punitive damages was in fact settled prior to *Rookes v Barnard*¹². The passage is as follows¹⁸:

'3. A DOUBLE RATIONALE

'Through all these various cases, however, runs another thread, giving a very different explanation of the position. For indeed it cannot be said that English law has committed itself finally and fully to exemplary damages, and many of the above

i 12 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

13 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

14 [1967] 3 All ER 523, [1969] AC 590

15 In Rookes v Barnard [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

16 [1971] 2 All ER at 197, [1971] 2 WLR at 868

17 12th Edn (1961), paras 207, 208

18 Para 212

cases point to the rationale not of punishment of the defendant but of extra compensation for the plaintiff for the injury to his feelings and dignity. This is, of course, not exemplary damages at all. It is another head of non-pecuniary loss to the plaintiff. [The italics are mine.]

Indeed, in the well-known American textbook on the law of damages by the late Professor Charles T McCormick, published in 1935 by the West Publishing Co of Minnesota, occurs the following passage to the same effect¹⁹:

'In England, where exemplary damages had their origin, it is still not entirely clear whether the accepted theory is that they are a distinct and strictly punitive element of the recovery, or they are merely a swollen or "aggravated" allowance of compensatory damages permitted in cases of outrage. It is only in America that the cases have clearly separated exemplary from compensatory damages, and it is only here that the doctrine, thus definitely isolated, has been attacked and criticised.'

More characteristic than either of these passages and more illustrative of the confusion which reigned before *Rookes v Barnard*²⁰ is the paragraph on the subject in Lord Simonds's edition of Halsbury's Laws of England¹:

'Exemplary damages. Where the wounded feeling and injured pride of a plaintiff, or the misconduct of a defendant, may be taken into consideration, the principle of restitutio in integrum no longer applies. Damages are then awarded not merely to recompense the plaintiff for the loss he has sustained by reason of the defendant's wrongful act, but to punish the defendant in an exemplary manner, and vindicate the distinction between a wilful and an innocent wrongdoer. Such damages are said to be "at large", and, further, have been called exemplary, vindictive, penal, punitive, aggravated, or retributory.'

This passage clearly shows the extraordinary confusion of terminology reflecting differences in thinking and principle which existed up to 1964. Apart from anything else, 'aggravated' damages, classed as compensatory by Mayne and MacGregor, and by Professor McCormick, are assimilated to exemplary or punitive damages as such, as is the phrase damages 'at large'—an expression so indefinite in its connotation that counsel for the appellants in argument felt able to include within it (as this passage suggests inappropriately) even the general damages for pain and suffering in a personal injuries case. Clearly, before *Rookes v Barnard*²⁰, the thinking and the terminology alike called aloud for further investigation and exposition, and, since in such cases it is the classic function of this House to make such reviews, I cannot accept the simpliste doctrine of the Court of Appeal² either that there was no need to make it, or that the only thing to restore clarity is to go back to the state of the law as it was in 1963. In passing, I may say that I do not attach so much importance as did the Court of Appeal² to the circumstances that the two categories mentioned by Lord Devlin had never been discussed in argument by counsel. The cases and textbooks on exemplary damages had been exhaustively read, and when this House undertakes a careful review of the law it is not to be described as acting per incuriam or ultra vires if it identifies and expounds principles not previously apparent to the counsel who addressed it or to the judges and textbook writers whose divergent or confusing expressions led to the necessity for the investigation. Of course, in a sense, it would be easy enough to direct a jury under the old law if one simply said to them that any conduct of which they chose on rational grounds to disapprove would give rise to an award of exemplary damages and that any sum they chose to think appropriate as the penalty would be acceptable. But no one in recent years has ever

¹⁹ Page 278

²⁰ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹ 11 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 223, para 391

² [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

a thought this, although it is noteworthy that as recently as 1891 the author of Sedgwick's 'A Treatise on the Measure of Damages' was writing³:

b 'Until comparatively recent times juries were as arbitrary judges of the amount of damages as of the facts . . . Even as late as the time of Lord Mansfield it was possible for counsel to state the law to be that "The Court cannot measure the ground on which the jury find damages that may be thought large: they may find upon facts within their own knowledge" . . . The doctrine of exemplary damages is thus seen to have originated in a survival in this limited class of cases of the old arbitrary power of the jury.' [The italics are mine.]

c Clearly modern juries must be given adequate professional guidance and the object of Lord Devlin's opinion in *Rookes v Barnard*⁴ was to enable them to have it. Speaking for myself, and whatever view I formed of the categories, I would find it impossible to return to the chaos which is euphemistically referred to by Phillimore LJ⁵ as 'the law as it was before Rookes v Barnard'⁴.

d Before I examine the actual decision in *Rookes v Barnard*⁴ I would now propose to make two sets of observations of a general character. The first relates to the context in which damages must be awarded, the second to the terminology to be used in particular classes of case.

THE SUBJECTIVE ELEMENT IN DAMAGES

e Of all the various remedies available at common law, damages are the remedy of most general application at the present day, and they remain the prime remedy in actions for breach of contract and tort. They have been defined as 'the pecuniary compensation, obtainable by success in an action, for a wrong which is either a tort or a breach of contract'. They must normally be expressed in a single sum to take account of all the factors applicable to each cause of action and must of course be, expressed in English currency⁶.

f In almost all actions for breach of contract, and in many actions for tort, the principle of restitutio in integrum is an adequate and fairly easy guide to the estimation of damage, because the damage suffered can be estimated by relation to some material loss. It is true that where loss includes a pre-estimate of future losses, or an estimate of past losses which cannot in the nature of things be exactly computed, some subjective element must enter in. But the estimate is in things commensurable with one another, and convertible at least in principle to the English currency in which all sums of damages must ultimately be expressed.

g In many torts, however, the subjective element is more difficult. The pain and suffering endured, and the future loss of amenity, in a personal injuries case are not in the nature of things convertible into legal tender. The difficulties arising in the paraplegic cases, or, before *Benham v Gambling*⁷, in estimating the damages for loss of expectation of life in a person who died instantaneously, are only examples of the intrinsically impossible task set judges or juries in such matters. Clearly the £50,000 award upheld in *Morey v Woodfield*⁸ could never compensate the victim of such an accident. Nor, so far as I can judge, is there any purely rational test by which a judge can calculate what sum, greater or smaller, is appropriate. What is surprising is not that there is difference of opinion about such matters, but that in most cases professional opinion gravitates so closely to a conventional scale. Nevertheless, in all actions in which damages, purely compensatory in character, are awarded for suffering, from

i 3 8th Edn, pp 502 et seq

4 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

5 [1971] 2 All ER at 214, [1971] 2 WLR at 887

6 Mayne and McGregor on Damages, 12th Edn, para 1

7 [1941] 1 All ER 7, [1941] AC 157

8 [1963] 3 All ER 533n, [1964] 1 WLR 16n

the purely pecuniary point of view the plaintiff may be better off. The principle of restitutio in integrum, which compels the use of money as its sole instrument for restoring the status quo, necessarily involves a factor larger than any pecuniary loss. a

In actions of defamation and in any other actions where damages for loss of reputation are involved, the principle of restitutio in integrum has necessarily an even more highly subjective element. Such actions involve a money award which may put the plaintiff in a purely financial sense in a much stronger position than he was before the wrong. Not merely can he recover the estimated sum of his past and future losses, but, in case the libel, driven underground, emerges from its lurking place at some future date, he must be able to point to a sum awarded by a jury sufficient to convince a bystander of the baselessness of the charge. As Windeyer J well said in *Uren v John Fairfax & Sons Pty Ltd*⁹: b

‘It seems to me that, properly speaking, a man defamed does not get compensation for his damaged reputation. He gets damages because he was injured in his reputation, that is simply because he was publicly defamed. For this reason, compensation by damages operates in two ways—as a vindication of the plaintiff to the public, and as consolation to him for a wrong done. Compensation is here a solatium rather than a monetary recompense for harm measurable in money.’ c

This is why it is not necessarily fair to compare awards of damages in this field with damages for personal injuries. Quite obviously, the award must include factors for injury to the feelings, the anxiety and uncertainty undergone in the litigation, the absence of apology, or the reaffirmation of the truth of the matters complained of, or the malice of the defendant. The bad conduct of the plaintiff himself may also enter into the matter, where he has provoked the libel, or where perhaps he has libelled the defendant in reply. What is awarded is thus a figure which cannot be arrived at by any purely objective computation. This is what is meant when the damages in defamation are described as being ‘at large’. In a sense, too, these damages are of their nature punitive or exemplary in the loose sense in which the terms were used before 1964, because they inflict an added burden on the defendant proportionate to his conduct, just as they can be reduced if the defendant has behaved well—as for instance by a handsome apology—or the plaintiff badly, as for instance by provoking the defendant, or defaming him in return. In all such cases it must be appropriate to say with Lord Esher MR in *Praed v Graham*¹⁰: d

‘. . . in actions of libel . . . the jury in assessing damages are entitled to look at the whole conduct of the defendant [I would personally add “and of the plaintiff”] from the time the libel was published down to the time they give their verdict. They may consider what his conduct has been before action, after action, and in court during the trial.’ e

It is this too which explains the almost indiscriminate use of ‘at large’, ‘aggravated’ ‘exemplary’, and ‘punitive’ before *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹. To quote again from Professor McCormick’s work, it was originally only in America that the distinction between ‘aggravated’ damages (which take into account the defendant’s bad conduct for compensating the plaintiff’s injured feelings) and ‘punitive’ or ‘exemplary’ damage was really drawn. My own view is that no English case, and perhaps even in no statute, where the word ‘exemplary’ or ‘punitive’ or ‘aggravated’ occurs before 1964 can one be absolutely sure that there is no element of confusion between the two elements in damages. It was not until Lord Devlin’s speech in *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ that the expressions ‘aggravated’ on the one hand and ‘punitive’ or ‘exemplary’ on the other acquired separate and mutually exclusive meanings as terms of art in English law. f

⁹ (1967) 117 CLR 118 at 150

¹⁰ (1889) 24 QBD at 55

¹¹ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129 g

- a The next point to notice is that it has always been a principle in English law that the award of damages when awarded must be a single lump sum in respect of each separate cause of action. Of course, where part of the damage can be precisely calculated, it is possible to isolate part of it in the same cause of action. It is also possible and desirable to isolate different sums of damages receivable in respect of different torts, as was done here in respect of the proof copies. But I must say I view with some distrust the arbitrary subdivision of different elements of general damages for the same tort, as was done in *Loudon v Ryder*¹², and even, subject to what I say later, what was expressly approved by Lord Devlin in *Rookes v Barnard*¹³ for the laudable purpose of avoiding a new trial. In cases where the award of general damages contains a subjective element, I do not believe it is desirable or even possible simply to add separate sums together for different parts of the subjective element, especially where, as was done by agreement in this case, the subjective element relates under different heads to the same factor, in this case the bad conduct of the defendant. I would think with Lord Atkin in *Ley v Hamilton*¹⁴:

'The "punitive" element is not something which is or can [the italics are mine] be added to some known factor which is non-punitive',

- d or in the words of Windeyer J in *Uren v John Fairfax & Sons Pty Ltd*¹⁵:

'The variety of the matters which, it has been held, may be considered in assessing damages for defamation must in many cases mean that the amount of a verdict is the product of a mixture of inextricable considerations.' [The italics again are mine.]

- e In other words the whole process of assessing damages where they are 'at large' is essentially a matter of impression and not addition. When exemplary damages are involved, and even though, in theory at least, it may be possible to winnow out the purely punitive element, the dangers of double counting by a jury or a judge are so great that, even to avoid a new trial, I would have thought the dangers usually outweighed the advantages. Indeed, although it must be wholly illegitimate to speculate
- f in such a matter, the thought crossed my mind more than once during the hearing that it may even have happened in this case.

TERMINOLOGY

- This brings me to the question of terminology. It has been more than once pointed out the language of damages is more than usually confused. For instance, the term 'special damage' is used in more than one sense to denominate actual past losses
- g precisely calculated (as in a personal injuries action), or 'material damage actually suffered' as in describing the factor necessary to give rise to the cause of action in cases, including cases of slander, actionable only on proof of 'special damage'. If it is not too deeply embedded in our legal language, I would like to see 'special damage' dropped as a term of art in its latter sense and some phrase like 'material loss' substituted.
- h But a similar ambiguity occurs in actions of defamation, the expressions 'at large', 'punitive', 'aggravated', 'retributory', 'vindictive' and 'exemplary' having been used in, as I have pointed out, inextricable confusion.

- In my view it is desirable to drop the use of the phrase 'vindictive' damages altogether, despite its use by the county court judge in *Williams v Settle*¹⁶. Even when a purely punitive element is involved, vindictiveness is not a good motive for awarding punishment. In awarding 'aggravated' damages the natural indignation of the court
- i at the injury inflicted on the plaintiff is a perfectly legitimate motive in making a

¹² [1953] 1 All ER 741, [1953] 2 QB 202

¹³ [1964] 1 All ER at 411, [1964] AC at 1228

¹⁴ (1935) 153 LT 384 at 386

¹⁵ (1967) 117 CLR at 150

¹⁶ [1960] 2 All ER 806, [1960] 1 WLR 1072

generous rather than a more moderate award to provide an adequate solatium. But that is because the injury to the plaintiff is actually greater and as the result of the conduct exciting the indignation demands a more generous solatium. Likewise the use of 'retributory' is objectionable because it is ambiguous. It can be used to cover both aggravated damages to compensate the plaintiff and punitive or exemplary damages purely to punish the defendant or hold him up as an example.

As between 'punitive' or 'exemplary', one should, I would suppose, choose one to the exclusion of the other, since it is never wise to use two quite interchangeable terms to denote the same thing. Speaking for myself, I prefer 'exemplary', not because 'punitive' is necessarily inaccurate, but 'exemplary' better expresses the policy of the law as expressed in the cases. It is intended to teach the defendant and others that 'tort does not pay' by demonstrating what consequences the law inflicts rather than simply to make the defendant suffer an extra penalty for what he has done, although that does, of course, precisely describe its effect.

The expression 'at large' should be used in general to cover all cases where awards of damages may include elements for loss of reputation, injured feelings, bad or good conduct by either party, or punishment, and where in consequence no precise limit can be set in extent. It would be convenient if, as the appellants' counsel did at the hearing, it could be extended to include damages for pain and suffering or loss of amenity. Lord Devlin uses the term in this sense in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁷, when he defines the phrase as meaning all cases where 'the award is not limited to the pecuniary loss that can be specifically proved'. But I suspect that he was there guilty of a neologism. If I am wrong, it is a convenient use and should be repeated.

Finally, it is worth pointing out, although I doubt if a change of terminology is desirable or necessary, that there is danger in hypostatizing 'compensatory', 'punitive', 'exemplary' or 'aggravated' damages at all. The epithets are all elements or considerations which may, but with the exception of the first need not, be taken into account in assessing a single sum. They are not separate heads to be added mathematically to one another.

ANALYSIS OF *ROOKES V BARNARD*¹⁸

This being said, it is necessary to analyse the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁸, a case, it must be remembered, of intimidation and not libel. The only actual decision on damages must be looked for in the passage where Lord Devlin says¹⁹:

'I doubt whether the facts disclosed in the summing-up show even a case for aggravated damages; a different impression may be obtained when the facts are fully displayed on a new trial. At present there seems to be no evidence that the respondents were motivated by malevolence or spite against the appellant. They wronged him, not primarily to hurt him, but so as to achieve their own ends. If that had not been their dominating motive, then what they did would not have been done in furtherance of a trade dispute and the whole case has been fought on the basis that it was. It is said that they persisted in believing that their closed shop position was endangered by the appellant's conduct, even when their official leaders told them that it was not. Be it so; pig-headedness will not do. Again, in so far as disclosed in the summing-up, there was no evidence of offensive conduct or of arrogance or insolence. It was, I think, suggested that some impolite observations were made about the appellant, but that is not enough; in a dispute of this sort feelings run high and more than hard words are needed for aggravated damages. Counsel for the appellant relied strongly on the flagrant breach of contract with B.O.A.C. and the respondents' open disregard of their pledges and their lack of consideration. But this was not conduct a that affected the appellant. He was no more distressed or humiliated by it than any of B.O.A.C.'s passengers whose convenience, it might be said, and interests were brushed aside by the respondents in their determination to secure their object.'

¹⁷ [1964] 1 All ER at 407, [1964] AC at 1221

¹⁸ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹⁹ [1964] 1 All ER at 414, [1964] AC at 1232

Although, as will be seen, I prefer much of what Lord Devlin said on the subject of exemplary damages to what has been said by his subsequent critics, and propose b to follow it, the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*²⁰ must be viewed in the light of these conclusions. It is not verbally inspired. But it is a careful and valuable decision not lightly to be set aside.

c The passages which have given rise to criticism and discussion²¹ can be divided conveniently into the following parts. The first part consists in exposition of the authorities and principles²² where Lord Devlin begins to draw his conclusions. These conclusions, which form the second portion of his opinion, include the three 'alleged categories'¹, the three 'considerations'² and finally³ the commentary and exposition of the consequences of what he has said and these occupy the rest of the passage under discussion.

WAS THE DECISION PER INCURIAM?

d Now, I think I must protest at the outset at the theory that Lord Devlin (or those members of the House who agreed with him) was speaking 'per incuriam'. I have already dealt with the argument that his conclusions did not follow the actual submissions of counsel on either side. Lord Devlin was, of course, perfectly well aware that, in drawing these conclusions from the authorities, he was making new law in the sense in which new law is always made when an important new precedent is established. Thus, he said⁴:

e 'I am well aware that what I am about to say will, if accepted, impose limits not hitherto expressed on such awards and that there is powerful, though not compelling, authority for allowing them a wider range. I shall not therefore conclude what I have to say on the general principles of law without returning to the authorities and making it clear to what extent I have rejected the f guidance which they may be said to afford.'

But a judge is always entitled to do this when the exact limits, rationale, and the extent of a principle is being discussed, and when those limits, rationale, and extent have never been authoritatively defined.

g Nor can it be said fairly that he had ignored *Ley v Hamilton*⁵. In fact he quoted from it at length and treated it, making allowance for the confusion in the legal terminology at the time to which I have already drawn attention, as a case of 'aggravated' damages. I think he was right in so doing; although I also think Salmon LJ was almost certainly right in thinking⁶ that the inverted commas in which Lord Atkin⁷ puts 'punitive' are not a guide to its meaning. The word is in inverted commas for the same reason that 'real' in the earlier passage is in inverted commas. They are quotation marks and Lord Atkin⁷ was quoting the actual words in the judgment of h Maugham LJ⁸ which he was criticising.

20 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

21 [1964] 1 All ER at 407-413, [1964] AC at 1220-1231

22 [1964] 1 All ER at 407-409, [1964] AC at 1220-1225

1 [1964] 1 All ER at 409-411, [1964] AC at 11225-11227

2 [1964] 1 All ER at 411, 412, [1964] AC at 1227-1230

3 [1964] 1 All ER at 412, 413, [1964] AC at 1230, 1231

4 [1964] 1 All ER at 410, [1964] AC at 1226

5 (1935) 153 LT 384

6 [1971] 2 All ER at 207, [1971] 2 WLR at 879

7 In Ley v Hamilton (1835) 153 LT at 386

8 In Ley v Hamilton in the Court of Appeal (1934) 151 LT 360 at 374

It is a fairer criticism of Lord Devlin to say that he did not mention *E Hulton & Co v Jones*⁹. Both counsel for the plaintiff in argument in that case and Lord Loreburn LC, in his speech¹⁰ which may have been ex tempore, reflect a view of the law of damages for libel apparently at variance with the law as Lord Devlin has now declared it to be. But, as I shall show, the difference is more apparent than real. It is difficult to square either counsel for the plaintiff's argument or the passage of Lord Loreburn LC's speech with the explicit admission made in the Court of Appeal and repeated in the facts stated¹¹, that the use of the name 'Artemus Jones' by the editor and author was innocent, and it is on this basis that the case is normally cited as an authority. Judging the use made of the case in the Court of Appeal by their own criteria of Lord Devlin, the case is certainly not a binding authority on the law of exemplary damages. It was never argued as such, although the observations of Lord Loreburn LC can be fairly used as testimony, and even as persuasive authority, for the state of legal thinking at the time. In law, however, if Lord Devlin be right, the law of exemplary damages was still evolving, and *Hulton v Jones*⁹ made no pretence at altering or defining it, nor did either counsel in the case argue the case in terms which raised the question in its present form.

DID ROOKES V BARNARD¹² EXTEND EXEMPLARY DAMAGES TO FRESH TORTS?

Having rejected the theory that Lord Devlin's speech can be pushed aside as having been delivered per incuriam, I hope I may now equally dispose of another misconception. I do not think that he was under the impression either that he had completely rationalised the law of exemplary damages, nor by listing the 'categories' was he intending, I would think, to add to the number of torts for which exemplary damages can be awarded. Thus I disagree with the dictum of Widgery LJ in *Mafo v Adams*¹³ (which, for this purpose, can be treated as an action for deceit) when he said:

'As I understand LORD DEVLIN's speech, the circumstances in which exemplary damages may be obtained have been drastically reduced, but the range of offences in respect of which they may be granted has been increased, and I see no reason since *Rookes v. Barnard*¹² why, when considering a claim for exemplary damages, one should regard the nature of the tort as excluding the claim.'

This would be a perfectly logical inference if Lord Devlin imagined that he was substituting a completely rational code by enumerating the categories and stating the considerations. It is true, of course, that actions for deceit could well come within the purview of the second category. But I can see no reason for thinking that Lord Devlin intended to extend the category to deceit, and counsel on both sides before us were constrained to say that, although it may be paradoxical, they were unable to find a single case where either exemplary or aggravated damages had been awarded for deceit, despite the fact that contumelious, outrageous, oppressive, or dishonest conduct on the part of the defendant is almost inherently associated with it. The explanation may lie in the close connection that the action has always had with breach of contract (see the discussion in Mayne and MacGregor¹⁴).

WHERE SOLATIU M IS ENOUGH

The true explanation of *Rookes v Barnard*¹² is to be found in the fact that, where damages for loss of reputation are concerned, or where a simple outrage to the individual or to property is concerned, aggravated damages in the sense I have explained can, and should in every case lying outside the categories, take care of the

9 [1910] AC 20, [1908-10] All ER Rep 29

10 [1910] AC at 24, [1908-10] All ER Rep at 47

11 [1910] AC at 20

12 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

13 [1969] 3 All ER at 1410, [1970] 1 QB at 558

14 Chapter 41, especially at para 968

a exemplary element, and the jury should neither be encouraged nor allowed to look beyond as generous a solatium as is required for the injuria simply in order to give effect to feelings of indignation. It is not that the exemplary element is excluded in such cases. It is precisely because in the nature of things it is, and should be, included in every such case that the jury should neither be encouraged nor allowed to look for it outside the solatium and then to add to the sum awarded another sum by way of penalty additional to the solatium. To do so would be to inflict a double penalty for the same offence.

b The surprising thing about *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵ is not that Lord Devlin restricted the award of exemplary damages viewed as an addition to or substitution for damages by way of solatium to the three so-called categories, but that he allowed the three so-called categories to exist by way of exception to the general rule. That he did this is due at least in part to the fact that he felt himself bound by authority to do so, but partly also because he thought that there were cases where, over and above the figure awarded for loss of reputation, for injured feelings, for outraged morality, and to enable a plaintiff to protect himself against future calumny or outrage of a similar kind, an additional sum was needed to vindicate the strength of the law and act as a supplement to its strictly penal provisions¹⁶.

d IS *ROOKES V BARNARD*¹⁵ UNWORKABLE?

I confess I am quite unable to see why such a view of the matter is 'unworkable'. As I have already pointed out, it has been worked in fact for nearly eight years. On the contrary, by insisting on a single sum being awarded for outrageous behaviour in nearly every case of tort, and allowing the jury full vent to their legitimate feelings within the proportions set by the injury involved, it seems to me that judge and jury are set an inherently less difficult task than if they were told first to take into account the aggravating factors, and then to impose an additional 'fine' for the size of which they have neither the qualifications, nor any measure by which they can limit their discretion, particularly since neither counsel nor the judge can mention particular figures which can have any relevance to the actual case. The difficulty consists, not in working the system of aggravated and purely compensatory damages, where they apply, as they do in almost every case of contumelious conduct under Lord Devlin's opinion, but in working a system of punitive damages alongside the system of aggravated and compensatory damage. This difficulty exists whether Lord Devlin's limitation to the categories be right or wrong and, if it were wrong, would exist in every case, and not only in a small minority of cases. The difficulty resides in the fact that the thinking underlying the two systems is as incompatible as oil and vinegar, the one based on what the plaintiff ought to receive, the other based on what is reasonable, but otherwise uninstructed, men and women think the defendant ought to pay.

THE MEANING OF THE CATEGORIES

h As regards the meaning of the particular categories, I have come to the conclusion that what Lord Devlin said was never intended to be treated as if his words were verbally inspired, and much of the criticism of them which has succeeded reports of the case has been based on interpretations which are false to the whole context and unduly literal even when taken in isolation from it.

j The one category exhaustively discussed before us was the second, since the first could obviously have no application to the instant case. But I desire to say of the first that I would be surprised if it included only servants of the government in the strict sense of the word. It would, in my view, obviously apply to the police, despite *A-G for New South Wales v Perpetual Trustee Co Ltd*¹⁷, and almost as certainly to local and other officials exercising improperly rights of search or arrest without warrant, and it may be that in the future it will be held to include other abuses of power without warrant by persons purporting to exercise legal authority. What it will not include is the simple bully, not because the bully ought not to be punished in damages, for he manifestly ought, but because an adequate award of compensatory damages by way of solatium will necessarily have punished him. I am not prepared to say without further consideration that a private individual misusing legal powers of private prosecution or arrest as in *Leith v Pope*¹⁸, where the defendant had the plaintiff arrested and tried on a capital charge, might not at some future date be assimilated into the first category. I am not prepared to make an exhaustive list of the emanations of government which might or might not be included. But I see no reason to extend it beyond this field, to simple outrage, malice or contumelious behaviour. In such cases a properly directed jury will not find it necessary to differentiate between what the plaintiff ought to receive and the defendant ought to pay, since the former will always include the latter to the extent necessary to vindicate the strength of the law.

15 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

16 Cf what Lord Devlin says [1964] 1 All ER at 410, 412, [1964] AC at 1226, 1230

17 [1955] 1 All ER 846, [1955] AC 457

When one comes to the second category we reach a field which was more exhaustively discussed in the case before us. It soon became apparent that a broad rather than a narrow interpretation of Lord Devlin's words was absolutely essential, and that attempts to narrow the second category by a quotation out of context of one sentence from the passage wherein it is defined simply will not do. Lord Devlin founded his second category on a sequence of cases beginning with *Bell v Midland Ry Co*¹⁹, and on the judgment of Maule J in *Williams v Currie*²⁰ and the dictum of Martin B in *Crouch v Great Northern Ry Co*¹. None of these were examples of precise calculation of the balance sheet type. Then he said²:

'[I]f the motive of making a profit is a factor also that is taken into account in damages for libel; one man should not be allowed to sell another man's reputation for profit. Where a defendant with a cynical disregard for a plaintiff's rights has calculated that the money to be made out of his wrongdoing will probably exceed the damages at risk, it is necessary for the law to show that it cannot be broken with impunity. This category is not confined to moneymaking in the strict sense. It extends to cases in which the defendant is seeking to gain at the expense of the plaintiff some object,—perhaps some property which he covets,—which either he could not obtain at all or not obtain except at a price greater than he wants to put down. Exemplary damages can properly be awarded whenever it is necessary to teach a wrongdoer that tort does not pay.' [The italics are mine.]

Even a casual reading of the above passage shows that the sentence:

'Where a defendant with a cynical disregard for a plaintiff's rights has calculated that the money to be made out of his wrongdoing will probably exceed the damages at risk, it is necessary for the law to show that it cannot be broken with impunity' is not intended to be exhaustive but illustrative, and is not intended to be limited to the kind of mathematical calculations to be found on a balance sheet. The sentence must be read in its context. The context occurs immediately after the sentence ending: 'one man should not be allowed to sell another man's reputation for profit', where the word 'calculation' does not occur. The context also includes the final sentence: 'Exemplary damages can properly be awarded whenever it is necessary to teach a

¹⁸ (1779) 2 Wm Bl 1327

¹⁹ (1861) 10 CBNS 287

²⁰ (1845) 1 CB 841 at 848

¹ (1856) 11 Exch 742 at 759

² [1964] 1 All ER at 410, 411, [1964] AC at 1227

a wrongdoer that tort does not pay.' The whole passage must be read sensibly as a whole, together with the authorities on which it is based.

It is true, of course, as was well pointed out by Widgery J in *Manson v Associated Newspapers Ltd*³, that the mere fact that a tort, and particularly a libel, is committed in the course of a business carried on for profit is not sufficient to bring a case within the second category. Nearly all newspapers, and most books, are published for profit. What is necessary in addition is (i) knowledge that what is proposed to be done is against the law or a reckless disregard whether what is proposed to be done is illegal or legal, and (ii) a decision to carry on doing it because the prospects of material advantage outweigh the prospects of material loss. It is not necessary that the defendant calculates that the plaintiff's damages if he sues to judgment will be smaller than the defendant's profit. This is simply one example of the principle. The defendant may calculate that the plaintiff will not sue at all because he has not the money (I suppose the plaintiff in a contested libel action like the present must be prepared nowadays to put at least £30,000 at some risk), or because he may be physically or otherwise intimidated. What is necessary is that the tortious act must be done with guilty knowledge for the motive that the chances of economic advantage outweigh the chances of economic, or perhaps physical, penalty.

d At this stage one must examine some of the counter-arguments which found favour in the Court of Appeal⁴. How, it may be asked, about the late Mr Rachman, who is alleged to have used hired bullies to intimidate statutory tenants by violence or threats of violence into giving vacant possession of their residences and so placing a valuable asset in the hands of the landlord? My answer must be that if this is not a cynical calculation of profit and cold-blooded disregard of a plaintiff's rights, I do not know what is. It is also argued that the second category does not take care of the case of a man who pursues a potential plaintiff to ruin out of sheer hatred and malice. The answer is that it does not do so because this is already taken care of in the full compensation or solatium for the injuria involved in which the jury can give full rein to their feeling of legitimate indignation without going outside the bounds of compensatory damages in the sense in which I have explained the phrase, that is, damages of sufficient size to enable the plaintiff to point to the size of the award to indicate the baselessness of the false charge, and damages for the outrage inflicted in exact proportion as it was unprovoked, unatoned for, or malicious. I would have thought the second category was ample to cover any form of injury committed within the scope of those torts for which aggravated and exemplary damages may be awarded where the motive was material advantage. *Mafo v Adams*⁵ is not really an answer to the contrary, although I would have thought that the damages there awarded for inconvenience, breach of covenant, and loss of a regulated tenancy were perhaps at present day values too small for the wrong committed. What was at issue in *Mafo v Adams*⁵ was the award of exemplary damages in an action for deceit (see from Sachs LJ⁶) and this, in the event, was never decided. What was decided in that case was that the plaintiff had not discharged the onus of proof that the defendant's motives were such as to bring the case within the second category. h This is clear from the fact that both Sachs and Widgery LJ⁷ based their judgments on a passage from the decision of the county court judge, where he said: 'The defendant's reasons for his actions are obscure' (see per Sachs LJ⁷, and per Widgery LJ⁸). I am far from saying that insofar as it could have been shown that the defendant was actuated by hope of gain, and if the action had been one of trespass, exemplary damages could not have been awarded under the second category, and even though

j ³ [1965] 2 All ER at 960, [1965] 1 WLR at 1045

⁴ [1971] 2 All 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

⁵ [1969] 3 All ER 1404, [1970] 1 QB 548

⁶ [1969] 3 All ER at 1407, [1970] 1 QB at 555

⁷ [1969] 3 All ER at 1408, [1970] 1 QB at 556

⁸ [1969] 3 All ER at 1411, [1970] 1 QB at 559

in the absence of authority I am of opinion that exemplary damages cannot be awarded in an action for deceit, I cannot claim that that matter has been finally determined. a

The main criticisms of Lord Devlin's speech are thus shown to have been unfounded. That he went beyond the existing law he had no doubt, and nor have I. But, as I have shown, he was entitled to do so. It may very well be that, in deciding in favour of the two exceptional categories, he was making an unnecessary concession to tradition. But he made the concession after a careful analysis of the authorities and, speaking for myself, and given the cautious approach indicated in Lord Gardiner LC's practice declaration⁹, and by a majority of this House in *Jones v Secretary of State for Social Services*¹⁰, I do not think there is any reason for disturbing them. I regard the Australian cases, and in particular *Uren v John Fairfax & Sons Pty Ltd*¹¹, as deciding no more than that on the particular facts of that case the award of exemplary damages was not acceptable. Insofar as they claim to establish that exemplary damages can be awarded for any contumelious disregard of the plaintiff's rights I may not, of course, comment so far as regards the law of Australia, but, so far as regards the law of England, I would say that an adequate award of compensatory damages in such a case must of necessity include, and perhaps more than include, any punitive or exemplary element. The proposition, as a proposition, would have been perfectly acceptable so long as the looser terminology prevalent before *Rookes v Barnard*¹² was in use. So far as regards the more strict terminology now to be employed, the proposition is not to be treated as acceptable in the English courts. b

Before turning to the so-called 'considerations' I desire to say a word concerning the decision in *Williams v Settle*¹³ and *Loudon v Ryder*¹⁴, on which Lord Devlin also commented. *Williams v Settle*¹³ was a case under s 17 (3) of the Copyright Act 1956. I agree with Lord Devlin that it is for consideration in the light of subsequent cases whether that section, which does not use the phrase 'exemplary damages', does in fact give a right to damages which are exemplary in the narrower sense used since *Rookes v Barnard*¹². If it does, the case should be regarded as a second category case, since the defendant's motive was profit. If it does not, and if it is to be regarded as still authoritative, *Williams v Settle*¹³ can only be regarded as an extreme example of aggravated damages, although the language of the county court judge was so strong as to lead me to think that I would not myself have been prepared to make so large an award. c

*Loudon v Ryder*¹⁴ is the earliest instance which I have been able to find where a split award was made of exemplary and compensatory damages for the same tort, and the split was made in circumstances which are not altogether plain from the report, after an award of a lump sum had been announced. What would have happened if Devlin J had summed up to the jury in favour of a generous award of aggravated damages on the lines of his later speech in *Rookes v Barnard*¹² is, of course, a question which no one can possibly answer. The answer might well have been, substituting 'trespass' for 'defamation', what Windeyer J said in *Uren v John Fairfax & Sons Pty Ltd*¹⁵: d

"Telling the jury in a defamation action that compensation is to be measured having regard to aggravating circumstances the result of the defendant's conduct might not result in a verdict different from that which they would return if they were told that because of that conduct they could give damages by way of example." e

9 See Note [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234 f

10 Page 145 ante, [1972] 2 WLR 210 g

11 (1967) 117 CLR 118

12 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

13 [1960] 2 All ER 806, [1960] 1 WLR 1072

14 [1953] 1 All ER 741, [1953] 2 QB 202

15 (1967) 117 CLR at 152 h

- a What is certain is that the summing-up by Devlin J in that case could not, as Lord Devlin himself surmised, now survive the analysis by Lord Devlin in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶ of the theoretical basis of exemplary damages in the sense in which the term should now be employed.

THE 'CONSIDERATIONS'

- b I turn now to Lord Devlin's three 'considerations'. It is worth pointing out that neither the Court of Appeal¹⁷ nor any of the counsel who appeared before us attacked these as such. Nor, so far as I am aware, have these been attacked in the cases in which Commonwealth judges have felt constrained to criticise *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶. This alone would be a good reason against a simple return to the status quo ante proposed by the Court of Appeal¹⁷, because the first and second 'considerations' coupled with the passage from which I have already quoted¹⁸ are themselves, and
- c quite independently of the 'categories', an important, and I think original, contribution to the law on exemplary damages. Whilst, as I have indicated, I cannot myself follow what Lord Devlin says on the second category so far as regards the right of appellate courts to interfere with jury awards on principles different from the traditional, nor, I think, with the proposal that *Benham v Gambling*¹⁹ offers a precedent for arbitrary limits imposed by the judiciary in defamation cases, I regard it as
- d extremely important that, for the future, judges should make sure in their direction to juries that the jury is fully aware of the danger of an excessive award. A judge should first rule whether evidence exists which entitles a jury to find facts bringing a case within the relevant categories, and, if it does not, the question of exemplary damages should be withdrawn from the jury's consideration. Even if it is not withdrawn from the jury, the judge's task is not complete. He should remind the jury
- e (i) that the burden of proof rests on the plaintiff to establish the facts necessary to bring the case within the categories; (ii) that the mere fact that the case falls within the categories does not of itself entitle the jury to award damages purely exemplary in character; they can and should award nothing unless (iii) they are satisfied that the punitive or exemplary element is not sufficiently met within the figure which they have arrived at for the plaintiff's solatium in the sense I have explained and (iv) that,
- f in assessing the total sum which the defendant should pay, the total figure awarded should be in substitution for and not in addition to the smaller figure which would have been treated as adequate solatium, that is to say, should be a round sum larger than the latter and satisfying the jury's idea of what the defendant ought to pay. (v) I would also deprecate, as did Lord Atkin in *Ley v Hamilton*²⁰, the use of the word 'fine' in connection with the punitive or exemplary element in damages, where it is
- g appropriate. Damages remain a civil, not a criminal remedy, even where an exemplary award is appropriate, and juries should not be encouraged to lose sight of the fact that, in making such an award they are putting money into a plaintiff's pocket, and not contributing to the rates, or to the revenue of central government.

- If this be correct, the agreed list of questions submitted to the jury in the present case is not the ideal procedure for ensuring that the jury keep their verdict within
- h bounds. They should normally be asked to award a single sum whether as solatium or as exemplary damages. If, in order to avoid a second trial, they are asked a second question, they should be asked, in the event of their awarding exemplary damages, what smaller sum they would have awarded if they had confined themselves to solatium in the sense explained.

- j It follows from what I have said that I am not prepared to follow the Court of Appeal¹⁷ in its criticisms of *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶, which I regard as having imposed valuable limits on the doctrine of exemplary damages as they had hitherto been understood in English law and clarified important questions which had previously

16 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

17 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

18 [1964] 1 All ER at 409, [1964] 1 AC at 1225

19 [1941] 1 All ER 7, [1941] AC 157

20 (1935) 153 LT 384 at 386

been undiscussed or left confused. From one point of view, there is much to be said for the interpretation put on Lord Devlin's speech by Windeyer J in *Uren v John Fairfax & Sons Pty Ltd*¹ immediately before the passage I have just quoted:

'What the House of Lords has now done is, as I read what was said, to produce a more distinct terminology. Limiting the scope of terms that often were not distinguished in application makes possible an apparently firm distinction between aggravated compensatory damages and exemplary or punitive damages.'

But it is not to be inferred from this that the ruling in *Rookes v Barnard*² is a pure question of semantics. It may well be true that in most individual cases the precise terminology in which the question is asked of the jury may not make much difference to the amount of the award. Both Windeyer J in the passage just cited and Lord Devlin³ were evidently of this view. But the following positive advantages can be gained from adhering to the rules he laid down, if properly interpreted: (1) The danger of double counting, of adding a pure 'fine' to what has already been awarded as solatium, without regarding the deterrent or punitive effect of the latter, has been eliminated, or at least reduced to a minimum. (2) In all cases where the categories do not apply, the jury must be told to confine the punitive or deterrent element in their thinking within the limits of a fair solatium. In other words, to borrow the language, though not the sentiments, expressed in *Forsdike v Stone*⁴ the jury must be told to consider only what the plaintiff should receive after giving full allowance to the need to re-establish his reputation and for the outrage inflicted on him, and not what the defendant should pay independently of this consideration. (3) In cases where the categories do apply, juries can be given directions a little more informative and regulatory than was the case up to and including the new analysis.

*Rookes v Barnard*² has not perhaps proved quite the definitive statement of the law which was hoped when it was decided. This is often the case. I remember with suitably mixed feelings of filial piety and inherited caution, that in his judgment in *R Addie & Sons (Collieries) Ltd v Dumbreck*⁵ my father believed he was putting a final end to doubts about the limits of occupiers' liability to trespassers, licensees, and invitees. But the way forward lies through a considered precedent and not backwards from it. I would hope very much that, in the light of observations made on *Rookes v Barnard*² in this case, Commonwealth courts might see fit to modify some of their criticisms of it. I do not know how far it can be of value in the United States of America where it seems to me that the decisions of the Supreme Court have been influenced greatly by the terms of the First Amendment to the Constitution, and by the unsatisfactory rules prevalent in American courts as to the recovery of costs. However that may be, we cannot depart from *Rookes v Barnard*² here. It was decided neither per incuriam nor ultra vires this House; we could only depart from it by tearing up the doctrine of precedent, and this was not the object of this House in assuming the powers adopted by the practice declaration of 1966⁶.

Least I should have been thought to have forgotten it, I would observe that the Court of Appeal⁷ overruled the decision of Lawton J⁸ that a claim for exemplary damages should be pleaded. I am content to accept their view on the basis of the present practice. But in the light of the decision of this House in the instant case I propose to refer to the Rule Committee the question whether in the light of *Rookes v Barnard*² and the present decision the present practice should not be altered.

1 [1967] 117 CLR at 152

2 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

3 [1964] 1 All ER at 412, [1964] AC at 1230

4 (1868) LR 3 CP 607 at 611

5 [1929] AC 358, [1929] All ER Rep 1

6 See Note [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234

7 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

8 [1971] 1 All ER 262

- a There is much to be said for the view that a defendant against whom a claim of this kind is made ought not to be taken by surprise.

My Lords, it follows from what I have said in my opinion this appeal should be dismissed and that costs should follow the event.

- b LORD REID. My Lords, the appellants published a book 'The Destruction of Convoy PQ17' which according to their advertisement on the dust jacket was the result of five intensive years of meticulous research by the author. It contained many statements about the conduct of Captain Broome who was the naval officer in command of the convoy. He sued the appellants and the author for damages for libel. After a trial which lasted for some 17 days a number of questions were left to the jury. They found that the words complained of were defamatory of Captain Broome. and were not true in substance and in fact. They were asked what compensatory damages they awarded, and they awarded £15,000. Then they were asked 'Has the plaintiff proved that he is entitled to exemplary damages?' Their answer was Yes against both defendants. Next they were asked 'What additional sum should be awarded him by way of exemplary damages?' Their answer was £25,000. So judgment was entered against both defendants for £40,000.

- d Others of your Lordships have dealt in detail with these statements and I do not think it necessary to say more than that in my opinion the jury were well entitled to find that they conveyed imputations of the utmost gravity against the character and conduct of Captain Broome as a naval officer. Indeed the appellants do not now seek to disturb the award of £15,000 as 'compensatory damages'. Their contention before your Lordships is twofold: first that the jury were not entitled to award any exemplary damages and secondly that the amount awarded under this head was much too great. As no objection was taken at the time to the form of the question there cannot now be any objection to the jury having been asked in this case to consider separately compensatory and exemplary damages.

- e The whole matter of exemplary damages was dealt with in this House in *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ in a speech by Lord Devlin with which all who sat with him, including myself, concurred. The Court of Appeal¹⁰ dealing with the present case held that if they applied the law as laid down in *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ the appellants' appeal must fail and the jury's verdict must stand. They could have stopped there, but they chose to go on and attack the decision of this House as bad law. They were quite entitled to state their views and reasons for reaching that conclusion but very unfortunately Lord Denning MR, apparently with the concurrence of his two colleagues, went on to say¹¹:

- g 'This case may, or may not, go on appeal to the House of Lords. I must say a word, however, for the guidance of judges who will be trying cases in the meantime. I think the difficulties presented by *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ are so great that the judges should direct the juries in accordance with the law as it was understood before *Rookes v Barnard*⁹. Any attempt to follow *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ is bound to lead to confusion.'

- h It seems to me obvious that the Court of Appeal¹⁰ failed to understand Lord Devlin's speech, but whether they did or not I would have expected them to know that they had no power to give any such direction and to realise the impossible position in which they were seeking to put those judges in advising or directing them to disregard a decision of this House. That aberration of the Court of Appeal has made it necessary to re-examine the whole subject and incidentally has greatly increased the expense to which the parties to this case have been put.

- i The very full argument which we have had in this case has not caused me to change the views which I held when *Rookes v Barnard*¹² was decided or to disagree with any of Lord Devlin's main conclusions. But it has convinced me that I and my colleagues made a mistake in simply concurring with Lord Devlin's speech. With the passage of time I have come more and more firmly to the conclusion that it is never wise to have only one speech in this House dealing with an important question of law. My main reason is that experience has shown that those who have to apply the decision to other cases and still more those who wish to criticise it seem to find it difficult to avoid treating sentences and phrases in a single speech as if they were provisions in an Act of Parliament. They do not seem to realise that it is not the function of noble and learned Lords or indeed of any judges to frame definitions or to lay down hard and fast rules. It is their function to enunciate principles and much that they say is intended to be illustrative or explanatory and not to be definitive. When there are two or more speeches they must be read together and then it is generally much easier to see what are the principles involved and what are merely illustrations of it.

9 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

10 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

11 [1971] 2 All ER at 201, 202, [1971] 2 WLR at 873

I am bound to say that, in reading the various criticisms of Lord Devlin's speech to which we have been referred, I have been very surprised at the failure of its critics to realise that it was intended to state principles and not to lay down rules. But I suppose that those of us who merely concurred with him ought to have foreseen that this might happen and to have taken steps to prevent it. So I shall try to repair my omission by stating now in a different way the principles which I, and I believe also Lord Devlin, had in mind. I do not think that he would have disagreed with any important part of what I am now about to say.

Damages for any tort or or ought to be fixed at a sum which will compensate the plaintiff, so far as money can do it, for all the injury which he has suffered. Where the injury is material and has been ascertained it is generally possible to assess damages with some precision. But that is not so where he has been caused mental distress or when his reputation has been attacked—where to use the traditional phrase he has been held up to hatred, ridicule or contempt. Not only is it impossible to ascertain how far other people's minds have been affected, it is almost impossible to equate the damage to a sum of money. Any one person trying to fix a sum as compensation will probably find in his mind a wide bracket within which any sum could be regarded by him as not unreasonable—and different people will come to different conclusions. So in the end there will probably be a wide gap between the sum which on an objective view could be regarded as the least and the sum which could be regarded as the most to which the plaintiff is entitled as compensation.

It has long been recognised that in determining what sum within that bracket should be awarded, a jury, or other tribunal, is entitled to have regard to the conduct of the defendant. He may have behaved in a high-handed, malicious, insulting or oppressive manner in committing the tort or he or his counsel may at the trial have aggravated the injury by what they there said. That would justify going to the top of the bracket and awarding as damages the largest sum that could fairly be regarded as compensation.

Frequently in cases before *Rookes v Barnard*¹² when damages were increased in that way but were still within the limit of what could properly be regarded as compensation to the plaintiff, it was said that punitive, vindictive or exemplary damages were being awarded. As a mere matter of language that was true enough. The defendant was being punished or an example was being made of him by making him pay more than he would have had to pay if his conduct had not been outrageous. But the damages although called punitive were still truly compensatory; the plaintiff was not being given more than his due.

On the other hand when we came to examine the old cases we found a number which could not be explained in that way. The sums awarded as damages were more—sometimes much more—than could on any view be justified as compensatory, and courts, perhaps without fully realising what they were doing, appeared to have a permitted damages to be measured not by what the plaintiff was fairly entitled to receive but by what the defendant ought to be made to pay as punishment for his outrageous conduct. That meant that the plaintiff, by being given more than on any view could be justified as compensation, was being given a pure and undeserved windfall at the expense of the defendant, and that insofar as the defendant was being required to pay more than could possibly be regarded as compensation he was being subjected to pure punishment.

¹² [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

b I thought and still think that that is highly anomalous. It is confusing the function of the civil law which is to compensate with the function of the criminal law which is to inflict deterrent and punitive penalties. Some objection has been taken to the use of the word 'fine' to denote the amount by which punitive or exemplary damages exceed anything justly due to the plaintiff. In my view the word 'fine' is an entirely accurate description of that part of any award which goes beyond anything justly due to the plaintiff and is purely punitive.

c Those of us who sat in *Rookes v Barnard*¹³ thought that the loose and confused use of words like 'punitive' and 'exemplary' and the failure to recognise the difference between damages which are compensatory and damages which go beyond that and are purely punitive had led to serious abuses, so we took what we thought was the best course open to us to limit those abuses. Theoretically we might have held that as purely punitive damages had never been sanctioned by any decision of this House (as to which I shall say more later) there was no right under English law to award them. But that would have been going beyond the proper function of this House. There are many well established doctrines of the law which have not been the subject of any decision by this House. We thought we had to recognise that it had become an established custom in certain classes of case to permit awards of damages which e could not be justified as compensatory, and that that must remain the law. But we thought and I still think it well within the province of this House to say that that undesirable anomaly should not be permitted in any class of case where its use was not covered by authority. In order to determine the classes of case in which this anomaly had become established it was of little use to look merely at the words which had been used by the judges because, as I have said, words like 'punitive' and f 'exemplary' were often used with regard to damages which were truly compensatory. We had to take a broad view of the whole circumstances.

I must now deal with those parts of Lord Devlin's speech which have given rise to difficulties. He set out two categories of cases which in our opinion comprised all or virtually all the reported cases in which it was clear that the court had approved of an award of a larger sum of damages than could be justified as compensatory. Critics g appear to have thought that he was inventing something new. That was not my understanding. We were confronted with an undesirable anomaly. We could not abolish it. We had to choose between confining it strictly to classes of cases where it was firmly established, although that produced an illogical result, or permitting it to be extended so as to produce a logical result. In my view it is better in such cases to be content with an illogical result than to allow any extension.

h It will be seen that I do not agree with Lord Devlin's view that in certain classes of case exemplary damages serve a useful purpose in vindicating the strength of the law. That view did not form an essential step in his argument. Concurrence with the speech of a colleague does not mean acceptance of every word which he has said. If it did there would be far fewer concurrences than there are. So I did not regard disagreement on this side issue as preventing me from giving my concurrence.

i I think that the objections to allowing juries to go beyond compensatory damages are overwhelming. To allow pure punishment in this way contravenes almost every principle which has been evolved for the protection of offenders. There is no definition of the offence except that the conduct punished must be oppressive, high-handed, malicious, wanton or its like—terms far too vague to be admitted to any criminal code worthy of the name. There is no limit to the punishment except that it must not be unreasonable. The punishment is not inflicted by a judge who has experience and at least tries not to be influenced by emotion; it is inflicted by a jury without experience of law or punishment and often swayed by considerations which every judge would put out of his mind. And there is no effective appeal against sentence. All that a reviewing court can do is to quash the jury's decision if it thinks the punishment awarded is more than any 12 reasonable men could award. The court cannot substitute its own award. The punishment must then be decided by another jury and if they too award heavy punishment the court is virtually powerless. It is no excuse to say that we need not waste sympathy on people who behave outrageously. Are we wasting sympathy on vicious criminals when we insist on proper legal safeguards for them? The right to give punitive damages in certain cases is so firmly embedded in our law that only Parliament can remove it. But I must say that I am surprised by the enthusiasm of Lord Devlin's critics in supporting this form of palm tree justice.

Lord Devlin's first category is set out in the passage where he said¹⁴:

'The first category is oppressive, arbitrary or unconstitutional action by the servants of the government. I should not extend this category,—I say this with particular reference to the facts of this case,—to oppressive action by private corporations or individuals.'

This distinction has been attacked on two grounds: first, that it only includes Crown servants and excludes others like the police who exercise governmental functions but are not Crown servants and, secondly, that it is illogical since both the harm to the plaintiff and the blameworthiness of the defendant may be at least equally great where the offender is a powerful private individual. With regard to the first I think that the context shows that the category was never intended to be limited to Crown servants. The contrast is between 'the government' and private individuals. Local government is as much government as national government, and the police and many other persons are exercising governmental functions. It was unnecessary in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵ to define the exact limits of the category. I should certainly read it as extending to all those who by common law or statute are exercising functions of a governmental character.

The second criticism is I think misconceived. I freely admit that the distinction is illogical. The real reason for the distinction was, in my view, that the cases showed that it was firmly established with regard to servants of 'the government' that damages could be awarded against them beyond any sum justified as compensation, whereas there was no case except one that was overruled where damages had been awarded against a private bully or oppressor to an amount that could not fairly be regarded as compensatory, giving to that word the meaning which I have already discussed. I thought that this House was therefore free to say that no more than that was to be awarded in future.

We are particularly concerned in the present case with the second category. With the benefit of hindsight I think I can say without disrespect to Lord Devlin that it is not happily phrased. But I think the meaning is clear enough. An ill disposed person could not infrequently deliberately commit a tort in contumelious disregard of another's rights in order to obtain an advantage which would outweigh any compensatory damages likely to be obtained by his victim. Such a case is within this category. But then it is said, suppose he commits the tort not for gain but simply out of malice why should he not also be punished. Again I freely admit there is no logical reason. The reason for excluding such a case from the category is simply that firmly established authority required us to accept this category however little we might like it, but did not require us to go farther. If logic is to be preferred to the desirability of cutting down the scope for punitive damages to the greatest extent a that will not conflict with established authority then this category must be widened. But as I have already said I would, logic or no logic, refuse to extend the right to inflict exemplary damages to any class of case which is not already clearly covered by authority. On that basis I support this category.

¹⁴ [1964] 1 All ER at 410, [1964] AC at 1226

¹⁵ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

b In my opinion, the conduct of both defendants in this case was such that the jury were clearly entitled, if properly directed, to hold that it brought them within the second category. Again, I do not intend to cover ground already covered by my noble and learned friends. So I say no more than that the jury were fully entitled to hold that the appellants knew when they committed this tort that passages in this book were highly defamatory of Captain Broome and could not be justified as true and that it could properly be inferred that they thought that it would pay them to publish the book and risk the consequences of any action Captain Broome might take. It matters not whether they thought that they could escape with moderate damages or that the enormous expense involved in fighting an action of this kind would prevent Captain Broome from pressing his claim.

c It was argued that to allow punitive damages in this case would hamper other publishers or limit their freedom to conduct their business because it can always be inferred that publishers publish any book because they expect a profit from it. But punitive damages could not be given unless it was proved that they knew that passages in the book were libellous and could not be justified or at least deliberately shut their eyes to the truth. I would hope that no publisher would publish in such circumstances. There is no question of curtailing the freedom of a reputable publisher.

d The next passage in Lord Devlin's speech which has caused some difficulty is what has been called the 'if, but only if' paragraph¹⁶. I see no difficulty in it but again I shall set out the substance of it in my own words. The difference between compensatory and punitive damages is that in assessing the former the jury or other tribunal must consider how much the plaintiff ought to receive whereas in assessing the latter they must consider how much the defendant ought to pay. It can only cause confusion if they consider both questions at the same time. The only practical way to proceed is first to look at the case from the point of view of compensating the plaintiff. He must not only be compensated for proved actual loss but also for any injury to his feelings and for having had to suffer insults, indignities and the like. And where the defendant has behaved outrageously very full compensation may be proper for that. So the tribunal will fix in their minds what sum would be proper as compensatory damages. Then if it has been determined that the case is a proper one for punitive damages the tribunal must turn its attention to the defendant and ask itself whether the sum which it has already fixed as compensatory damages is or is not adequate to serve the second purpose of punishment or deterrence. If they think that that sum is adequate for the second purpose as well as for the first they must not add anything to it. It is sufficient both as compensatory and as punitive damages. But if they think that sum is insufficient as a punishment then they must add to it enough to bring it up to a sum sufficient as punishment. The one thing which they must not do is to fix sums as compensatory and as punitive damages and add them together. They must realise that the compensatory damages are always part of the total punishment.

e f g h i It was argued that the jury were not properly directed by the trial judge on this matter. I agree with your Lordships that that argument must fail. A judge's direction to a jury is not to be considered in vacuo. It must be read in light of all the circumstances as they then existed and I cannot believe that the jury were left in any doubt as to how they must deal with this matter.

j Next there are questions arising from the fact there were two defendants. When dealing with compensatory damages the law is quite clear. There was one tort of which both defendants were guilty. So one sum is fixed as compensation and judgment is given for that sum against both defendants leaving it to the plaintiff to sue whichever he chooses and then leaving it to the defendant who has paid to recover a contribution if he can from the other. But when we come to punitive damages the position is different. Although the tort was committed by both only one may have been guilty of the outrageous conduct or if two or more are so guilty they may be guilty in different degrees or owing to one being rich and another poor punishment proper for the former may be too heavy for the latter.

Unless we are to abandon all pretence of justice, means must be found to prevent more being recovered by way of punitive damages from the least guilty than he ought to pay. We cannot rely on his being able to recover some contribution from the other. Suppose printer, author and publisher of a libel are all sued. The printer will probably be guiltless of any outrageous conduct but the others may deserve punishment beyond compensatory damages. If there has to be one judgment against all three then it would be very wrong to allow any element of punitive damages at all to be included because very likely the printer would have to pay the whole and the others might not be worth suing for a contribution. The only logical way to deal with the matter would be first to have a judgment against all the defendants for the compensatory damages and then to have a separate judgment against each of the defendants for such additional sum as he should pay as punitive damages. I would agree that that is impracticable. The fact that it is impracticable to do full justice appears to me to afford another illustration of how anomalous and indefensible is the whole doctrine of punitive damages. But as I have said before we must accept it and make the best we can of it.

So, in my opinion, the jury should be directed that, when they come to consider what if any addition is to be made to the compensatory damages by way of punitive damages, they must consider each defendant separately. If one any of the defendants does not deserve punishment or if the compensatory damages are in themselves sufficient punishment for any one of the defendants, then they must not make any addition to the compensatory damages. If each of the defendants deserves more punishment than is involved in payment of the compensatory damages then they must determine which deserves the least punishment and only add to the compensatory damages such additional sum as that defendant ought to pay by way of punishment. I do not pretend that that achieves full justice but it is the best we can do without separate awards against each defendant.

It was argued that here again there was misdirection of the jury because all that was not made plain to them. But again I agree with your Lordships that in the whole circumstances we ought not to hold the direction of the learned trial judge to be inadequate. Again the jury can have been in no doubt as to what was required of them.

There remains what is perhaps the most difficult question in this case—whether the additional award of £25,000 as punitive damages is so excessive that we can interfere. I think it was much too large, but that is not the test. I would like to be able to hold that the court has more control over an award of punitive damages than it has over an award of compensatory damages. As regards the latter it is quite clear that a court can only interfere if satisfied that no 12 reasonable men could have awarded so large a sum and the reason for that is plain. The court has no power to substitute its own assessment for the verdict of a jury. If it interferes it can only send the matter back to another jury. So before it can interfere it must be well satisfied that no other jury would award so large a sum. I do not see how this House could arrogate to itself any wider power with regard to punitive damages. We could not deprive the plaintiff of his right to a new trial so we must adhere to the established test. Any diminution or abolition of the functions of a jury in libel cases can only come from Parliament. If this case brings nearer the day when Parliament does take action I for one shall not be sorry.

Whether or not we can interfere with this award is a matter which is not capable of much elaboration. In considering how far 12 reasonable men might go, acting as jurors commonly do act, one has to bear in mind how little guidance the court is entitled to give them. All that they can be told is that they must not award a sum a which is unreasonable. In answer to questions whether anything more definite could properly be said neither counsel in this case was able to make any suggestion and I have none to offer. The evidence in this case is such that the jury could take an extremely unfavourable view of the conduct of both defendants. I do not say that they ought to have done so, but they were entitled to do so. And they must have done so. I find it impossible to say that no jury of reasonable men, inexperienced but doing b their best with virtually no guidance, could reach the sum of £25,000. Or, to put it in another way, I would feel no confidence that if the matter were submitted to another jury they must reach a substantially different result. So with considerable regret I must hold that it would be contrary to our existing law and practice if this House refused to uphold this verdict.

c It is true that in this case the parties agreed that if the verdict for £25,000 were quashed they would leave it to this House to substitute another figure. But that agreement cannot justify us in doing otherwise than we would have done if the parties had stood on their legal rights. The obvious reason for that agreement was a common desire to avoid the enormous expense of a new trial. This is not the first occasion on which I have felt bound to express my concern about the undue proximity and expense of libel actions. I would not blame any individuals. It may arise from d the conduct of a trial before a jury being more expensive than a trial before a judge. If so that is an additional argument for taking these cases away from juries. Or it may be that it suits wealthy publishers of newspapers, books and periodicals that the cost of fighting a libel action is so great that none but a person with large financial backing can sue them effectively.¹ Whatever be the reason the costs of this case have already reached a figure which many laymen would call scandalous. I think that those in a position to take effective action might take note.

e Finally, I must say something about a strange misconception which appears in the judgments of the Court of Appeal¹⁷ in this case. Somehow they reached the conclusion that the decision of this House in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁸ was made per incuriam, was ultra vires, and had produced an unworkable position. It must be noted that in at least three earlier cases the Court of Appeal were able without difficulty or question f to apply that decision (*McCarey v Associated Newspapers Ltd*¹⁹, *Broadway Approvals Ltd v Odhams Press Ltd*²⁰ and *Fielding v Variety Incorporated*¹). What has caused their change of mind does not appear but I must deal with their new view. As regards the present position being unworkable, of course many difficulties remain in this branch of the law, but these difficulties are an inheritance from the confusion of the past. I have dealt fairly fully with the proper interpretation of *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁸ and it appears to me that that decision removes many old difficulties and creates few, if g any, new ones.

I need not deal separately with the novel idea that a decision of this House can be ultra vires because that charge appears to be consequential on the charge that this House acted per incuriam in reaching its decision. It is perfectly legitimate to think and say that we were wrong but how anyone could say we acted per incuriam in face h of the passage² in which reference is made to *Ley v Hamilton*³ I fail to understand.

This charge is really based on what appears to me to be a misreading by the Court of Appeal of two decisions of this House, *E Hulton & Co v Jones*⁴ and *Ley v Hamilton*³. Hulton's case⁴ has always been regarded as the leading authority for the proposition that a defamatory description intended to apply to a fictional person may in fact be a libel on a real person and therefore a subject for damages. I see nothing in the speeches in this House to indicate that punitive damages in the modern sense were i being considered. It was said that there was an element of recklessness in the failure of the defendants to realise that there was a real Artemus Jones and that this justified

17 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

18 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

19 [1964] 3 All ER 947, [1965] 2 QB 86

20 [1965] 2 All ER 523, [1965] 1 WLR 805

1 [1967] 2 All ER 497, [1967] 2 QB 841

2 [1964] 1 All ER at 412, 413, [1964] AC at 1230

3 (1935) 153 LT 384

4 [1910] AC 20, [1908-10] All ER Rep 29

a rather high sum of damages but I see nothing to indicate any view that the damages went beyond anything that could be justified as compensation and could only be justified as being punitive in the modern sense.

*Ley v Hamilton*⁵ requires rather fuller consideration. But again I see nothing to indicate that this House held that the damages went beyond compensation or that there had been outrageous conduct justifying a punitive award which went beyond compensation. The majority in the Court of Appeal certainly held that the £5,000 damages awarded was punitive in the modern sense. They held that the real damage was trifling and the rest punishment. Greer LJ said⁶ that if Mr Hamilton had been prosecuted for criminal libel it was inconceivable that he would have been fined £5,000. Maugham LJ said⁷ that the damages could not be described as a fair and reasonable compensation but were in the nature of a fine. In this House only Lord Atkin delivered a speech. I read it as intended to show that elements properly included in compensatory damages were far wider than the majority in the Court of Appeal had thought and that the whole of this £5,000 was in fact justified as being compensatory. He said⁸:

"The fact is that the criticism with great respect seems based upon an incorrect view of the assessment of damages for defamation. They are not arrived at as the Lord Justice seems to assume by determining the "real" damage and adding to that a sum by way of vindictive or punitive damages. It is precisely because the "real" damage cannot be ascertained and established that the damages are at large. It is impossible to track the scandal, to know what quarters the poison may reach: it is impossible to weigh at all closely the compensation which will recompense a man or a woman for the insult offered or the pain of a false accusation. No doubt in newspaper libels juries take into account the vast circulations which are justly claimed in present times. The "punitive" element is not something which is or can be added to some known factor which is non-punitive. In particular it appears to present no analogy to punishment by fine for the criminal offence of publishing a defamatory libel."

By saying that compensation for insult or the pain of a false accusation cannot be weighed at all closely and that there was nothing here analogous to punishment by fine, he was to my mind making it as clear as words can make it that the whole of this £5,000 was truly compensatory in character. So I think that Lord Devlin was perfectly right in saying that there is no decision of this House which recognises punitive damages in the modern sense of something which goes beyond compensation. Where the Court of Appeal⁹ went wrong was in failing to realise that in the older cases damages were frequently referred to as exemplary or punitive although they were in reality compensatory.

On the whole matter I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, at the trial of this action questions arose whether, if the plaintiff, Captain Broome, succeeded, he was entitled to recover exemplary damages in addition to compensatory damages. The law relating to exemplary damages was considered in your Lordships' House in 1964 and was laid down in the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁰. That decision bound the learned judge. It bound the Court of Appeal⁹. It continues to be binding authority in all courts unless and until it appears to your Lordships to be right to depart from it.

In presiding at the trial the learned judge set himself loyally and faithfully to follow the binding authority of the decision. His directions to the jury followed the approach laid down in the decision though it is contended that in regard to one or two matters there was faulty exposition which was sufficiently serious to vitiate

5 (1935) 153 LT 384

6 (1934) 151 LT 360 at 369

7 (1934) 151 LT at 374

8 (1935) 153 LT at 386

9 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

10 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

a the award made by the jury of exemplary damages. These matters call for separate consideration. If the contentions concerning them do not succeed, there remains an issue whether the award of the jury was excessive and should be set aside. If it is held that there was nothing amiss at the trial and that the law as laid down in your Lordships' House¹¹ was properly applied by the learned judge it would be an unhappy conclusion if it were now held that the trial had in fact been conducted on wrong or at least on unnecessary lines but that this had only been so because the law which had to be followed had been wrongly laid down. If that were the conclusion it is by no means certain that it would be possible to avoid ordering a new trial which would then be conducted on the basis of the law as newly laid down. But a result so lamentable (and for the parties so calamitous) must be contemplated as at least a possibility if it is decided that the law was wrongly declared in 1964 and must now be changed or changed back again.

c Before considering this aspect of the matter further I must express my view in regard to the main contentions which are raised by the appellants. They for their part do not in any way question the validity of *Rookes v Barnard*¹². Their appeal relates only to the award of exemplary damages. The jury found that the words complained of in the hardback edition were defamatory of Captain Broome and that the words were not true in substance or in fact. They found similarly in regard to the proof copies. They awarded compensatory sums respectively of £14,000 and £1,000. No challenge as to such results is made. No criticism is advanced in regard to the very careful summing-up of the learned judge dealing with the facts and with the issues as to liability. No suggestion is made that the awards of compensation can be attacked as being excessive or unreasonable.

e The learned judge left three questions to the jury on the issue of exemplary damages. First they were asked whether Captain Broome had proved that he was entitled to exemplary damages. Here the learned judge was carefully following *Rookes v Barnard*¹². There may be exemplary damages if a defendant has formed and been guided by the view that though he may have to pay some damages or compensation because of what he intends to do yet he will in some way gain (for the category is not confined to money-making in the strict sense) or may make money out of it, to an extent which he hopes and expects will be worth his while. I do not think that the word 'calculated' was used to denote some precise balancing process. The situation contemplated is where someone faces up to the possibility of having to pay damages for doing something which may be held to have been wrong but where nevertheless he deliberately carries out his plan because he thinks that it will work out satisfactorily for him. He is prepared to hurt somebody because he thinks that he may well gain by so doing even allowing for the risk that he may be made to pay damages. As the learned judge put it in reference to defamation there may be exemplary damages in cases where someone wilfully or knowingly or recklessly peddles untruths for profit. There must be evidence fit to be left to the jury but if there is then it is for the jury to decide whether there is entitlement to exemplary damages on the basis to which I have referred.

h It was contended on behalf of the appellants that there was no evidence fit to be left to the jury in this case on this issue. In my view this contention wholly fails. There was ample evidence. It was painstakingly recounted in the summing-up of the learned judge. It is helpfully referred to and summarised in the judgment of Lord Denning MR¹³. It is reviewed in the speech of Lord Hailsham LC which I have had the advantage of reading in advance.

i Similar considerations apply to the question which was put to the jury and which they answered by saying that entitlement to exemplary damages was proved against both defendants. It is in regard to the next question and answer that the greatest doubts and difficulties in my view arise. Being asked, what additional sum should be awarded him by way of exemplary damages? the answer of the jury was £25,000. So there were three awards: one being (for the hardback edition) the compensatory figure of £14,000; another being the exemplary damages figure of £25,000. For the total of £40,000 judgment was entered.

¹¹ In Rookes v Barnard [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹² [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹³ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

I must confess that for my part I should greatly regret it if the practice became general of having a separate award of exemplary damages in this manner (I will return to this question later). But the learned judge was only following the guidance specifically given in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁴. There it was said¹⁵ that the fact that the two sorts of damage differ essentially does not necessarily mean that there should be two awards. But it was said that there may be cases in which it is difficult for a judge to say whether he ought or ought not to leave a claim for exemplary damages to the jury. I can quite see that in such a case it will be easier for an appellate court (where an issue is raised whether there was evidence which could justify an award of exemplary damages) if there are two awards. The award of exemplary damages could be set aside without the necessity for a new trial if the appellate court considered that the evidence was not such as to have been fit for the consideration of the jury so as to entitle them to award exemplary damages. For this reason it was stated in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁴ that if a judge is in doubt whether he ought to leave a claim for exemplary damages to a jury then he could invite them to say 'what sum they would fix as compensation and what additional sum, if any, they would award if they were entitle to give exemplary damages'. It was this course that the learned judge followed in the present case. But if this course is followed the words 'if any' become of importance. They were not included in the question which was put to the jury.

There are three very important issues which arise. (1) Did the learned judge give an adequate direction to the jury to ensure that they understood that they should only award an 'additional' sum if they were satisfied that the amount they were awarding as compensatory damage was in itself not enough to punish the defendants? (2) Did the learned judge give an adequate direction to meet the situation where (as in this case) there are two defendants? and (3) In any event is the sum of £40,000 excessive as an award of exemplary damages and a figure which no reasonable jury could award—with the result that although the purely compensatory part £15,000 is not challenged the award of an additional £25,000 must be set aside? (1) The relevant sentences in the summing-up have been referred to in the speech of Lord Hailsham LC and I need not set them out. I would have been happier if the direction on this point (which came towards the end of what I venture to think was a masterly review of the case) had been ampler and more explicit than it was. But the learned judge did emphasise the word 'additional'. He asked the jury to underline it. He said that they should underline it because both the court and counsel would want to know 'if you do decide to award punitive damages, how much more do you award over and above the compensatory damage'. Even so it would have been better to have made it abundantly clear that the punitive element is not to be considered in isolation: an enforced obligation to pay a large sum by way of compensation has itself a punitive impact. So a jury ought fully to understand that only if a sum awarded as compensation is inadequate as a punishment should any larger sum be awarded.

Much earlier in his summing-up the learned judge had dealt with this matter in an introductory way. He told the jury that they were being asked—

'not only to give Captain Broome compensatory damages, that is, a reasonable sum for the injury to his reputation and the exacerbation of his feelings: but in addition to fine [the appellants] and Mr. Irving for having done what they have done. The money which you decide—if you do decide—to award by way of punitive damages will not go into the National Exchequer. It will have to go into Captain Broome's pocket.'

¹⁴ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹⁵ [1964] 1 All ER at 411, [1964] AC at 1228

a Here again there was an omission to emphasise that an award of compensation must always and inevitably be a part of the 'fine' in cases where the imposition of a 'fine' is warranted.

Although a study of the shorthand note of what was said has led me to the view that there should have been amplification in the way to which I have referred, the important question now is whether it should be held that the jury were misled with the result that their award cannot stand. The emphasis placed on the word b 'additional' could not have been lost sight of by the jury. Additional to what? Quite clearly, additional to the amount of compensation awarded. The jury were asked 'how much more' they would award. The 'more' was to be 'over and above' the compensation. It surely must have been clear to the jury that any 'more' that they decided on or any 'additional' sum would have to be paid by those against whom they awarded it on top of the sum that they were first awarding. Here was a jury that c listened to the case over a period of 17 days. They deliberated for nearly five hours. They awarded a sum of £25,000 to be 'additional' to their award of £15,000. They knew that the total was £40,000. Thereafter they heard both counsel agree that there should be a single judgment for that amount. No suggestion was made (or I think could possibly have been made) that the £25,000 included the £15,000. I would find d it difficult to accept that at the stage in their deliberations when they were considering whether the present appellants and Mr Irving should be punished by being made to pay money they should at that stage have left out of account one part of the money that they themselves were awarding. If having decided that it was a case for punishment the jury were considering the monetary sum which, as such punishment, should be paid the point would surely have been raised by one member if not by all members e of the jury: are we not punishing them enough by saying that they must pay £15,000? They could have recorded that as their view had they entertained it. I am not prepared to assume that something which at that stage must really have been quite obvious was overlooked by the jury.

(2) There is nothing in regard to this question which I could usefully add to what Lord Hailsham LC has said in reviewing the authorities and in formulating his f conclusion. I express my concurrence.

(3) The approach which should be followed by an appellate court in considering whether an award of damages made by a jury should be assailed on the ground that the sum awarded is excessive has been clearly defined in authoritative decisions. They are referred to in the speech of Lord Hailsham LC. I am bound to say that the figure of £40,000 appears to me to be a high figure. Certainly it must be a very g unusual case in which on a correct application of the law as laid down in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶ the amount which defendants must pay should so greatly exceed the amount which is reasonably to be received by the plaintiff by way of compensation. It is this disparity between the £40,000 and the £15,000 that has caused disquiet as to whether the jury may have been caused or allowed to be under a misunderstanding. But if the conclusion is reached that the jury knew what they were about and chose h their figures advisedly then I do not think that I ought to conclude that their 'additional' figure of £25,000 was so high that no reasonable jury could award it. To translate injury to and attack on reputation into monetary terms is at all times a difficult exercise. But it was the same jury that fixed the 'additional' figure of £25,000 that also—without being impeached for so doing—fixed the compensatory figure of £15,000. If they did not go wide when fixing the latter why should it be determined i that they went wide in fixing the former. The conclusion which I think can be drawn is that the jury took a very serious view of the conduct and attitude of the defendants. If, after hearing all the relevant features of the case probed and examined over a period of 17 days and hearing the evidence of such of the parties as decided to call or give evidence, the jury did take a very serious view there was evidence which entitled them to do so. They may have regarded the conduct and attitude of each of the defendants with equally sharp disfavour. If it was their considered collective view that the defamation was grave and that publication was deliberately undertaken by those who had regard for their own advantage but none for the honour and renown of one whom they traduced then the jury were warranted in deciding that such conduct should be heavily penalised. Whatever might have been my personal assessment had I been on the jury I have not been persuaded that it must be decided that the penalty imposed was beyond the limit to which a reasonable jury could go. Nor can it be said with any assurance that an estimation of a figure by a learned judge would necessarily have superior validity. A learned judge has experience and knowledge of other cases but in a matter so elusive as fixing in monetary terms a reflection of feelings of disapproval there is no norm. It may be difficult to give guidance but a judge should be able to express to a jury the same guidance as he would give to himself.

For the reasons which I have given I consider that the appeal should be dismissed. As I have indicated, the appellants in no way sought to impugn the decisions in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁷. Such ardour in criticism as may have been evinced in the Court of Appeal¹⁸ by counsel for Captain Broome became tempered and modified by the reflection that an assault on *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁷ was not essential for his success in this appeal and that the overturning of *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁷ might at least possibly involve the jettisoning of all the proceedings to date and a complete new trial on a fresh basis. But as so much was said about *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁷ and because in the printed case of the respondent, Captain Broome, the first reason set out was that your Lordships' House should depart from its decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁷ (insofar as that decision altered the law on exemplary damages generally or at least in defamation cases) I must record my opinion.

In *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁷ one submission that was made was that exemplary damages could not be awarded in that case. Other submissions led to a somewhat general consideration of the law relating to exemplary damages. The report of the arguments¹⁹ shows that certain authorities and certain textbooks were referred to and were examined. There were citations of some 30 cases. In the result the House examined and reviewed the law and came to certain conclusions. The House was not bound to limit those conclusions within any formulation which counsel had thought fit to formulate.

It would be idle to deny that a very considerable pruning operation was decided on. It may be that there are some who would not have pruned so much and so drastically. It may be that there are some who would have pruned more severely. What was done was done in the hope of removing from the law 'a source of confusion between aggravated and exemplary damages'. It may be that there are some who feel that though the previous law (built up, as the common law is, as a result of particular decisions given in particular sets of circumstances) was in very many respects imprecise and even illogical yet it was somehow found in practice to work and to be no serious cause of confusion. It may be that there are some who consider that manifest variations and divergencies in terminology did not reflect any really fundamental differences of approach: that for example when in *The Mediana (Owners) v Comet (Owners)*²⁰ Lord Halsbury LC made a reference, although only a passing and incidental one, to punitive damages:

'I put aside cases of trespass where a high-handed procedure or insolent behaviour has been held in law to be a subject of aggravated damages, and the jury might give what are called punitive damages'

17 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

18 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

19 [1964] AC at 1158-1164

20 [1900] AC 113 at 118, [1900-3] All ER Rep 126 at 129

a he had much the same conception in mind as had Lord Atkinson when in *Addis v Gramophone Co Ltd*²¹, he made an incidental reference to circumstances of malice, fraud, defamation or violence which would sustain an action of tort in which a person might no doubt 'recover exemplary damages, or what is sometimes styled vindictive damages' or as had Lord Loreburn LC when he said in *Hulton v Jones*¹:

b 'In the second place the jury were entitled to say this kind of article is to be condemned. There is no tribunal more fitted to decide in regard to publications, especially publications in the newspaper Press, whether they bear a stamp and character which ought to enlist sympathy and to secure protection. If they think that the licence is not fairly used and that the tone and style of the libel is reprehensible and ought to be checked, it is for the jury to say so . . .'

c But even if some of the thoughts above referred to are in fact entertained, do they give warrant for re-opening now the debate that led to the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*². I do not think so. I do not think that the power that was referred to in the statement of 26th July 1966³ was intended to encourage a tendency periodically to chop and change the law. In branches of the law where clarification becomes necessary there may well be decisions which as a matter of policy are not universally welcome or where some may think that some variant of the decision one way or the other would have been more acceptable. But this does not mean that decisions of this House should readily be reviewed whenever a case presents itself which is covered by a decision. There must be something much more.

d In his book on damages⁴ Professor Street poses the question whether awards of exemplary damages are ever justified. He outlines seven arguments against them and with mathematical impartiality seven arguments in their favour concluding e that one cannot say whether or not exemplary damages are desirable. Whatever general views may be entertained or whatever inclination there may be in different personal views I see no advantage in refusing at this juncture to recognise that a deliberate pronouncement was made in *Rookes v Barnard*².

f Although I consider that no reason has been shown for denying to that pronouncement the authority of a decision of this House it is not inconsistent with this approach to express the hope that a necessity for a separate and isolated assessment of exemplary damages will be rare. In the search for authority only one case was found prior to *Rookes v Barnard*² in which there was such a result. That was *Loudon v Ryder*⁵ now overruled. The present case is I think the first one subsequent to *Rookes v Barnard*² in which such a separate award has actually been made.

g In the older cases the 'vindictive' or 'exemplary' or 'punitive' aspect merely became one element in a composite whole. Thus the law as it was in 1877 was summarised in Mr Mayne's *Treatise on Damages*⁶. He pointed to the difference between damages in cases of contract (where they were only a compensation) and in cases of tort. In the latter 'if there were no circumstances of aggravation they 'are generally the same'. But where he said:

h ' . . . the injury is to the person, or character, or feelings, and the facts disclose fraud, malice, violence, cruelty, or the like, they operate as a punishment, for the benefit of the community, and as a restraint to the transgressor.'

In the various cases cited⁷ one amount only of damages was assessed. For a later general summary of the law (as it was in 1895) reference may be made to Sir Frederick

j 21 [1909] AC 488 at 496, [1908-10] All ER Rep 1 at 5

1 [1910] AC 20 at 25, [1908-10] All ER Rep 29 at 47

2 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

3 See Note [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234

4 Principles of the Law of Damages, 1962, at pp 34-36

5 [1953] 1 All ER 741, [1953] 2 QB 202

6 3rd Edn, p 37

7 See pp 36, 37, 514, 515, 516

Pollock's book on torts⁸. He refers to cases where there is great injury without the possibility of measuring compensation by any numerical rule. In such cases he said:

'...juries have been not only allowed but encouraged to give damages that express indignation at the defendant's wrong rather than a value set upon the plaintiff's loss. Damages awarded on this principle are called exemplary or vindictive.'

He went on to explain that—

'the kind of wrongs to which they are applicable are those which, besides the violation of a right or the actual damage, import insult or outrage.'

The cases cited, to which I need not refer in detail, again appear to me to be cases in which only one figure of damages was assessed.

When juries came to award damages in such cases of tort they did therefore give and indeed were 'encouraged' to give a sum which marked displeasure or indignation or which was to serve as a deterrent or as an example or which vindicated the law or which was a way of punishing the defendant. But juries were not invited to isolate such element as was purely punitive. I do not expect that they did in practice. In some cases their displeasure or indignation would operate as a kind of topping-up process. But if the process by which they had arrived at a figure could have been analysed (which normally it could not have been) while it would probably have been found that there had been nothing in the nature of a mathematical addition of separate sums yet it would have been recognised that some (wholly unascertainable) part of the whole must have been purely punitive. Stated otherwise such (unascertained) part was a fine. Logical analysis forces the conclusion therefore that in the result there would in a civil action have been punishment for conduct not particularised in any criminal code and that such punishment had taken the form of a fine not receivable by the state but as a sort of bonus by a private individual who would apart from it be solaced for the wrong done to him. There may be much to be said for making it permissible in a criminal court to order in certain cases that a convicted person should pay compensation. There is much to be said against a system under which a fine becomes payable in a civil court without any of the safeguards which protect those charged with crimes. If therefore the working of the law before *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ is exposed to a relentless logical examination it has to be conceded that some features of it were not in principle acceptable. Yet it may be that no serious injustice resulted. And indeed as we have been told the life of the law often lies not in logic but in experience. It would however be an unfortunate and bizarre result if a wholly laudable attempt to rationalise the law had brought it about that the element which it was most sought to suppress was so brought into sharp relief that it attained a significance never before exhibited.

I would regard the present case as exceptional in the sense that the jury must have considered that the conduct of the defendants merited very special condemnation. In other than an exceptional case where exemplary damages are to be awarded I would hope that a jury would be unlikely to award a total sum which exceeded its purely compensatory component element to an extent in any way comparable to that which is revealed in the present case.

I would dismiss the appeal.

VISCOUNT DILHORNE. My Lords, the main issues to be determined in this appeal are (1) whether what was said by my noble and learned friend Lord Devlin in *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ with regard to exemplary damages, and with which all the other members of the House then sitting agreed, correctly states the law; (2) if it does, whether Lawton J erred in leaving the question of exemplary damages to the a jury; (3) having left it to them, whether he misdirected them with regard thereto; and (4) whether the sum of £40,000 awarded by them, of which £25,000 was exemplary damages, was so excessive that that verdict cannot be allowed to stand. I propose to consider the first of these questions last. Although *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁰ was not concerned with damages for libel, I consider the other questions on the assumption that what was said in that case is not to be regarded as obiter in relation to libel cases and is to be regarded as binding on all inferior courts.

b Lord Devlin expressed the view¹¹ that there were only three categories of cases in which exemplary damages could be awarded, namely:—(1) where there had been oppressive, arbitrary or unconstitutional action by servants of the government; (2) where the defendant's conduct had been calculated by him to make a profit for himself which might well exceed the compensation payable to the plaintiff; and (3) where exemplary damages are expressly authorised by statute.

c The appellants contended that this case did not come within the second category. They called no evidence at the trial and the question whether it should have been left to the jury to consider exemplary damages, depends on whether there was evidence given or adduced on behalf of the plaintiff on which the jury were entitled to infer and conclude that the defendant's conduct was of that character.

d I do not think that Lord Devlin ever envisaged that, to bring a case within the second category, the plaintiff would have to show that there had been something in the nature of a mathematical calculation by the defendant, an assessment of the profit likely to ensue from the publication of defamatory matter and an estimation of the risk of being sued and the damages likely to be awarded if an action was brought. If a plaintiff had to prove that, it would be seldom that he would be in a position to do so. Newspapers and books are usually published for profit and that fact does not by itself make the publisher liable to pay exemplary damages. I think that Widgery J was right when he said in *Manson v Associated Newspapers Ltd*¹²:

e '... it is perfectly clear, from those authorities [*McCarey v Associated Newspapers Ltd*¹³ and *Broadway Approvals Ltd v Odhams Press Ltd*¹⁴], that in a case in which a newspaper quite deliberately publishes a statement which it either knows to be false or which it publishes recklessly, careless whether it be true or false, and on the calculated basis that any damages likely to be paid as a result of litigation will be less than the profit which the publication of that matter will give, then LORD DEVLIN's conditions are satisfied and exemplary damages are permissible.'

f He went on to say that he proposed to tell the jury that they could consider exemplary damages—

g 'if, having considered what material there is before them, they are driven to the inference that this was an article published by the defendants when conscious of the fact that it had no solid foundation and with the cynical and calculated intention to use it for what it was worth, on the footing that it would produce more profit than any possible penalty in damages was likely to be.'

h I think too that Lawton J put the matter correctly when he said in the course of his summing-up:

'A man is liable to pay damages on a punitive basis if he wilfully and knowingly, or recklessly peddles untruths for profit.'

i In my opinion, there was ample evidence on which the jury was entitled to come to the conclusion that the case came within the second category. On 9th December

10 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

11 [1964] 1 All ER at 410, 411, [1964] AC at 1226, 1227

12 [1965] 2 All ER 954 at 957, [1965] 1 WLR 1038 at 1040, 1041

13 [1964] 3 All ER 947, [1965] 2 QB 86

14 [1965] 2 All ER 523, [1965] 1 WLR 805

1966 Mr Irving, the author, sent the manuscript of the book to the appellants with a letter in which he said that Captain Broome had threatened legal action if the manuscript was published, and on 23rd December he sent them a long letter in which he quoted an extract from a letter he had received from Kimbers, the publishers to whom he had first submitted the manuscript. That extract stated:—

‘... if the book goes to a legal man as it is, he could only tell you that half is libellous. We could not possibly publish the book as it is ...’

The manuscript submitted to the appellants was identical with that which Kimbers had seen. Perusal of it by any intelligent publisher must, even without the advantage of having the views of another publisher, have led to the conclusion that it contained many very grave and serious libels on Captain Broome and the jury were fully entitled to conclude that the appellants realised this.

Mr Kimber gave evidence that about 8th March 1967 he had telephoned Mr Parker, a director of the appellants and told him that they had had one or two threats of libel actions if they published the book; to which Mr Parker’s response was ‘In that case we will tighten up the indemnity clause in Mr Irving’s agreement’. On 27th December 1967 Captain Broome wrote to the appellants saying that the manuscript was ‘unquestionably libellous’. They replied saying that in the light of his comments ‘drastic revisions’ had been made. In fact, as the appellants must have known, the revisions that were made did not materially affect the passages defamatory of Captain Broome. On 16th February 1968 the business director of the appellants circulated a memorandum in the following terms, to all concerned:

‘It is anticipated that early copies of THE DESTRUCTION OF CONVOY P.Q 17 will start coming into the House on March 5th. Will you please note that absolutely and positively not one single copy, on any pretext whatsoever, is to be removed from the House without reference to me. Mr. Mitchell: Would you please notify the printer that this book is to be treated on a maximum security basis and ensure that not one single copy slips through their net.’

Shortly thereafter the appellants circulated proof copies of the book. Why they did so after the circulation of this memorandum is not known for no evidence was given for them. In the absence of any explanation the jury were, in my view, entitled to draw the inference that they had decided to publish the book, despite Captain Broome’s threats of action, knowing that passages in the book were libellous of Captain Broome and not caring whether those passages were true or false and on the footing that it was worth their while to run the risk of an action being brought by him and of his obtaining damages in order to make a profit on the book.

On 5th March 1968 Captain Broome issued a writ for libel. On 29th April 1968 his statement of claim was delivered. The appellants then knew, if they were in any doubt before, of what passages he was complaining. On 14th June 1968 they delivered their defence. They pleaded that the words complained of were true in substance and in fact in their natural and ordinary meaning. They did not seek to justify the meaning which the statement of claim alleged the words complained of bore, inter alia, that Captain Broome had been disobedient, careless, incompetent, indifferent to the fate of the merchant ships and had been largely responsible for or contributed extensively to the loss of two-thirds of the ships of the convoy. Despite the issue of this writ, the appellants went on and published a hardback edition of the book. That led to another writ being issued by Captain Broome. Again in their defence to this statement of claim the appellants pleaded that the words complained of were in their natural and ordinary meaning true in substance and in fact but did not seek to justify the meanings which in the statement of claim it was alleged they bore. The jury by their verdict rejected the plea of justification and must have accepted that the passages complained of bore the meanings alleged by Captain Broome.

I do not propose to set out what those passages were. Suffice it to say that they a clearly alleged that Captain Broome had been disobedient, careless, incompetent, indifferent to the fate of the merchant ships, that he had wrongly withdrawn his destroyer force from the convoy, that he had taken it closer to the German airfields than he had been ordered to do and that he had been responsible for the loss of two-thirds of the ships in the convoy. He was in fact accused of cowardice. That the appellants did not appreciate that the passages complained of could be understood to have these meanings, is hard to accept. Yet after publication of the proof copies, after receipt of the writ and the statement of claim in respect of that publication, and when they knew the meanings which it was alleged the passages bore, they went on and published the hardback edition, and at the trial persisted in their plea of justification. In these circumstances if Lawton J had ruled at the end of the plaintiff's case, as he was asked to do, that there was no evidence from which the jury could infer that the case came within the second category, he would in my opinion have erred. I therefore reject this contention of the appellants.

After specifying the three categories of cases in which in his view exemplary damages might be awarded, Lord Devlin in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵ said that there were three considerations which must always be borne in mind and then went on to say:

d 'In a case in which exemplary damages are appropriate, a jury should be directed that if, but only if, the sum which they have in mind to award as compensation (which may of course be a sum aggravated by the way in which the defendant has behaved to the plaintiff) is inadequate to punish him for his outrageous conduct, to mark their disapproval of such conduct and to deter him from repeating it, then they can award some larger sum.'

e Complaint is made that Lawton J gave no such direction to the jury. With the agreement of counsel, he asked them to answer seven questions. The first was whether, in respect of the hardback edition the words complained of were defamatory of the plaintiff; the second, were they true in substance and in fact. Their answer to the first question was, Yes and to the second, No. The third question was, 'What compensatory damages do you award the Plaintiff?' Their answer was £14,000.

f Then in answer to the fourth and fifth questions they said that he was entitled to exemplary damages against both defendants. The sixth question was 'What additional sum should be awarded him by way of exemplary damages?' Their answer was £25,000.

After the questions had been handed to the jury in the course of the summing-up, Lawton J told them that, after considering what were the compensatory damages if they found for the plaintiff, they should go on to consider whether he was entitled to exemplary damages. As to that, he told them to consider the case against each defendant separately, saying:

h 'In respect of each of them you will ask yourselves this question: "Has the plaintiff proved his entitlement against that defendant?". If the answer is Yes, then you will have to go on and assess how much punitive damages should be awarded.'

In the next paragraph of his summing-up, he repeated this, saying:

'You will have to ask yourselves: "Has he proved that he is entitled to punitive damages against [the appellants]?" If the answer is No, that is that. If the answer is Yes, you will have to assess the damages.'

i Then he asked the jury to underline the word 'additional' in the sixth question as he and learned counsel wanted to know:

'... if you do decide to award punitive damages, how much more do you award over and above the compensatory damage.'

¹⁵ [1964] 1 All ER at 411, [1964] AC at 1228

The jury were thus clearly told that if they found that the plaintiff was entitled to punitive damages, they must then assess what punitive damages should be awarded. They were never told that in considering whether any sum should be so awarded, they must have regard to the sum they awarded for compensatory damages, and if, and only if, that sum was inadequate to punish the defendants, should they add to it by awarding a sum for exemplary damages.

The failure to give such a direction, I regret that I cannot but regard as a most serious omission. It is one of the most important features of Lord Devlin's speech that a direction on the lines he stated should be given. It was not, and instead the jury were told twice that, if they held that Captain Broome was entitled to exemplary damages, they must assess them. The jury's verdict shows that they thought that £15,000 compensatory damages was insufficient, but if they had been told that they must, in assessing exemplary damages, take into account the sum awarded in compensation, it is possible that they would have awarded not £25,000, but only £10,000 as exemplary damages, that is to say, that they would have deducted from the £25,000 the £15,000 compensatory damages.

I regret having to come to this conclusion but I see no escape from it. After a trial lasting 17 days and lengthy hearings in the Court of Appeal¹⁶ and in this House, one feels some reluctance to say that the jury's verdict should not stand. If all the counsel engaged in the case had told the jury that a sum should only be awarded for exemplary damages if the amount of the compensatory damages was insufficient punishment, then it might be possible to say that despite the omission in the summing-up, the jury can have been in no doubt as to what they were required to do. Unfortunately all counsel did not tell them that. One counsel told the jury in his final address that they must consider exemplary damages quite separately from compensatory damages. He told them, 'they are completely unconnected with each other and in no sense does the one head fall to be balanced against the other' and, 'the two sums are so different that there is no propriety in any sense in balancing them up'. He thus indicated that account should not be taken of the amount of compensatory damages when deciding what, if any, sum should be awarded for exemplary damages. Counsel for the present appellants did not refer to the matter but counsel for Mr Irving in his final address read to the jury the 'if, but only if' passage of Lord Devlin's speech.

As the case was presented to the jury, I can see no ground for the conclusion that they must, despite the omission in the summing-up, have been aware that they had to take into account the compensatory damages when deciding, if they held that there was entitlement to exemplary damages, what sum, if any, should be awarded on that account. On the contrary, the passages I have cited from the summing-up show that they were told that, if they found entitlement, they must then assess an amount for exemplary damages. I have regretfully come to the conclusion that in consequence of this omission, the verdict should not be upheld.

Another criticism made of the summing-up was that the jury were not told on what basis they should assess the exemplary damages if they found that the plaintiff was entitled to them from both defendants and if, in their opinion, the degree of guilt of the defendants differed. In the Court of Appeal¹⁶ there was considerable divergence of view as to the proper direction to be given on this. While there is ample authority for the proposition that against joint tortfeasors there can only be one verdict and one judgment for a joint tort, there is not a great deal of authority on this question. Such as there is points to the conclusion that the plaintiff can only recover the amount which all the defendants should pay and that the amount to be awarded should not be increased to a sum thought adequate to punish the most guilty defendant (see Dawson v McClelland, per Andrews J¹⁷, per Boyd J¹⁸ and a per FitzGibbon LJ¹⁹; *Smith v Streatfeild*²⁰ per Bankes J, and Gatley on Libel and Slander¹). If that were not the case an innocent party or a less guilty party might have to pay a sum far in excess of that which he ought to pay. The result of this conclusion appears to be that if three defendants are sued for writing, printing and publishing a libel, if the publisher and author are held liable to pay exemplary damages and the printer is not, the plaintiff will not be awarded exemplary damages and the publisher and author will avoid liability for such damages.

¹⁶ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1964] 2 WLR 853

¹⁷ [1899] 2 IR 486 at 490

¹⁸ [1899] 2 IR at 493

b The summing-up contained this passage:

c ‘ . . . say, for example, you took the view that Mr. Irving was more to blame than [the appellants], or to be fair, you took the view that [the appellants], being an experienced firm of publishers were more to blame than this young man, Mr. Irving, should you make [the appellants] pay a larger sum by way of punitive damages than Mr. Irving? The answer to that is No. Whatever damages, if any, you decide should be awarded by way of punitive damages must be the same sum in respect of both Mr. Irving and [the appellants], if you find them both liable to pay punitive damages.’

d Later in response to an intervention by counsel, he made it clear that this did not mean awarding one sum against each defendant but one sum against both.

While it can be said that the direction on this might have been more clearly expressed, I think it suffices for this passage did indicate to the jury that they should award a sum which was appropriate to the less guilty of the two. It may, of course, be the case that the jury did not find that one was more guilty than the other.

e I now turn to the question whether the damages awarded were so excessive that the verdict cannot be allowed to stand. In *Rookes v Barnard*² Lord Devlin recognised that where there was entitlement to exemplary damages, that did not necessarily mean that there must be two awards though he expressed the view that where there was doubt about entitlement to such damages, to avoid the risk of a new trial, it might be convenient to have separate awards. One consequence of there being two awards, one for compensatory damages and one for exemplary, is that the jury’s verdict is more open to attack. If £15,000 was sufficient to compensate the plaintiff f for the injury inflicted on him, what justification can there be for an award of a further £25,000 as exemplary damages?

Lawton J very clearly told the jury that they were being asked to fine the appellants and Mr Irving for what they had done. He told them that they were ‘really in the position of a judge or magistrate trying a criminal case’ and that punitive damages g ‘must be reasonable in all the circumstances’.

An appellate court should only interfere with a jury’s verdict as to damages if it is such as to show that the jury has failed to perform its duty (*Mechanical and General h Inventions Co Ltd v Austin and the Austin Motor Co Ltd*³ per Lord Wright, *Bocock v Enfield Rolling Mills Ltd*⁴, *Scott v Musial*⁵ and *Lewis v Daily Telegraph Ltd*⁶). To be set aside, the verdict must be out of all proportion to the facts. The award of £25,000 for exemplary damages, as a fine and despite the direction given by Lawton J to which I have referred, in addition to the award of £15,000 compensatory damages is, in my opinion, out of all proportion to the facts and suffices to show that they failed to perform their duty. Their award was, in my view, far in excess of the most that 12 reasonable men could be expected to give. If they had appreciated that they

i 19 [1899] 2 IR at 499

20 [1913] 3 KB 764 at 769, [1911-13] All ER Rep 362 at 364

1 6th Edn, p 1389

2 [1964] 1 All ER at 411, [1964] AC at 1228

3 [1935] AC 346 at 375, [1935] All ER Rep 22 at 35

4 [1954] 3 All ER 94, [1954] 1 WLR 1303

5 [1959] 3 All ER 193, [1959] 2 QB 429

6 [1962] 2 All ER 698, [1963] 1 QB 340, affd [1963] 2 All ER 151, [1964] AC 234 had to take into account the compensatory damages, then as I have said perhaps they might have awarded an additional £10,000 as exemplary damages. I would myself have assessed a considerably lower figure. Perhaps, one does not know, they may have thought that the judge had power to set off one against the other. However that may be, I think that the highest figure that could have been awarded by a jury performing its duty for exemplary damages would have been £10,000 in which case judgment would have been given not for £40,000 but for £25,000. On this ground, too, in my opinion the verdict cannot stand. a

In turn now to the first question. Does *Rookes v Barnard*⁷ correctly state the law with regard to exemplary damages? The Court of Appeal⁸ held that it did not. It was said that it was a decision given per incuriam. The Court of Appeal⁸ refused to allow it and judges were told to direct juries in accordance with the law as understood before that case. b

Decisions of this House are binding on all inferior courts and must be followed by them. There are, I think, two grounds on which the Court of Appeal can justifiably refuse to follow what has been said in this House. The first is that what was said was obiter. While it might be argued that the observations made with regard to exemplary damages insofar as they related to libel actions were obiter as no question with regard to them arose in *Rookes v Barnard*⁷ where the question was, could such damages be given for intimidation? the Court of Appeal⁸ did not base their action on this ground. The second is where there are two clearly inconsistent decisions of this House, and the Court of Appeal has then to choose which to follow. In the Court of Appeal⁸ it was asserted that what was said in *Rookes v Barnard*⁷ was in conflict with two previous decisions of this House, *Hulton v Jones*⁹ and *Ley v Hamilton*¹⁰ but, as I read the judgments, the Court of Appeal⁸ did not proceed on this ground. c

To say that a decision of this House was given per incuriam is, to say the least, unusual and could be taken, although I cannot believe it was so intended, as of a somewhat offensive character. While I regret the use of this expression, I doubt if it was intended to mean more than that the questions involved deserved more consideration in relation, among other things, to libel actions. If that is what was meant, it is, I must confess, a view with which I have considerable sympathy. d

As I understand the judicial functions of this House, although they involve applying well established principles to new situations, they do not involve adjusting the common law to what are thought to be the social norms of the time. They do not include bowing to the wind of change. We have to declare what the law is, not what we think it should be. If it is clearly established that in certain circumstances there is a right to exemplary damages, this House should not, when sitting judicially, and indeed, in my view, cannot properly abolish or restrict that right. This, indeed, was recognised by Lord Devlin when he said¹¹ that it was not open to this House to 'arrive at a determination that refused altogether to recognise the exemplary principle'. If the power to award such damages is to be abolished or restricted, that is the task of the legislature. e

One criticism that can be made of Lord Devlin's speech is that while recognising that a refusal altogether to recognise the exemplary principle was not possible, he nevertheless restricted the power to award such damages so that they ceased to be obtainable in cases where prior to *Rookes v Barnard*⁷ they might have been given. f

I agree with Lord Denning MR that the pre-*Rookes v Barnard*⁷ law was well g

7 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

8 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

9 [1910] AC 20, [1908-10] All ER Rep 29

10 (1935) 153 LT 384

11 [1964] 1 All ER at 410, [1964] AC at 1226 h a stated in *Mayne and McGregor on Damages*¹²—where it is said that such damages can only be given—

‘where the conduct of the defendant merits punishment, which is only considered to be so where his conduct is wanton, as where it discloses fraud, malice, violence, cruelty, insolence or the like, or, as it is sometimes put, where he acts in contumelious disregard of the plaintiff’s rights.’

b A similar statement is to be found in *Mayne on Damages*¹³. I do not think that this statement of the law is to be questioned because in a later passage¹⁴ in the current edition it is stated:

c ‘... it cannot be said that English law has committed itself finally and fully to exemplary damages [a view which conflicts with the opinion of Lord Devlin to which I have referred], and many of the ... cases point to the rationale not of punishment of the defendant but of extra compensation for the plaintiff for the injury to his feelings and dignity. This is, of course, not exemplary damages at all. It is another head of non-pecuniary loss to the plaintiff.’

d This passage did not appear in the earlier editions. I am not concerned with the rationale but with what was recognised to be the law before *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵. And I am reinforced in my view by the fact that what was said in the earlier passage¹⁶ appears to accord with Australian law. In this field there does not appear to have been any difference between Australian and English law prior to *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵. In *Uren v John Fairfax & Sons Pty Ltd*¹⁷ the High Court of Australia refused to follow *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵ and held that exemplary damages might be awarded if it appears that the defendant’s conduct in committing the wrong exhibited a contumelious disregard of the plaintiff’s rights, McTiernan J saying that the law of exemplary damages was ‘compendiously stated’ in the passage I have cited from Mayne and McGregor.

e Lord Devlin’s first category ‘oppressive, arbitrary or unconstitutional action by servants of the government’, a category which he said he would not extend to oppressive action by private corporations or individuals, was subjected to serious criticism by Taylor J in *Uren v Fairfax*¹⁷. He pointed out that in none of the three old cases on which this category was apparently based, did the decisions turn on the fact that the defendants had acted for the government. Surely it is conduct, not status, that should determine liability. Power to award exemplary damages may be an anomaly, but I doubt whether it is beneficial to the law to seek to reduce the area of that anomaly at the price of creating other anomalies and illogicalities. Surely it is anomalous if a person guilty of oppressive conduct should only be liable to exemplary damages if a servant of the government. In these days there are others than the government who can be guilty of oppressive conduct. Why should they be treated differently? I can find nothing in the three cases to indicate that if the conduct complained of had been by persons other than servants of the government, liability to exemplary damages would have been excluded.

h Just as the definition of this category might be said to have been obiter to the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵, so might consideration of it be regarded in this case. Nevertheless as *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵ has to be considered in this appeal in consequence of the action taken by the Court of Appeal¹⁸, I feel I should express my opinion

j ¹² 12th Edn (1961), para 207

¹³ 11th Edn (1946), p 41

¹⁴ 12th Edn, para 212

¹⁵ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹⁶ 12th Edn, para 207

¹⁷ (1967) 117 CLR 118

¹⁸ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

which is that this narrow definition does not appear to me to be justified by the authorities on which it was based. a

It may also be contended that Lord Devlin's second category is also too narrowly drawn for why should conduct lead to exemplary damages if inspired by the profit motive or some material interest, and similar conduct due to other motives not do so. But the substantial criticism that can be made is that by his categorisation, the previously existing and recognised power to award exemplary damages is restricted. Lord Devlin indeed appreciated the novelty of what he was doing when he said¹⁹ that acceptance of his views 'would impose limits not hitherto expressed on such awards'. I do not think that this should have or could properly be done. It should have been left to the legislature. b

This conclusion does not, however, mean that the jury's verdict as to liability must be interfered with. It was urged that the appellants' decision to call no evidence was based on the assumption that *Rookes v Barnard*²⁰ applied—and that the issue was, did the case come within the second category. While it may be that Captain Broome would have presented his case differently but for what was said in *Rookes v Barnard*²⁰ the defendants had to meet the case presented whether or not *Rookes v Barnard*²⁰ applied, and it was in relation to that case that they decided to call no evidence. As the case presented would prior to *Rookes v Barnard*²⁰, if established, have justified the award of exemplary damages, I cannot accept that the defendants might have reached a different decision about calling evidence on the case as presented if *Rookes v Barnard*²⁰ had not been followed. c

I now turn to the passage in Lord Devlin's speech dealing with the assessment of damages, a passage which, save in the respect to which I have referred, was closely followed by Lawton J in his summing-up. I think that Salmon LJ correctly summarised the pre-*Rookes v Barnard*²⁰ practice when he said¹: d

'Judges used to direct juries in libel actions that, if they found in favour of the plaintiff, they should award him a sum which would make it plain to the world that there was no truth in the libel and which, as far as money could do so, would compensate him for the distress, humiliation and annoyance which the libel had caused him. They were also told in appropriate cases that they could take the whole of the defendant's conduct into account down to the moment they returned their verdict, and that if they came to the conclusion that he had behaved outrageously they might, as a deterrent, reflect their disapproval of the defendant's conduct in the amount of the damages which they awarded. At the same time they were always warned to be fair and reasonable and not to allow themselves to be inflamed against the defendant but to decide dispassionately what in all the circumstances would be a reasonable sum to award.'

The summing-up in *Loudon v Ryder*² which was approved by the Court of Appeal³, also recognised that outrageous conduct was a ground for exemplary damages. That appears to be the first case in which a jury was asked to award separate sums for exemplary and for compensatory damages and in which it was suggested that the amount awarded for exemplary damages was to be regarded as the imposition of a fine. f

In *Ley v Hamilton*⁴ the Court of Appeal by a majority (Greer and Maugham LJJ, Scrutton LJ dissenting) allowed an appeal from a jury's verdict awarding £5,000 damages for libel, one ground for the decision being that the damages awarded were excessive, Maugham LJ saying that the sum could not be described 'as a fair g

¹⁹ [1964] 1 All ER at 410, [1964] AC at 1226

²⁰ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹ [1971] 2 All ER at 205, [1971] 2 WLR at 876, 877

² [1953] 1 All ER 741, [1953] 2 QB 202

³ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

⁴ (1934) 151 LT 360 h

a and reasonable compensation for the damages which the plaintiff' had suffered, that the verdict could only be justified on the view that the jury were exercising the right to give vindictive or punitive damages, and that—'when the damages in question are really not compensation for an injury sustained by the plaintiff but in the nature of a fine inflicted on the defendant'

b the Court of Appeal would be compelled to interfere. In this House⁵ Maugham LJ's approach was rejected by Lord Atkin in a speech with which Lords Tomlin, Thankerton, Macmillan and Wright agreed. Part of the relevant passages of Lord Atkin's speech were cited by Lord Devlin⁶ but two sentences which I italicise and which I regard as important were omitted. The full passage is as follows':

c 'The fact is that the criticism [Maugham LJ's] with great respect seems based upon an incorrect view of the assessment of damages for defamation. They are not arrived at as the Lord Justice seems to assume by determining the "real" damage and adding to that a sum by way of vindictive or punitive damages. It is precisely because the "real" damage cannot be ascertained and established that the damages are at large. It is impossible to track the scandal, to know what quarters the poison may reach: it is impossible to weigh at all closely the compensation which will recompense a man or a woman for the insult offered or the pain of a false accusation. No doubt in newspaper libels juries take into account the vast circulations which are justly claimed in present times. The "punitive" element is not something which is or can be added to some known factor which is non-punitive. In particular it appears to present no analogy to punishment by fine for the criminal offence of publishing a defamatory libel.'

e Maugham LJ did not in his judgment refer to 'real' damage. I think it is clear that by 'real' damage Lord Atkin meant the damage which the plaintiff had suffered.

Yet is not the very process condemned in *Ley v Hamilton*⁵ that which it was said in *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ should be followed and that which, pursuant to *Rookes v Barnard*⁹, was followed in this case? Lord Atkin said that for the reasons he gave 'real' damage, i.e. compensatory damage, could not be ascertained and established.

f Under *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ a jury is to be directed that that which Lord Atkin said could not be done, is to be done and 'compensatory' damages assessed first. The punitive element is not something that can be added. Yet in *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ it is said that it should be added if, but only if, the compensatory damages are insufficient. Lord Atkin said that there was no analogy to punishment by a fine for a criminal libel, yet following *Rookes v Barnard*⁹, juries are to be told that punitive damages amount to a fine. I must confess my inability to reconcile the views of this House as expressed in *Ley v Hamilton*⁵ with those expressed in *Rookes v Barnard*⁹.

g Before *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ the words 'aggravated', 'punitive', 'exemplary' and 'retributory' were used indiscriminately to indicate that the damages awarded might be enhanced and might contain a punitive element. By *Rookes v Barnard*⁹ precise meanings were attached to the words 'aggravated' and 'exemplary'. Lord Devlin recognised¹⁰ that the jury could take into account the motives and conduct of the defendant where they aggravate the injury to the plaintiff.

h 'There may be [he said] malevolence or spite or the manner of committing the wrong may be such as to injure the plaintiff's proper feelings of dignity and pride. These are matters which the jury can take into account in assessing the appropriate compensation.'

j So where the injury is aggravated, an addition can be made to the compensatory damages.

5 (1935) 153 LT 384

6 [1964] 1 All ER at 413, [1964] AC at 1230

7 (1935) 153 LT at 386

8 (1934) 151 LT 360

9 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

10 [1964] 1 All ER at 407, [1964] AC at 1221

While in some cases it may be evident that malice or misconduct has added to the injury, there may be other cases where, although it is clear that there has been malice and misconduct, it cannot be said that the injury inflicted is any greater than it would have been if there had been no malice or misconduct. In such cases it would seem from *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ that the compensatory damages should not be increased. Nor, in such cases would it seem that exemplary damages as there defined could always be awarded for they are only to be awarded if the sum given in compensation is 'inadequate to punish for outrageous conduct, to mark the jury's disapproval of such conduct, and to deter a repetition'. The existence of malice may not make the defendant's conduct outrageous, and yet it is, I think, established beyond all doubt that before *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ a jury was always entitled to award larger damages than they otherwise would have given if satisfied that the libel was actuated by malice.

All the members of the Court of Appeal¹² thought that the *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ approach was wrong and in conflict with the views expressed in this House in *Ley v Hamilton*¹³. I can find no escape from that conclusion and if the choice now lies between following one or the other of those decisions, I would myself choose to follow the simpler and more flexible approach in *Ley v Hamilton*¹³. The Court of Appeal¹² also thought that there was a conflict with the decision of this House in *Hulton v Jones*¹⁴. While there are some passages in the report of that case which afford some ground for that contention, I do not think that they suffice to establish that that is so with any degree of certainty.

While, if the views I have expressed prevailed, it would not be necessary to disturb the jury's verdict as to liability, I cannot regard a direction to assess damages in accordance with *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ as a proper direction in accordance with the pre-*Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ practice and as complying with *Ley v Hamilton*¹³. So if my view were to prevail, the verdict given in this case could not be sustained and there would, if there had not been agreement by counsel that this House should in that event assess the damages, have to be a new trial limited to the assessment of damages. As my view does not prevail, it is not necessary to express an opinion on what that sum should be if this House had to assess it.

For the reasons I have stated, I would allow the appeal.

LORD WILBERFORCE. My Lords, this case must be accounted, as in many respects an unhappy one. After a trial of 17 days before a judge and jury, in which the defendants called no evidence, the plaintiff, Captain Broome, was awarded against author and publishers jointly £40,000 damages in respect of libels contained in the book 'The Destruction of Convoy PQ17'. This total sum was awarded by the jury as to £15,000 as 'compensatory' damages and as to £25,000 as 'punitive' damages. Captain Broome was awarded his costs of the trial.

An appeal was taken to the Court of Appeal¹² by both defendants. The substantial points for argument were two: (1) whether the summing-up was defective as regards the circumstances in which punitive damages may be given in addition to compensatory damages, (2) whether the damages awarded were excessive. There was also a question whether a separate award should have been made against each defendant. Since the passages in the book principally complained of reflected on the conduct of officers of the Royal Navy, in combat conditions, there was an obvious danger that the jury may have become inflamed. This made it particularly necessary that there should be a dispassionate and cool review of the sums awarded and of the summing-up in the Court of Appeal¹².

¹¹ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹² [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

¹³ (1935) 153 LT 384

¹⁴ [1910] AC 20, [1908-10] All ER Rep 29

a If matters had taken their proper and normal course these matters should have been disposed of within a few days—by dismissal of the appeal or by an order for a new trial, and no question of appeal to this House would have arisen. This did not happen. The trial had been conducted properly, and inevitably on the basis that the law to be applied as regards any claim for punitive damages was that stated by this House in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵. The learned judge considered that he was bound b by what was said in this House, as he clearly was. But in the Court of Appeal¹⁶ argument was admitted to the effect that *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵, on punitive damages, was wrong and should not be followed: the Court of Appeal¹⁶ so decided, and three judgments, separate exercises in forceful advocacy, were delivered giving their reasons.

c The course permitted and taken was doubly surprising. First, there was nothing new about *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵. It was decided in 1964; it had been followed and applied in England by the Court of Appeal itself three times since then in, amongst others, libel cases without difficulty or protest by any of the Lords Justices involved. Secondly, it was, on the view of the facts which the Court of Appeal¹⁶ took, d unnecessary for the decision of the appeal to decide whether *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵ on punitive damages was right or wrong. The Court of Appeal¹⁶, having held that it was wrong, still dismissed the appeal, and in an alternative passage held that the same result followed if it was right.

e The consequences for the present litigants have been heavy. An appeal has been brought here and argued for 13 days. Counsel for the appellants were forced into the necessity of arguing at length that *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵ is right, and this argument was answered on Captain Broome's side. A mountain of costs has piled up and it is as well that the size of this should be understood; it is open on the record.
f As shown by the order of the Court of Appeal, the plaintiff's costs at the trial have been taxed at £22,000. His costs as assessed in the Court of Appeal are £7,000. His costs in this House must exceed this figure. The taxed costs of the defendants are unlikely to be less; there will be further solicitor and own client costs on either side. It may not be unfair to put the aggregate bill, which an unsuccessful party g may have to bear, at more than £60,000. It would be entirely unfair to suggest that the whole, or even half this sum, is due to the course taken in the Court of Appeal¹⁶—the greater part flows from the inherent nature of our system. But it is necessary to say that in a legal system so extravagant and punitive as to costs as ours is in civil cases, and particularly libel actions, the addition of further burdens, and here they were certainly considerable, carries the result further into an unacceptable area of injustice. England has not the equivalent of the New South Wales Suits Fund Act 1951, nor of the Victoria Appeal Costs Fund Act 1964, so when the machinery creaks it is the private litigants who pay. I have felt deep concern about this throughout the hearing.

h My Lords, observations have already been made on other constitutional aspects of the Court of Appeal's¹⁶ judgments. I concur entirely with what has been said, and the fact that for reasons of space I abstain from using my own words does not mean that my concurrence is any the less wholehearted.

i I proceed to the principal task we have, which is to decide the present appeal. Before examining the summing-up, on which the jury's verdict was based, it is necessary to establish the law. This involves some re-examination of those parts of the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵ which relate to punitive damages. I shall consider *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁵ under three heads. First, as to the analysis it contains of damages in tort cases; secondly, as to defamation actions in relation to Lord Devlin's second category—both of these being directly relevant to the present case; thirdly, and briefly, as to the first and second categories, their inclusions and exclusions.

I deal first with that portion of the judgment which analyses damages in tort cases into 'compensatory' damages, a subhead of which is said to be 'aggravated' damages and punitive damages, because I think that this has been largely misunderstood—a misunderstanding which has fatally entered into the present case. The judgment points out that in the reported English authorities, over some 200 years, there is no clear terminology used; aggravated, exemplary, punitive, vindictive, retributory being adjectives which have been used, singly or in combination, without distinction or difference. Then it is suggested that in future there should be a clear and conscious distinction between compensatory/aggravated and punitive (or exemplary) damages, the former reflecting what the plaintiff has suffered materially or in wounded feelings, the latter the jury's (or judge's) views of the defendant's conduct. The statement of categories, in which alone punitive damages may be given, follows from this.

¹⁵ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹⁶ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

This analysis is powerful and illuminating and undoubtedly represents a valuable contribution to English judicial thought on the subject¹⁷ but it has its dangers in practical application, as the present case only too well shows. English law does not work in an analytical fashion; it has simply entrusted the fixing of damages to juries on the basis of sensible, untheoretical directions by the judge with the residual check of appeals in the case of exorbitant verdicts. That is why the terminology used is empirical and not scientific. And there is more than merely practical justification for this attitude. For particularly over the range of torts for which punitive damages may be given (trespass to person or property, false imprisonment and defamation, being the commonest) there is much to be said before one can safely assert that the true or basic principle of the law of damages in tort is compensation, or, if it is, what the compensation is for (if one says that a plaintiff is given compensation because he has been injured one is really denying the word its true meaning) or, if there is compensation, whether there is not in all cases, or at least in some, of which defamation may be an example, also a delictual element which contemplates some penalty for the defendant. It cannot lightly be taken for granted, even as a matter of theory, that the purpose of the law of tort is compensation, still less that it ought to be, an issue of large social import, or that there is something inappropriate or illogical or anomalous (a question-begging word) in including a punitive element in civil damages, or, conversely that the criminal law, rather than the civil law is in these cases the better instrument for conveying social disapproval, or for redressing a wrong to the social fabric, or that damages in any case can be broken down into the two separate elements. As a matter of practice English law has not committed itself to any of these theories; it may have been wiser than it knew.

This is not the place to argue out the general case for or against punitive damages in English law. The existence of the principle has its convinced opponents, particularly, I understand, in Scotland. The arguments against it—that it is an 'anomaly', that it brings a criminal element into the civil law without adequate safeguards, that it leads to excessive awards, an unmerited windfall for the plaintiff; these and others are by now well known; they, and the counter-arguments are well summed up in Professor Street's *Principles of the Law of Damages*¹⁸. Perhaps the opponents have, marginally, the best of it in logic but logic in excess has never been the vice of English law and I am impressed, as I think was Lord Devlin, with the fact that the principle has shown and continues to show, its vitality not only in England but in Australia, Canada and New Zealand, as well (though there are special considerations there) as in the United States of America. This is shown not only by reported cases, of which Canadian provinces, Australian states and New Zealand provide a number of modern examples¹⁹, but in the daily unreported practice of the courts. Its place in the a law has been endorsed by many eminent judges in terms which clearly recognise the punitive element. The principle of punitive damages has been recognised by the High Court of Australia on five occasions, by the Supreme Court of Canada and by the Supreme Court of the United States of America.

¹⁷ Cf in the United States Fay v Parker (1873) 53 NH 342-347 per Foster J; and as to textbook discussion Mayne and McGregor on Damages, 12th Edn (1961), Street, Principles of the Law of Damages (1962)

¹⁸ See pp 34-36

¹⁹ See as to Canada (1970) 48 Can BR 373

b To my mind the strongest argument against it is that English law already contains a heavy, indeed exorbitant, punitive element in its costs system; contrast the United States where it is the absence of this (advocate's costs not being normally recoverable) which is invoked as a justification for punitive damages. One or other must clearly be reformed, and it is Parliament alone that can do it.

c I take the discussion one step further, because the point is very relevant here. In Lord Devlin's opinion the distinction is made between aggravated damages and punitive damages; it is said that many of the authorities are really cases of aggravated damages although other words are used, that apart from the exceptional cases included in the three categories, aggravated damages are the appropriate and sufficient remedy. Although I doubt very much whether all the cases can be explained in this way—to do so seems to attribute a high degree of confusion of thought or inaccuracy of expression to judges of eminence—there is attraction in the distinction. It has the advantage, to some minds, of reducing the area of 'punitive' damages, and of bringing the remedy nearer to 'compensation'.

d But closer examination causes one to doubt whether the separation, otherwise than in analysis, of compensatory from punitive damages does not involve some real danger in practice. As Windeyer J said in *Uren's case*²⁰:

e 'What the House of Lords has now done is . . . to produce a more distinct terminology. Limiting the scope of terms that often were not distinguished in application makes possible an apparently firm distinction between aggravated compensatory damages and exemplary or punitive damages. How far the different labels denote concepts really different in effect may be debatable. I suspect that in seeking to preserve the distinction we shall sometimes find ourselves dealing more in words than ideas.'

f (Cf Salmond on Torts¹ which maintains the old 'confusion'). The distinction does not in my belief greatly correspond to what happens in reality. Take a common case: a man is assaulted, or his land is trespassed upon, with accompanying circumstances of insolence or contumely. He decides to bring an action for damages, he need not further specify the claim. Is he suing for compensation, for injury to his feelings, to teach his opponent a lesson, to vindicate his rights, or 'the strength of the law', or for a mixture of these things? Most men would not ask themselves such questions, many men could not answer them. If they could answer them, they might give different answers. The reaction to a libel may be anything from 'how outrageous' to 'he has delivered himself into my hands'. The fact is that the plaintiff sues for damages, inviting the court to take all the facts into consideration, and, if he wins, he may ascribe his victory to all or any of the ingredients.

h As, again, Windeyer J has said², the amount of the verdict is the product of a mixture of inextricable considerations. Sedgwick³ said:

j 'Where either of these elements [sc malice, oppression etc] mingle in the controversy, the law, instead of adhering to the system, or even the language of compensation adopts a wholly different rule. It permits the jury to give what it terms punitive, vindictive or exemplary damages, in other words, it blends together the interests of society and of the aggrieved individual and gives

20 (1967) 117 CLR at 152

1 (1969) 15th Edn

2 (1967) 117 CLR at 150

3 Measure of Damages, 3rd Edn (1858) damages not only to recompense the sufferer but to punish the offender. This rule . . . seems settled in England and in general jurisprudence of [U.S.A.].'

Lord Atkin said just this in *Ley v Hamilton*⁴ in a passage (cited in other opinions, vide that of Viscount Dilhorne) which, if any in modern times, is clear and authoritative. Dixon J endorsed the principle—see citation below⁵—as did the key passage in Halsbury's Laws of England⁶ cited by Lord Hailsham LC. To segregate the punitive element is to split the indivisible and to invite the stock criticism (vide *Street*⁷) that civil courts have no business to impose fines.

This is of critical importance in practice. If the separation of damages into compensatory/aggravated and punitive is carried through into the instruction to the jury, there is the greatest possible risk of excessive awards, through counting twice what is but a different facet of the same bad conduct. Lord Devlin himself clearly understood this; the careful passage⁸ containing the 'if but only if' prescription, provided his antidote—an effective one if judges can administer it in a timely and effective way.

My Lords, I think there was much merit in what I understand was the older system, before *Rookes v Barnard*⁹. I agree with the Court of Appeal¹⁰ that in substance, although not perhaps philosophically or linguistically, this was clear and as explained above I doubt if there was any confusion as to what the jury should do. It was to direct the jury in general terms to give a single sum taking the various elements, or such of them as might exist in the case, into account including the wounded feelings of the plaintiff and the conduct of the defendant, but warning them not to double count and to be moderate. A formula on these lines commended itself to Dixon J in 1932. What amount of damages, he asked⁵—

'is enough to serve at once as a solatium, vindication and compensation to him and a requital to the wrongdoer . . .'.

An earlier example is the direction of Abbott J in *Sears v Lyons*¹¹: as evidence that modern practice corresponds I could not desire more than the passage, based on considerable experience, in the judgment of Salmon LJ in this case¹² cited in full by Viscount Dilhorne and which I need not repeat. If judges were to act in this way, and direct substantially as Salmon LJ describes, I would see no basis for ascribing to them any error in law. If, on the other hand, use were to be made of the aggravated-punitive distinction, I would think that it is even more necessary that the jury should be directed to give a single sum (Lord Devlin's exception to avoid a new trial is entirely laudable, but, I respectfully think, risky). The direction to give a single sum should mean (the necessity to say this illustrates again the dangers of the terminology) not merely producing a single figure by way of verdict, but arriving in their discussion at a single sum. It would be wrong, and a novelty in the law, that they should, in the jury room, find separately the various elements—pure compensation, aggravated compensation and penalty and add them up to a total. In no previous cited case, except in *Loudon v Ryder*¹³ (overruled by Lord Devlin himself), was this done; it was directly discountenanced by Lord Atkin in *Ley v Hamilton*¹⁴.

4 (1935) 153 LT 384

5 Smith's Newspapers Ltd v Becker (1932) 47 CLR 279 at 300

6 11 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 223, para 391

7 Principles of the Law of Damages (1962), pp 34, 35

8 [1964] 1 All ER at 414, [1964] AC at 1232

9 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

10 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

11 (1818) 2 Stark 317

12 [1971] 2 All ER at 205, [1971] 2 WLR at 876, 877

13 [1953] 1 All ER 741, [1953] 2 QB 202

14 (1935) 153 LT 384 at 386

I regret that this rather lengthy analysis has been necessary before I deal with the present appeal, but in my view it is fundamental to a consideration of the summing-up.

The full account of the trial which has been given in previous opinions enables me to summarise. The critical stages were these: (1) the jury were told that there were two aspects of damages, compensatory and punitive. They were asked first to consider compensatory damages. They had read to them a passage from the judgment of Pearson LJ in *McCarey v Associated Newspapers Ltd*¹⁵ in which it was said in clear terms that if there had been any high-handed, oppressive or contumelious behaviour which increased the mental pain and suffering caused by the defamation, this might be taken into account. (2) The judge then pointed out that Captain Broome had suffered no actual pecuniary loss; that he had not been shunned by his comrades; that the trial had been conducted without exacerbation; but that what was said in the book might be very wounding to his feelings. (3) The learned judge then dealt with punitive damages by reference to the second category in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶, cited the words of Widgery J in *Manson v Associated Newspapers Ltd*¹⁷, and said:

‘... you are being asked here not only to give Captain Broome compensatory damages, that is, a reasonable sum for the injury to his reputation and the exacerbation of his feelings; but in addition to fine [the appellants] and Mr. Irving for having done what they have done . . . you are really in the position of a Judge or a Magistrate trying a criminal case; you have got, so to speak, to fine the Defendant.’ [Emphasis supplied.]

and he gives examples of reasonable and unreasonable fines. Later he gives lengthy directions relevant to the second category (was there a calculation of profit etc) and on the next day returns finally to damages. (4) The final direction as to damages consisted of the statement of questions for the jury and explanation of them. The first question (no 3) is ‘What compensatory damages to you award the plaintiff?’ The summing-up continues:

‘Then having decided what are the proper additional [sic] compensatory damages you will go on and consider the fourth question, namely, “Has the plaintiff proved that he is entitled to exemplary damages?” [and directs the jury to consider this in relation separately to each defendant. Lastly there is this passage:] Then you see the last question under this heading, “What additional sum should be awarded him by way of exemplary damages?”. Would you be good enough to underline the word “additional”, because I want to know, and learned counsel want to know, if you do decide to award punitive damages, how much more do you award over and above the compensatory damage.’

The result of this was an award of £15,000 compensatory damages and £25,000 as an additional sum for exemplary damages.

My Lords, I regret to have reached the conclusion that this verdict ought not to stand. Apart from the reasons given by my noble and learned friend, Lord Diplock, with which I respectfully agree, I think for myself that the separation of the element of compensatory damages from that of punitive damages, brought about through the interpretation placed on the second category and the application of it, involving, as it did, the need to fix compensation (plus aggravation) first, see if the case came within the category, and then fix a separate punitive sum, is fundamentally wrong. It has brought about precisely the result which was to be feared from breaking down the indivisible whole, namely, of fixing a compensation figure swollen by aggravation and then adding a fine on top—a fine in this case exceeding greatly the aggravated compensation. If the matter rested on the figures alone, I should find the greatest difficulty in supporting, even with all the inhibitions properly felt against substituting a judicial opinion for that of the jury, so large a punitive element, particularly in a case such as this where the libel was considered to be (I say nothing as to my own opinion) of a most wounding character, so that the 'compensatory' damages must necessarily include a large 'punitive' element. But when it is seen how the jury were directed to calculate, and the direction was certainly clear and certainly and visibly acted on, their figures become impossible to accept.

¹⁵ [1964] 3 All ER 947 at 957, 958, [1965] 2 QB 86 at 104, 105

¹⁶ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹⁷ [1965] 2 All ER 954 at 958, [1965] 1 WLR 1038 at 1043

In argument the issue was put in the form whether the judge's direction complied with Lord Devlin's 'if, but only if' advice¹⁸. I think that it certainly did not. The dangers of separating the compartments (compensatory damages and punitive damages) in so watertight a way are so great, as I have tried to explain, indeed, in my opinion, so wrong in principle that I doubt very much whether any instructions, in a difficult case, could avoid them. That is why I think that any interpretation placed on *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁹ which requires this separation, or authorises it, and the introduction of the profit gateway which almost compels it, ought to be discarded. But however that may be, the directions given fall far short of what was necessary—I say this without any criticism of the learned judge who was merely following *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁹ as previously applied by the Court of Appeal. When all is said the warning to the jury against the danger was contained in the word 'additional' in question 4. I think this was not enough, for they had been told that they could inflict a fine.

For these reasons, without committing myself to any particular figure if we were called on to substitute one, I agree with the conclusion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Diplock, as to the necessity for a new trial on the question of punitive damages.

I must add one other point. This is the question of a joint award of damages against two wrongdoers, publisher and author. There is no doubt that the existing law is ill adapted to deal fairly with a case where 'guilt' of joint defendants is unequal. But it is clear enough what the law is; it is stated by Lord Hailsham LC in terms which I need not repeat. In the Court of Appeal²⁰ Lord Denning MR said that the jury were free to decide whether to fix punitive damages at the highest figure, the lowest figure, or at a figure between the two and I fear that the jury may well have proceeded on this somewhat libertarian view of the law. One may escape from the conclusion that this vitiates the verdict by assuming that the two defendants were equally 'guilty', but I am not prepared to make this assumption or to ascribe a view to that effect to the jury. I think that the jury must have been, at best, confused, at worst misled by the direction, and I cannot accept that acquiescence by counsel validates the defect.

I must now deal as briefly as I can with other aspects of the judgment in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁹. I deal first with its effect on the law of damages for defamation.

I am far from convinced that Lord Devlin ever intended to alter the law as to damages for defamation or intended to limit punitive damages in defamation actions to cases where a 'profit motive' is shown. (I use this compendiously for the formula in his second category.) I summarise the reasons: (a) Defamation is normally thought of as par excellence the tort when punitive damages may be claimed. It was so presented in argument by counsel for Captain Broome (arguing against punitive damages) and he was an acknowledged expert in the subject. Every practitioner and every judge would take this view. (b) Lord Devlin's passage where he sets up his second category does not refer to any defamation case, but to three other miscellaneous cases which he illuminatingly bases on the profit motive. He makes merely an incidental reference to libel where he says the profit motive is always a factor, not, it should be observed, a condition. (c) It is difficult to believe that Lord Devlin was a intending to limit the scope of punitive damages in defamation actions so as to exclude highly malicious or irresponsible libels. At least if he intended to do so at a time when the media of communication are more powerful than they have ever been and certainly not motivated only by a desire to make money, and since elsewhere the judgment shows him conscious of the need to sanction the irresponsible, malicious or oppressive use of power, I would have expected some reasons to be given.

¹⁸ [1964] 1 All ER at 411, [1964] AC at 1228

¹⁹ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

²⁰ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

b If we cannot interpret his judgment as leaving libel outside category 2 as a separate case, well known to everyone, in which punitive damages may be given in familiar circumstances and as stating category 2 as a qualification for other cases, hitherto not explained or rationalised, then since the disposal of defamation actions was there dealt with briefly, I would say incidentally, and obiter, I consider that in this case where we are directly concerned with such an action we should disagree with it.

c This would leave the law as I understand it to be in Australia and Canada, countries where, in this respect, there is not known to me to be any such difference in 'social conditions' as to call for the recognition, by this House, judicially, of a divergent law. If changes are to be made, they should be made, after proper investigation, by Parliament.

d I would add, with reference to this point, that the present case well illustrates the irrationality of the supposed new principle. For if the profit motive is essential for the recovery of punitive damages, one would expect the damages given to bear some relation to the supposed profit and/or to the means of the offender; the idea (if there is any logic in the requirement) must be to take the profit out of wrongdoing. Yet there was not, and in many such cases cannot be, any real consideration of the likely profit or of the offender's means. There was no evidence what these might be and the jury were given no guidance. How, then, could the punitive £25,000 be other than an arbitrary guess? If one replies that it represents the jury's view of the defendants' conduct (as it probably did) what purpose is served by introducing the profit motive gateway?

e Finally, as to other torts as to which, before *Rookes v Barnard*¹, punitive damages could be given but on which some restriction is evidently intended to be placed by the judgment. That this House, as a matter of law, or of legal policy, was entitled to restrict the scope of punitive damages I have, with all respect to the Court of Appeal², no doubt and, whatever my own reservations as to the wisdom of the policy, I should feel myself obliged to accept a new statement of principle if it were clear, consistent and workable and intelligibly related to the main stream of authority. That it was not entirely clear, appears well enough from the opinions in the present case; and I cannot entirely blame the Court of Appeal² for attempting to escape from it, just as one may sympathise with a customer when he finds his new suit almost at once requiring alteration, or patching, for putting it aside and reaching for his old tweeds. There is not perhaps much difficulty about category 1; it is well based on the cases and on a principle stated in 1703—'if public officers will infringe men's rights, they ought to pay greater damages than other men to deter and hinder others from the like offences' (*Ashby v White*³ per Holt CJ). Excessive and insolent use of power is certainly something against which citizens require as much protection today; a wide interpretation of 'government' which I understand your Lordships to endorse would correspond with Holt CJ's 'public officers' and would partly correspond with modern needs. There would remain, even on the most liberal interpretation, a number of difficulties and inconsistencies as pointed out by Taylor J in *Uren's case*⁴.

j I have more difficulty with the commonplace types of trespass or assault accompanied by insult or contumely, which, even more than 'first category' cases touch

1 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

2 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

3 (1703) 2 Ld Raym 938 at 956

4 (1967) 117 CLR 118

the life of ordinary men and occupy the county courts. Although Lord Devlin studiously refrains from overruling earlier cases (other than *Loudon v Ryder*⁵) which undoubtedly proceeded on, or contained, a punitive element, his opinion has been understood as laying down that in future such cases cannot, unless the 'profit motive' is present, be treated as cases for punitive damages but only as cases for aggravated damages. The phrase used has been 'aggravated damages can do the work of punitive damages'.

I understand that a majority of your Lordships, for possibly differing reasons, are satisfied with this so it will remain the law in this country. But, if only in fairness to the Court of Appeal⁶ with whose approach to this matter I agree, I must state very briefly why I feel some difficulty.

I am far from clear how juries, or judges, are intended to act in the future. Are they to take it that the law has been changed, so that (absent a profit motive) only 'compensatory' damages can be given, plus an element for 'aggravation' if that is proved? I fear that there will be difficulty in seeing how far earlier cases, or Commonwealth cases, are now authority and that there will be much argument whether a particular case was one of 'aggravated' or 'punitive' damages or of both. Alternatively, if 'aggravated damages' are 'to do the work of punitive damages' and if it is to be supposed that juries, or judges, will continue giving damages much as before, then nothing has been gained by changing the label and we are indulging in make belief and encouraging fictional pleading. The whole point is well brought out by Pearson LJ in *McCarey v Associated Newspapers Ltd*⁷: 'if the compensatory principles is accepted, punitive damages must not be allowed to creep back into the assessment in some other guise'. I must confess to sympathy with the Court of Appeal's⁶ preference for the older system and with the objections to the new stated by Taylor J in *Uren's case*⁸, the weight of which clearly impressed the Privy Council. Their validity has been endorsed by cases post-*Rookes v Barnard*⁹ in Australia, Canada and New Zealand. I share their doubt whether we have yet arrived at a viable substitute. But I note with satisfaction and agreement the opinion expressed by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that the relevant passage in Lord Devlin's judgment, which he cites, should be read sensibly as a whole together with the authorities on which it is based. This may provide a sound basis for redevelopment of the law.

My Lords, on all other points not expressly dealt with in this opinion I wish to express my concurrence with that of Lord Hailsham LC. I regret to differ from him in thinking that the appeal should be allowed on the grounds which I have stated.

LORD DIPLOCK. My Lords, the trial of this action proceeded, correctly, on the basis that as respects the measure of the damages which the jury might award, the judge was bound to direct them in accordance with the law as laid down by this House in Lord Devlin's speech in *Rookes v Barnard*⁹.

I agree with all your Lordships that there was material on which the jury were entitled to find that the conduct of each of the defendants brought the case within Lord Devlin's second category of cases in which exemplary or, as I would have preferred to call them, punitive damages may be awarded. The jury did so find by special verdicts. That part of the judge's summing-up in which he directed them as to the matters for their consideration in arriving at their findings on this issue as respects each of the defendants cannot be faulted.

It was, however, also incumbent on the judge to instruct the jury as to the measure of the damages which they might award if they reached the conclusion that the case as against each of the defendants was one in which they were not precluded from

5 [1953] 1 All ER 741, [1953] 2 QB 202

6 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

7 [1965] 2 QB at 105, cf [1964] 3 All ER at 957

8 (1967) 117 CLR 118

9 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

a awarding punitive damages. On this aspect of the case there were two principles of law which should have been stated clearly to the jury. Neither was self-evident. The first was that, even if the jury found that the case came within Lord Devlin's second category and that the defendants' conduct merited punishment, it did not necessarily follow that they must award as damages to Captain Broome a greater sum than was sufficient to compensate him for all the harm and humiliation that he had suffered as a consequence of the defendants' tortious acts. They should take into account as part of the punishment inflicted on the defendants any sum (in the result b £15,000) which they were minded to award to Captain Broome as compensatory damages; and only if they thought that sum to be inadequate in itself to constitute sufficient punishment were they to award such additional sum as would, when added to the compensatory damages, amount to an appropriate penalty for the defendants' improper conduct. The second was that if the jury thought that the conduct of one c of the joint defendants deserved to be penalised by a lesser sum than the conduct of the other, the most that the jury were entitled to award against the defendants was that lesser sum, if it were to exceed the amount which they were minded to award as compensatory damages.

d I have the misfortune to differ from the majority of your Lordships in that I find it impossible to discover in the language of the summing-up any clear statement of either of these principles. At best I think that when the jury retired they must have been confused as to how the punitive damages, if any, were to be assessed. At worst I think that they may well have thought that they were to arrive at a sum which they thought was an appropriate penalty for the defendants' conduct and to add it to any sum awarded as compensatory damages.

e My Lords, I do not think that on this vital question of the assessment of exemplary damages the jury were adequately directed. I am fortified in this view by my conviction that, if properly directed, no reasonable jury could possibly have reached the conclusion that the appropriate penalty to inflict on the less culpable of the defendants was £40,000 for publishing a libel of which the victim was in their view adequately recompensed at £15,000 for all the harm and humiliation that it had caused to him.

f A penalty of £40,000 is, I believe, very much larger than any of your Lordships would have thought it appropriate to inflict on the defendants. I doubt if any of your Lordships would have hesitated to interfere with it if it had been awarded by a judge sitting alone. He would have been vulnerable because he would have given his reasons. Shibboleths apart, there survive today two valid reasons why an appellate court should be more reluctant to disturb an assessment of damages by a jury than an assessment by a judge. The first is applicable to all kinds of actions. It is that a g judge articulates his findings on the evidence and his reasoning, whereas a jury state the result of their findings and their reasoning but otherwise are dumb. In considering whether an award of damages by a jury is excessive an appellate court cannot do other than assume that the jury made every finding of fact and drew every inference that was open to it on the evidence as favourably as possible to the plaintiff and as adversely as possible to the defendant. In the instant case, however, this handicap h to an appellate's court ability to do justice is palliated by the facts; that there was no conflict of evidence for them to resolve—for the defendants called none, and that the jury were given a partial gift of speech. By their special verdict this House has been told that they considered that the plaintiff would be fully compensated by £15,000. The second reason for reluctance to interfere with a jury's award of damages applies particularly to actions for defamation. It is that, unless the parties otherwise agree, j the consequence of setting aside the jury's verdict must be a new trial before another jury. This involves the parties, through no fault of their own, in greatly increased costs which, particularly in libel actions, are, to the discredit of our legal system, out of all proportion even to the large compensatory damages awarded in the instant case. For my part, I should not be deflected from setting aside a jury's verdict as unreasonable by the fear, sometimes expressed by appellate judges, that another unreasonable jury might make a similar unreasonable award of damages on the new trial. So far as I know this has never happened yet. But the consideration of the costs involved is one which it would be unrealistic and unjust to ignore. In the instant case, however, the parties agreed that this House should assess the damages in the event of the jury's verdict being set aside. No more costs would be incurred if the appeal were allowed than if it were dismissed—although the incidence of them on the parties might be different.

It may be said, and not implausibly, that there is nothing in the training or experience of a judge which makes him fitter than a jury to determine the pecuniary compensation which a plaintiff should receive for a reputation that is damaged or feelings that are hurt. And there may be safety in numbers. But it runs counter to the basis of our criminal law, in which the jury determine guilt and the judge determines the appropriate punishment, to treat the jury as better qualified than a judge to assess the pecuniary penalty which a defendant ought to pay for conduct which merits punishment. On an appeal from the jury's award of £40,000 which I know to be compensatory to the extent of £15,000 only, I should approach it in the same way as I should approach a fine of £40,000 imposed by a judge in a criminal prosecution. Even if I thought the jury had been given an adequate direction by the judge, I would have set the award aside and substituted an award of £20,000.

I have thought it right to express my own minority opinion as to what the result of this appeal should be. It is that with which the parties are primarily concerned—and it is they who are paying for it. It is, however, inherent in our legal system that owing to the manner in which the Court of Appeal¹⁰ dealt with the instant case, the unsuccessful party is also paying for the ruling of this House on two questions of law of much more general importance. The first is as to the effect of the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ on the assessment of damages for defamation and whether that decision ought to be followed. The second is as to the propriety of the manner in which the Court of Appeal¹⁰, as an intermediate appellate court, dealt with the decision of this House in *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹. To these two topics I now turn.

In *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ the plaintiff's claim was for damages for the tort of intimidation. At the trial the judge had summed up to the jury in terms which left it open to them to award exemplary damages. There was a cross-appeal against the amount of damages, on which this House heard separate and lengthy argument. It was necessary as a matter of decision of the cross-appeal for this House to determine whether the facts in *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ brought it within a category of cases in which exemplary damages were recoverable at common law. This House determined that they did not and ordered a new trial. There were two different processes of reasoning by which it would have been possible to reach this conclusion of law. One, which was not adopted by this House, was to hold that the particular tort of intimidation was one in which the common law did not permit of exemplary damages. The other, which was adopted by this House, was to state the categories of cases in which alone exemplary damages might be awarded at common law and to determine whether the facts in *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹ brought it within one of these categories.

Lord Devlin's speech on the cross-appeal in *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹, in which all the five members who heard the appeal explicitly concurred, was a deliberate attempt by this House to do two things: (a) as a matter of legal exposition, to formulate the rationale of the assessment of damages for torts in which damages are 'at large'; (b) as a matter of legal policy, to restrict the categories of cases in which damages can be awarded against a defendant in order to punish him, to those in which this method of inflicting punishment still serves some rational social purpose today. Lord Devlin's speech, however, does not follow the simple arrangement of exposition followed by choice of policy. He starts by formulating three heads of damages. The purpose of two of them is to compensate the plaintiff; that of the third is to a punish the defendant. This formulation is followed by an analysis of the previous authorities. These authorities lead to the policy decision to accept two categories of cases in which exemplary damages may be recovered and, proleptically, to reject other categories of cases in which it had previously been thought that damages might be awarded in order to punish the defendant. He then reverts to exposition of some considerations which follow from the purpose served by exemplary damages and b which should be borne in mind when awards of exemplary damages are made. Finally he reverts to an analysis of the previous authorities for the purpose of completing the policy decision by overruling those which were authority for the award of exemplary damages where the injury to the plaintiff had been aggravated by malice or by the manner of doing the injury, that is, the insolence or arrogance by which it was accompanied. It is, however, convenient for the purposes of the instant c appeal to deal with exposition and with policy separately.

¹⁰ [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853

¹¹ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

The three heads under which damages are recoverable for those torts for which damages are 'at large' are classified under the following heads. (1) Compensation for the harm caused to the plaintiff by the wrongful physical act of the defendant in respect of which the action is brought. In addition to any pecuniary loss specifically proved the assessment of this compensation may itself involve putting a money value d on physical hurt, as in assault; on curtailment of liberty, as in false imprisonment or malicious prosecution; on injury to reputation, as in defamation, false imprisonment and malicious prosecution; on inconvenience or disturbance of the even tenor of life, as in many torts, including intimidation. (2) Additional compensation for the injured feelings of the plaintiff where his sense of injury resulting from the wrongful physical act is justifiably heightened by the manner in which or motive for which the defendant did it. This Lord Devlin calls 'aggravated damages'. (3) Punishment of the e defendant for his anti-social behaviour to the plaintiff. This Lord Devlin calls 'exemplary damages'. I should have preferred the alternative expression 'punitive damages' to emphasise the fact that their object is not to compensate the plaintiff but to punish the defendant and to deter him, and perhaps others, from committing similar torts. To avoid confusion I have, however, accepted the lead of Lord f Hailsham LC in adhering to Lord Devlin's adjective 'exemplary'.

It may seem remarkable that there had not previously been any judicial analysis, even as elementary as this, of the constituent elements of the compound 'damages at large'. But it has to be remembered that at common law the assessment of damages was the exclusive function of a jury, and, despite growing exceptions from the mid-nineteenth century onwards, nearly all actions for torts in which damages were at g large were tried by jury until after 1933. The assessment of damages was an arcanum of the jury box into which judges hesitated to peer; and it does not appear to have been their practice to give any direction to the jury as to how they should arrive at the amount of damages they should award, beyond some general exhortation to do their best in a matter which was peculiarly within their sphere.

What is disclosed by an examination of previous judgments since the 18th h century, given on applications for a new trial on the grounds that the award of a jury was too large or too small, is a confusion of language and consequently of thought as to what were the constituent elements in an award of damages at large. In particular there is a complete failure to distinguish between aggravated and exemplary damages in cases where the malice of the defendant or the manner in which he did the wrongful act had both increased the injury to the plaintiff's feelings and aroused the i indignation of the jury themselves.

In addition to the cases specifically referred to by Lord Devlin in *Rookes v Barnard*¹² your Lordships have been referred to many others in the course of the argument in the instant appeal. They serve but to confirm the confused state of the law on this subject before 1964.

The tort of defamation, to which Lord Devlin made only a passing reference in *Rookes v Barnard*¹³, has special characteristics which may make it difficult to allocate compensatory damages between head (1) and head (2). The harm caused to the plaintiff by the publication of a libel on him often lies more in his own feelings, what he thinks other people are thinking of him, than in any actual change made manifest in their attitude towards him. A solatium for injured feelings, however innocent the publication by the defendant may have been, forms a large element in the damages under head (1) itself even in cases in which there are no grounds for 'aggravated damages' under head (2). Again the harm done by the publication, for which damages are recoverable under head (1) does not come to an end when the publication is made. As Lord Atkin said in *Ley v Hamilton*¹⁴, 'It is impossible to track the scandal, to know what quarters the poison may reach'. So long as its withdrawal is not communicated to all those whom it has reached it may continue to spread. I venture to think that this is the rationale of the undoubted rule that persistence by the defendant in a plea of justification or a repetition of the original libel by him at the trial can increase the damages. By doing so he prolongs the period in which the damage from the original publication continues to spread and by giving to it further publicity at the trial, as in *Ley v Hamilton*¹⁵, extends the quarters that the poison reaches. The defendant's conduct between the date of publication and the conclusion of the trial may thus increase the damages under head (1). In this sense it may be said to 'aggravate' the damages recoverable as, conversely, the publication of an apology may 'mitigate' them. But this is not 'aggravated damages' in the sense that that expression was used by Lord Devlin in head (2). On the other hand, the defendant's conduct after the publication may also afford cogent evidence of his malice in the original publication of the libel and thus evidence on which 'aggravated damages' may be awarded under head (2) in addition to damages under head (1). But although considerations such as these may blur the edges of the boundary between compensatory damages under head (1) and compensatory damages under head (2) in the case of defamation, they do not affect the clear distinction between the concept of compensatory damages and the concept of exemplary damages under head (3).

My Lords, the major clarification of legal reasoning to be found in the expository part of Lord Devlin's speech in *Rookes v Barnard*¹³ was the recognition, first, that the award of a single sum of money as damages for tort, while it must always perform the function of giving to the plaintiff what he deserves to receive to compensate him fully for the harm done to him by the defendant, may in appropriate cases also perform the quite different function of fining the defendant what he deserves to pay by way of punishment; and, secondly, that even in those appropriate cases, it is only if what the defendant deserves to pay as punishment exceeds what the plaintiff deserves to receive as compensation, that the plaintiff can be also awarded the amount of the excess. This is a windfall which he receives because the case happens to be one in which exemplary damages may be awarded.

It is not necessary to dwell on the three considerations which Lord Devlin referred to as arising from the nature and function of punitive damages. The first consideration qualifies the categories of cases in which exemplary damages may be awarded. The plaintiff must himself have been the victim of the conduct of the defendant which merits punishment; he can only profit from the windfall if the wind was blowing his way. The second consideration is relevant to the attitude of an appellate court to a jury's assessment of exemplary damages. I have already taken it into account in forming my conclusion that the jury's award of £40,000 ought to be set aside. The third conclusion relates to the relevance of the defendant's means to any assessment of punitive damages in excess of the amount required to compensate a the plaintiff. These three considerations are followed by the crucial exposition of the way in which a jury should be directed in a case in which it is open to them to award punitive damages. I have already dealt with this in the first criticism which I have made of the summing-up at the trial in the instant case.

¹³ [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹⁴ (1935) 153 LT 384 at 386

¹⁵ (1935) 153 LT 384

b It should perhaps be pointed out that Lord Devlin did not suggest that in a case which clearly came within a category which justified an award of exemplary damages the jury should be invited to make separate awards in respect of the compensatory and the punitive element, although no doubt a judge sitting alone should do so. It was only in cases where it might be doubtful whether exemplary damages were permissible that he suggested that special verdicts splitting the total award might serve a useful purpose in avoiding the necessity of a new trial in the event of appeal.

c It has not been contended that those parts of Lord Devlin's speech which expounded the rationale of the award and the assessment of exemplary damages in those cases in which they could be recovered did not serve a useful purpose which lay well within the functions of this House in its judicial capacity. It brought some order out of chaos, some light and reason into what was previously a dark and emotive branch of the common law. What has been criticised is the decision of legal policy to restrict the categories of cases in which exemplary damages may be awarded.

d If the common law stood still while mankind moved on, your Lordships might still be awarding bot and wer to litigants whose kinsmen thought the feud to be outmoded—though you could not have done so to the plaintiff in the instant appeal, because defamation would never have become a cause of action. The common law would not have survived in any of those countries which have adopted it, if it did not reflect the changing norms of the particular society of which it is the basic legal system. It has survived because the common law subsumes a power in judges to adapt its rules to the changing needs of contemporary society—to discard those which have outlived their usefulness, to develop new rules to meet new situations. As the supreme appellate tribunal of England, your Lordships have the duty, when occasion offers, to supervise the exercise of this power by English courts. Other supreme appellate tribunals exercise a similar function in other countries which have inherited the English common law at various times in the past. Despite the unifying effect of that inheritance on the concept of man's legal duty to his neighbour, it does not follow that the development of the social norms in each of the inheritor countries has been identical or will become so. I do not think that your Lordships should be deflected from your function of developing the common law of England and discarding judge-made rules which have outlived their purpose and are contrary to contemporary concepts of penal justice in England, by the consideration that other courts in other countries do not yet regard an identical development as appropriate to the particular society in which they perform a corresponding function. The fact that the courts of Australia, of New Zealand and of several of the common law provinces of Canada have failed to adopt the same policy decision on exemplary damages as this House did for England in *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁶ affords a cogent reason for re-examining it; but not for rejecting it if, as I think to be the case, re-examination confirms that the decision was a step in the right direction—although it may not have gone as far as could be justified.

e
f
g
h i The award of damages as the remedy for all civil wrongs was in England the creature of the common law. It is a field of law in which there has been but little intervention by Parliament. It is judge-made law par excellence. Its original purpose in cases of trespass was to discourage private revenge in a primitive society inadequately policed, at least as much as it was to compensate the victim for the material harm occasioned to him. Even as late as 1814 Heath J felt able to say¹⁷:

'It goes to prevent the practice of duelling if juries are permitted to punish insult by exemplary damages.'

16 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

17 Merest v Harvey (1814) 5 Taunt 442 at 444, [1814-23] All ER Rep 454 at 455

No one would today suggest this as a justification for rewarding the victim of a tort for refraining from unlawful vengeance on the wrongdoer. Conversely, the punishment of wrongdoers today is regarded as the function of the state to be exercised subject to safeguards for the accused assured to him by the procedure of the criminal law and with the appropriate punishment assessed by a dispassionate judge and not by a jury roused to indignation by partisan advocacy. One of the most significant and humane developments in English law over the past century and a half has been the increasing protection accorded to the accused under our system of criminal justice. As my noble and learned friend Lord Reid has pointed out no similar protection is available to a defendant as a party to a civil action.

So the survival into the latter half of the 20th century of the power of a jury in a civil trial to impose a penalty on a defendant simply to punish him had become an anomaly which it lay within the power of this House in its judicial capacity to restrict or to remove; though it would have been anticipating by two years the recent change in the practice of this House if to have done so would have involved overruling one of its own previous decisions.

Lord Devlin's analysis of previous decisions disclosed three kinds of cases in which the courts had recognised the right of a jury to award damages by way of punishment of the defendant in excess of what was sufficient to compensate the plaintiff for all the harm occasioned to him. The categorisation was new. Its purpose has, I think, been misunderstood. No one suggests that judges, when approving awards of exemplary damages in particular cases in the past consciously differentiated between one kind of case in which exemplary damages could be awarded and another. They dealt with them all as falling within a single nebulous class of cases in which the defendant's conduct was such as to merit punishment. The purpose of Lord Devlin's division of them into three categories was in order to distinguish between factual situations in which there was some special reason still relevant in modern social conditions for retaining the power to award exemplary damages, and factual situations in which no such special reason still survived.

With this end in view Lord Devlin extracted from the single nebulous class which appeared to be all that had been consciously recognised as justifying an award of exemplary damages at common law, two categories of cases in which this House decided that there were special reasons why the power to award exemplary damages should be retained. These two (apart from cases where exemplary damages are authorised by statute) are generally referred to as 'the categories'. But there is also to be found in the previous cases a third category, consisting of the remainder of the single nebulous class in which this House decided that the anomalous practice of awarding exemplary damages in civil proceedings ought to be discontinued.

The first category comprised cases of abuse of an official position of authority. This would seem to be analogous to the civil law concept of détournement de pouvoir, with the limitation that it must involve the commission of an act which would be tortious if done by a private individual. The cases cited are 200 years old. It would not appear that the actual conduct of the defendant himself need justify an award of aggravated damages. In *Huckle v Money*¹⁷ the defendant appears to have treated the plaintiff with courtesy and consideration. The servant was the whipping-boy for the political head of the government. Nor need he have known that his act was wrongful. Mr Money, a mere subordinate official, can hardly have been expected to know that general warrants issued by the Secretary of State were illegal. In *Wilkes v Wood*¹⁸, however, it was said that a belief that the act impugned was lawful could be pleaded in mitigation of damages.

The second category was of cases where an act known to be tortious was committed in the belief that the material advantages to be gained by doing so would outweigh any compensatory damages which the defendant would be likely to have to pay to the plaintiff. This would seem to be analogous to the civil law concept of enriches-

a ment induce subject to a similar limitation that the act resulting in enrichment must be tortious. The cases cited by Lord Devlin do not include underground trespass to minerals, which provide the classic examples in the 19th century of this category of tort. There is high authority both in this House (*Livingstone v Rawyards Coal Co*¹⁹) and in the Privy Council (*Bulli Coal Mining Co v Osborne*²⁰) that in the case of wilful clandestine trespass to minerals the damages may be assessed at the market value of the minerals without deduction for the cost of working—an award which would exceed both the loss to the plaintiff and the profit to the defendant from his wrongful act. The excess is punishment.

b The third—and rejected—category is numerically by far the largest. It consists of cases in which the manner in which the tort has been committed has attracted a whole gamut of dyslogistic judicial epithets such as wilful, wanton, high-handed, oppressive, malicious, outrageous; particularly those where the defendant's manner of doing the tortious act has been characterised by arrogance or insolence or, in the preferred Australian phrase, a contumelious disregard of the plaintiff's rights. These are nearly all cases in which 'aggravated damages' by way of compensation apart from punishment can be awarded and much of the previous confusion about exemplary damages stems from this.

c Apart from this confusion or perhaps because of it, I do not doubt that it was the general understanding of English judges and of those who practised in the English courts that exemplary damages by way of punishment of the defendant as well as aggravated damages by way of compensation of the plaintiff could be awarded in cases which fall within the third category. Lord Devlin's speech in *Rookes v Barnard*¹ explicitly acknowledges this. It was an understanding which he himself had shared. He had given effect to it in his own summing-up in *Loudon v Ryder*².

d The decision of legal policy which this House made in *Rookes v Barnard*¹ was to retain the first two categories and to discard the third as obsolete.

e In describing the two categories retained I have deliberately departed from the ipsissima verba of Lord Devlin's description of them. His statement of the categories was not intended as a definition to be construed as if it were enacted law. They were retained because this House considered that there were circumstances in which a power to award exemplary damages still served a useful social purpose and the descriptive words must be understood in the light of the social purpose which they were designed to serve.

f My Lords, had I been party to the decision in *Rookes v Barnard*¹ I doubt if I should have considered it still necessary to retain the first category. The common law weapons to curb abuse of power by the executive had not been forged by the mid-eighteenth century. In view of the developments, particularly in the last 20 years, in adapting the old remedies by prerogative writ and declaratory action to check unlawful abuse of power by the executive, the award of exemplary damages in civil actions for tort against individual government servants seems a blunt instrument to use for this purpose today. But if it to be retained—a question which cannot arise in the instant appeal—the reasoning which supports its retention would not confine it to torts committed by servants of central government alone. It would embrace all persons purporting to exercise powers of government, central or local, conferred on them by statute or at common law by virtue of the official status or employment which they held.

g I have no similar doubts about the retention of the second category. It too may be a blunt instrument to prevent unjust enrichment by unlawful acts. But to restrict the damages recoverable to the actual gain made by the defendant if it exceeded the loss caused to the plaintiff, would leave a defendant contemplating an unlawful act with the certainty that he had nothing to lose to balance against the chance that the plaintiff might never sue him or, if he did, might fail in the hazards of litigation. It

19 (1880) 5 App Cas 25

1 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

20 [1899] AC 351, [1895-99] All ER Rep 506

2 [1953] 1 All ER 741, [1953] 2 QB 202

is only if there is a prospect that the damages may exceed the defendant's gain that the social purpose of this category is achieved—to teach a wrongdoer that tort does not pay. a

To bring a case within this category it must be proved that the defendant, at the time that he committed the tortious act, knew that it was unlawful or suspecting it to be unlawful deliberately refrained from taking obvious steps which, if taken, would have turned suspicion into certainty. While, of course, it is not necessary to prove that the defendant made an arithmetical calculation of the pecuniary profit he would make from the tortious act and of the compensatory damages and costs to which he would render himself liable, with appropriate discount for the chances that he might get away with it without being sued or might settle the action for some lower figure, it must be a reasonable inference from the evidence that he did direct his mind to the material advantages to be gained by committing the tort and came to the conclusion that they were worth the risk of having to compensate the plaintiff if he should bring an action. b

I see no reason for restoring to English law the anomaly of awarding exemplary damages in the third category of cases. If malice with which a wrongful act is done or insolence or arrogance with which it is accompanied renders it more distressing to the plaintiff, his injured feelings can still be soothed by aggravated damages which are compensatory. I share the scepticism expressed by Windeyer J in *Uren v John Fairfax & Sons Pty Ltd*³ whether what was in the defendant's mind at the time he committed the tort really increases the injury to the plaintiff's feelings. I think too that an evanescent sense of grievance at the defendant's conduct is often grossly overvalued in comparison with a lifelong deprivation due to physical injuries caused by negligence. But my own equable temperament may be idiosyncratic and the law of 'aggravated damages' does not call for closer examination in the instant appeal. c

Finally on this aspect of the case I would express my agreement with the view that *Rookes v Barnard*⁴ was not intended to extend the power to award exemplary or aggravated damages to particular torts for which they had not previously been awarded, such as negligence and deceit. Its express purpose was to restrict, not to expand, the anomaly of exemplary damages. d

My Lords, there is little that I should wish to add to what Lord Hailsham LC and Lord Reid have already said about the way the instant case was treated in the Court of Appeal⁵. It is inevitable in a hierarchical system of courts that there are decisions of the supreme appellate tribunal which do not attract the unanimous approval of all members of the judiciary. When I sat in the Court of Appeal I sometimes thought the House of Lords was wrong in overruling me. Even since that time there have been occasions, of which the instant appeal itself is one, when, alone or in company, I have dissented from a decision of the majority of this House. But the judicial system only works if someone is allowed to have the last word and if that last word, once spoken, is loyally accepted. e

The Court of Appeal⁵ found themselves able to disregard the decision of this House in *Rookes v Barnard*⁴ by applying to it the label per incuriam. That label is relevant only to the right of an appellate court to decline to follow one of its own previous decisions, not to its right to disregard a decision of a higher appellate court or to the right of a judge of the High Court to disregard a decision of the Court of Appeal. Even if the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal had been co-ordinate with the jurisdiction of this House and not inferior to it the label per incuriam would have been misused. The reasons for applying it were said to be: first, that Lord Devlin had overlooked two previous decisions of this House in *Hulton v Jones*⁶ and *Ley v Hamilton*⁷; secondly, that the 'two categories' selected as those in which the power to award exemplary damages should be retained had not been previously suggested by counsel in the course of their arguments. f

3 [1967] 117 CLR 118 at 151, 152. g
 4 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129. h
 5 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853. i
 6 [1910] AC 20, [1908-10] All ER Rep 29.
 7 (1935) 153 LT 384.

a I find the suggestion that *Hulton v Jones*⁸, the leading case on innocent defamation, is to be regarded as an authority for an award of exemplary damages, quite unacceptable. *Ley v Hamilton*⁹ was discussed at some length in Lord Devlin's speech. I myself agree with his interpretation of Lord Atkin's speech. The Court of Appeal¹⁰ did not and in this they now have the powerful support of my noble and learned friend, Viscount Dilhorne. But however wrong they may have thought Lord Devlin was, they cannot have thought that he had overlooked *Ley v Hamilton*⁹.

b The second reason I find equally unconvincing. On matters of law no court is restricted in its decision to following the submissions made to it by counsel for one or other of the parties. After listening to a lengthy argument which embraced a full examination of a large and representative selection of the relevant previous authorities this House was fully entitled to come to a conclusion of law and legal policy different from that which any individual counsel had propounded.

c With regard to the amount of exemplary (and also aggravated) damages which may be awarded where the plaintiff elects to sue defendants jointly for a single tort, I agree with Lord Hailsham LC that the Court of Appeal¹⁰ got it wrong. Where I differ from him is in thinking that the trial judge got it right. I am fortified in this view by the fact that Lord Denning MR understood the summing-up as leaving to the jury a choice whether to award a sum appropriate as a punishment of the more blameworthy of the defendants or the less blameworthy or something in between the two sums. Salmon LJ appears to have taken the same view. Both thought that this was a correct statement of the law. In this I think that they were mistaken as to the law, but right as to what the jury would have understood the summing-up to mean.

e On the wider aspects of the course adopted by the Court of Appeal¹⁰ it is best that I should content myself with expressing my concurrence with all that Lord Hailsham LC has said.

LORD KILBRANDON. My Lords, there are several reasons which induce me to be as brief as I can. First, the case in its important general aspects is concerned with doctrines, and to some extent with procedures, with which I am not familiar. f Secondly, those general aspects have been examined in great detail and in an authoritative manner by your Lordships who have preceded me. Thirdly, since it is unlikely that any contribution of mine would be regarded as of value in clarifying the law of England, I may at least wind up the consideration of a disastrous case with economy, the lack of which, especially in this class of litigation, is, as others of your Lordships have observed, a notoriously discreditable feature of our jurisprudence. g In short, having had the advantage of reading the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends, Lord Hailsham LC, Lord Reid and Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, I agree with them.

h It is conceded by the appellants that they libelled Captain Broome and they do not attack as excessive the sum awarded by the jury as compensation for the damage they did to his feelings and his reputation. It is also conceded that, if there was evidence on which a properly directed jury could find that the appellants had calculated that they might make a profit from publication which might exceed the compensation payable to the plaintiff, then, since 'one man should not be allowed to sell another man's reputation for profit', and since it may 'be necessary to teach a wrongdoer that tort does not pay', the jury were entitled to award punitive damages, on the authority of *Rookes v Barnard*¹¹. i The first question, and one which from first to last occupied a very great deal of time in your Lordships' House, was whether there was such evidence.

I have no doubt on this point at all, and I do not rehearse the evidence. The jury had before them the state of the appellants' knowledge before publication—that

8 [1910] AC 20, [1908-10] All ER Rep 29
9 (1935) 153 LT 384

10 [1971] 2 All ER 187, [1971] 2 WLR 853
11 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

Captain Broome had warned them that he regarded certain passages as libellous, that professional naval opinion was to the same effect, and, above all, that another reputable publisher had refused to handle the book because of its defamatory character. The appellants' attitude is demonstrated by their written references to libel actions as affording 'first class publicity', and to 'tightening up the indemnity clause'. No doubt there was an element of the jocular in these remarks, but they do show that the appellants were going ahead with their eyes open as to consequences, and they must have thought it would be worth their while. a

Counsel for the appellants pointed out, and I for one agree, that since all commercial publication is undertaken for profit, one must be watchful against holding the profit motive to be sufficient to justify punitive damages: to do so would be seriously to hamper what must be regarded, at least since the European Convention was ratified, as a constitutional right to free speech. I can see that it could be in the public interest that publication should not be stopped merely because the publisher knows that his material is defamatory; it may well be in the public interest that matter injurious to others be disseminated. But if it were suggested that this freedom should also be enjoyed when the publisher either knows that, or does not care whether, his material is libellous—which means not only defamatory but also untrue—it would seem that the scale is being weighted too heavily against the protection of individuals from attacks by media of communication. b

The conduct of the appellants, accordingly, is in my view brought within the principle of the rule laid down in *Rookes v Barnard*¹² to which I have just referred. If a publisher knows, or has reason to believe, that the act of publication will subject him to compensatory damages, it must be that, since he is actuated by the profit-motive, he is confident that by that publication he will not be the loser. Some deterrent, over and above compensatory damages, may in these circumstances be called for. c

This leads me to the little I have to say on the doctrine of punitive damages. I do not propose to discuss its merits or demerits, because I agree with Lord Devlin, not only that it forms part of the law of England, but also that its abolition would not be within the judicial functions of this House. I will, however, add that I am not convinced that any statutory example of the recognition of the doctrine is to be found. By the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934, s 1 (2) (a), it is provided that where a cause of action survives for the benefit of the estate of a deceased person, the damages recoverable for the benefit of that estate shall not include any exemplary damages. In the previous subsection provision has also been made, per contra, for causes of action subsisting against the estates of deceased persons. Since punitive damages are punitive or deterrent against the author of them, it would have been understandable if the statute had refused to allow them against a dead man. But, instead, they have been disallowed when they are claimed in respect of an injury to a dead man. This leads me to suppose that by the phrase 'exemplary damages' Parliament was here referring to what are usually called 'aggravated' damages; the estate of a dead man must pay them in order to indemnify the living, but the estate of a dead man, whose feelings post mortem have become irrelevant, does not receive them. d

In the same sense I would interpret s 13 (2) of the Reserve and Auxiliary Forces (Protection of Civil Interests) Act 1951, which provides for the award, in certain circumstances, of 'exemplary damages'. Section 13 (2) applies, by virtue of s 13 (6), to Scotland, and since I can hardly believe that this Act introduced for the first time, as it were by a side-wind, the doctrine of punitive damages into the law of Scotland, I conclude again that 'exemplary' really means 'aggravated'. Aggravated damages, in the English sense, are available to pursuers in defamation cases in Scotland, subject to this qualification, that the conduct of counsel (cf *Greenlands Ltd v Wilmshurst*¹³) is not accepted as an aggravation unless that conduct has been on the express e a instructions, or with the privity, of counsel's client—see *James v Baird*¹⁴. Finally, Lord Devlin¹⁵ doubted whether s 17 (3) of the Copyright Act 1956, authorised an award of exemplary damages; in my opinion it did not.

¹² [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

¹³ [1913] 3 KB 507

b I do not suppose that anyone now sitting down to draft a civil code would include an article providing for punitive damages. But the doctrine exists, and in my respectful opinion the rationale of it is explained, by illustrations as apt as one could find, in the speech of Lord Devlin. The doctrine proceeds on the footing, whether sound or not, that in some torts, and in some circumstances, there is an element of public interest to be protected. The only way in which that can be done may be by awarding to a plaintiff a sum of damages which he does not deserve, being in excess of any loss or injury he has suffered; that sum includes an element calculated to deter the defendant, and other like-minded persons, from committing similar offences. One example, which is Lord Devlin's second category, I have already noticed—the publisher who does not mind paying compensatory, even aggravated damages for libel, because he will still have a profit after paying them. It is not in the public interest, especially as the publishing agencies become more and more monolithic, that such conduct should go unchecked, and no remedial measures other than punitive damages seem to be open. A second example—Lord Devlin's first category—is in the sphere of public authority. While, as some of your Lordships d have pointed out, the illustration may have been too narrowly drawn, the rationale is clear, and is the same. An example might be, an outrageous excess of official authority without any aggravating circumstances (cf *Huckle v Money*¹⁶) resulting in the wrongful imprisonment of a person of bad character. False imprisonment is primarily actionable as an injury to reputation. If the plaintiff has none to lose, the amount of his compensatory damages may be inadequate to deter, in the public interest, e flagrant injustices of this character.

The exclusion of the 'common bully' category, and the consequent overruling of *Loudon v Ryder*¹⁷ are entirely consistent with this principle. Very large compensatory damages, which should be an adequate deterrent, are proper in such cases, and in most of them the criminal law can also take care of the public interest.

f I accordingly accept that *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁸, as it has now been expounded by my noble and learned friend, Lord Reid, correctly states the law of England. It cannot be said, and it does not purport, to state the law of Scotland; it may be that in other parts of the Commonwealth also it is not, for what may be very different reasons, acceptable. Nevertheless it appears to me to give content to the doctrine of punitive damages, and to set proper limits on it.

g The trial having been correctly and inevitably conducted on the basis of *Rookes v Barnard*¹⁸ as then understood, the question now arises whether the learned judge gave the jury adequate and accurate directions in law on that basis. First, did he fail to make it clear to the jury that, if they had made an award of compensatory damages, any additional award by way of punitive damages could be made 'if, but only if' the amount of the compensatory damages did not itself constitute a sufficient deterrent? The second objection was that the learned judge gave an inadequate direction h as to the course to be followed by the jury should they find punitive damages due, but a different degree of culpability in the two defendants. I think it is sufficient for me to say that I agree with those of your Lordships who are of opinion that the directions, in both matters, were adequate.

j The aspect of the case which has given me the greatest difficulty is the question whether the total amount of the damages awarded is so excessive that the verdict cannot stand. That it is excessive I do not doubt, but that is not a sufficient reason for the award to be set aside. The assessment of damages in such cases as this is not, in our law, a judicial function. Insofar as compensatory damages are concerned, it

14 1916 SC 510

15 [1964] 1 All ER at 410, [1964] AC at 1225

16 (1763) 2 Wils 205

17 [1953] 1 All ER 741, [1953] 2 QB 202

18 [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129

may well be right that that should be so. If he were called on to estimate the sum appropriate to repair the injured feelings and damaged reputation of a citizen who had been defamed, a judge would be making not a legal, but something more like a social, assessment; there is no reason to suppose that his estimate would more probably be correct than would that made collectively by any 12 sensible men and women. So when one looks at a jury's award in such a case one has to ask, whether it could have been made by sensible people acting reasonably, or whether it must have been arrived at capriciously, unconscionably, or irrationally. On that test, I think the present award must stand. Moreover, it is not unprecedented. For example, in a case in which the libel was in some ways less wounding than the present—*Youssouppoff v Metro-Goldwyn-Meyer*¹⁹—an award, adjusted for the change in money values, of well over twice as large as this was upheld by experienced judges.

The same test, as the law now stands, must be applied to a jury's award of punitive damages. Whether this should be so is another matter; it is arguable that the assessment of punishment is not properly a jury's function, and ought more readily to be challengeable on appeal to a judicial authority. It is obvious that, as counsel for the appellants forcibly pointed out, a defendant against whom punitive damages is sought stands to a great extent stripped of the constitutional safeguards which would be his right were he arraigned before a criminal court. One of those safeguards is a calm judicial determination of the penalty appropriate to his offence. Perhaps, if the doctrine of punitive damages is to be retained, it ought to be made a condition precedent of their being asked for that the plaintiff forego his right to have the case tried by a jury; it is not likely that a defendant would wish to stand on his own right in that respect.

So, although I would myself have assessed the damages at a much smaller sum, I cannot say that the award, on the principles under which we now operate, ought not to stand, or that, were a new trial to be ordered, the result would, in my confident opinion, be substantially different.

Finally, I do not consider it necessary for me to say anything on the issue of the relations between this House and the Court of Appeal, except that I entirely agree with what has fallen from Lord Hailsham LC on this topic.

I would, accordingly, dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Herbert Smith & Co (for the appellants); Theodore Goddard & Co (for Captain Broome).

S A Hatteea Esq Barrister.

Dingle v Turner and others

HOUSE OF LORDS

VISCOUNT DILHORNE, LORD MACDERMOTT, LORD HODSON, LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE AND LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA

17th, 18th, 19th, 22nd, 23rd NOVEMBER 1971, 16th FEBRUARY 1972

Charity – Relief of poverty – Poor employees – Trust to provide pensions to poor employees of a company – Whether valid charitable trust.

Charity – Public benefit – Requirement of public benefit – Section of the public – Determination whether potential beneficiaries constitute a section of the public – Relevance.

The testator died on 10th January 1950. By cl 8 (e) of his will he directed his trustees to invest a specified sum on trust 'to apply the income thereof in paying pensions to poor employees of [D Ltd] ...' At the testator's death D Ltd employed over 600 a persons and there was a substantial number of ex-employees. Since then the business had expanded and D Ltd had 705 full-time and 189 part-time employees and was paying pensions to 89 ex-employees. In proceedings to determine whether the trust declared by cl 8 (e) was valid it was contended by those interested on intestacy if the trust failed, that a trust ought not to be regarded as charitable if the benefits were confined to the employees of a given individual or company, the validity of trusts for 'poor relations' constituting an anomalous exception to the general rule.

Held – The trust constituted a valid charitable trust. It was a natural development of the 'poor relations' decisions to hold as charitable trusts for 'poor employees' of an individual or company or 'poor members' of a club or society; to draw a distinction between different kinds of 'poverty' trusts would be illogical. In the field of trusts for relief of poverty the dividing line between a charitable and a private trust depended on whether, as a matter of construction, the gift was for the relief of poverty amongst a particular description of poor people or was merely a gift to particular poor persons, the relief of poverty amongst them being the motive of the gift (see p 880 h and j, p 881 b d and e, p 883 e and p 888 f to h, post).

Re Gosling (1900) 48 WR 300, Gibson v South American Stores (Gath & Chaves) Ltd [1949] 2 All ER 985, and Re Scarisbrick [1951] 1 All ER 822 applied.

Re Compton [1945] 1 All ER 198, Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd [1951] 1 All ER 31 and Davies v Perpetual Trustee Co (Ltd) [1959] 2 All ER 128 distinguished.

Per Lord MacDermott, Lord Simon of Glaisdale and Lord Cross of Chelsea. In determining for the purposes of the law of charity whether a trust other than for the relief of poverty is for the public benefit, the question whether or not the potential beneficiaries of the trust can fairly be said to constitute a section of the public is a question of degree and cannot be by itself decisive of the question whether the trust is a charity. Much must depend on the purpose of the trust (see p 881 b and e and p 889 f and g, post).

Per Viscount Dilhorne, Lord MacDermott and Lord Hodson. The fiscal privileges of a legal charity are not directly relevant to the determination whether a given trust or purpose is charitable (see p 880 j and p 881 c and d, post).

Notes

For the relief of the poor being a charitable purpose, see 4 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 213-218, paras 492-495, and for cases on the subject, see 8 Digest (Repl) 316-319, 13-48.

Cases referred to in opinions

A-G v Northumberland (Duke) (1877) 7 Ch D 745, 47 LJCh 569, varied (1878) 38 LT 245, 8 Digest (Repl) 410, 1020.

A-G v Price (1810) 17 Ves 371, [1803-13] All ER Rep 467, 34 ER 143, 8 Digest (Repl) 316, 19.

Buck, Re, Bruty v Mackey [1896] 2 Ch 727, [1895-99] All ER Rep 366, 65 LJCh 881, 75 LT 312, 60 JP 775, 8 Digest (Repl) 356, 348.

Compton, Re, Powell v Compton [1945] 1 All ER 198, [1945] Ch 123, 114 LJCh 99, 172 LT 158, 8 Digest (Repl) 330, 123.

Cox (decd), Re, Baker v National Trust Co Ltd, Public Trustee for Ontario (Province) v National Trust Co Ltd [1955] 2 All ER 550, [1955] AC 627, [1955] 3 WLR 42, affg [1951] OR 205, Digest (Cont Vol A) 91, 3a.

Davies v Perpetual Trustee Co (Ltd) [1959] 2 All ER 128, [1959] AC 439, [1959] 2 WLR 673, Digest (Cont Vol A) 88, 6a.

Drummond, Re, Ashworth v Drummond [1914] 2 Ch 90, [1914-15] All ER Rep 223, 83 LJCh 817, 111 LT 156, 8 Digest (Repl) 320, 52.

Gibson v South American Stores (Gath & Chaves) Ltd [1949] 2 All ER 985, [1950] Ch 177, 8 Digest (Repl) 320, 51.

Gosling, Re, Gosling v Smith (1900) 48 WR 300, 16 TLR 152, 8 Digest (Repl) 320, 49.

- Hobourn Aero Components Ltd's Air Raid Distress Fund, Re, Ryan v Forrest* [1946] 1 All ER 501, [1946] Ch 194, 115 LJCh 158, 174 LT 428, 8 Digest (Repl) 321, 56. a
- Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs v Pemsel* [1891] AC 531, [1891-94] All ER Rep 28, 61 LJQB 265, 65 LT 621, 55 JP 805, 3 Tax Cas 53, 8 Digest (Repl) 312.
- Inland Revenue Comrs v Educational Grants Association Ltd* [1967] 2 All ER 893, [1967] Ch 993, [1967] 3 WLR 41, 44 Tax Cas 111, Digest (Cont Vol C) 529, 1400a.
- Laidlaw, Re, Sir Robert Laidlaw's Will Trusts* (11th January 1935) unreported. b
- Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd* [1951] 1 All ER 31, [1951] AC 297, 8 Digest (Repl) 321, 55.
- Pease v Pattinson* (1886) 32 Ch D 154, [1886-90] All ER Rep 507, 55 LJCh 617, 54 LT 209, 8 Digest (Repl) 355, 356.
- Scarisbrick, Re, Cockshott v Public Trustee* [1951] 1 All ER 822, [1951] Ch 622, rvsg [1950] 1 All ER 143, [1950] Ch 226, 8 Digest (Repl) 316, 18. c
- Spiller v Maude* (1881) 32 Ch D 158n, 8 Digest (Repl) 463, 1641.
- Young's Will Trusts, Re, Westminster Bank Ltd v Sterling* [1955] 3 All ER 689, [1955] 1 WLR 1269, Digest (Cont Vol A) 89, 31a.

Appeal

By an originating summons dated 30th July 1970 the first respondent, Henry Elliott Turner, trustee of the estate of Frank Hanscomb Dingle deceased ('the testator'), sought inter alia the determination of the question whether the trust declared in cl 8 (e), (g), of the testator's will dated 10th January 1950 to apply the income of a legacy of £10,000 and of the residue of his estate in paying pensions to poor employees of E Dingle & Co Ltd was valid as a charitable trust, or was otherwise valid, or was void for perpetuity, uncertainty or some other reason. On 2nd April 1971 Megarry J declared that the trust was a valid charitable trust and, on the application of Betty Mary Dingle, one of the persons interested under an intestacy, granted a certificate under s 12 of the Administration of Justice Act 1969 enabling her to apply for leave to appeal to the House of Lords. On 17th May 1971 the House gave leave to appeal under s 13 of the 1969 Act. The second to tenth respondents were representatives of the various classes of employees or ex-employees of E Dingle & Co Ltd, the eleventh respondent was Lloyds Bank Ltd, an executor of the testator's will, and the twelfth respondent was the Attorney-General. d

C A Settle QC and M W Cockle for the appellant. e

W S Wigglesworth QC and Spencer G Maurice for the second to tenth respondents.

N C H Browne-Wilkinson for the Attorney-General.

The first and eleventh respondents did not appear and were not represented. f

Their Lordships took time for consideration. g

16th February. The following opinions were delivered.

VISCOUNT DILHORNE. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinions of my noble and learned friends, Lord Cross of Chelsea and Lord MacDermott. I agree with Lord Cross that this appeal should be dismissed and with the reasons he gives for that conclusion. h

With Lord MacDermott, I too do not wish to extend my concurrence to what my noble and learned friend Lord Cross has said with regard to the fiscal privileges of a legal charity. Those privileges may be altered from time to time by Parliament and I doubt whether their existence should be a determining factor in deciding whether a gift or trust is charitable. j

I agree that the costs of all the parties should be paid out of the fund.

LORD MACDERMOTT. My Lords, the conclusion I have reached on the facts of this case is that the gift in question constitutes a public trust for the relief of poverty which is charitable in law. I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

a I do not find it necessary to state my reasons for this conclusion in detail. In the first place, the views which I have expressed at some length in relation to an educational trust in *Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd*¹ seem to me to apply to this appeal and to mean that it fails. It would, of course, be otherwise if the case just cited purported to rule the point now in issue. But that is not so, for it clearly left that point undecided and open for further consideration. And, secondly, I have had the advantage of reading the opinion prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Cross of Chelsea, and find myself in agreement with his conclusion for the reasons he has given. In particular, I welcome his commentary on the difficulties of the phrase 'a section of the public'. But I would prefer not to extend my concurrence to what my noble and learned friend goes on to say respecting the fiscal privileges of a legal charity. This subject may be material on the question whether what is alleged to be a charity is sufficiently altruistic in nature to qualify as such, but beyond that, and without wishing to express any final view on the matter, I doubt if these consequential privileges have much relevance to the primary question whether a given trust or purpose should be held charitable in law.

b I agree with the order as to costs proposed by my noble and learned friend.

d LORD HODSON. My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend, Lord Cross of Chelsea, that this appeal should be dismissed and with his reasons for that conclusion. With this reservation: that I share the doubts expressed by my noble and learned friends, Lord MacDermott and Viscount Dilhorne, as to the relevance of fiscal considerations in deciding whether a gift or trust is charitable.

e LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Cross of Chelsea, with which I agree. I too would dismiss this appeal, and make the same recommendation as to costs.

f LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. My Lords, by his will dated 10th January 1950 Frank Hanscomb Dingle (whom I will call 'the testator') after appointing Lloyds Bank Ltd, his wife Annie Dingle and his solicitor Henry Elliot Turner to be his executors and trustees made the following—among other—dispositions. By cl 5 he gave to his trustees his ordinary and preference shares in E Dingle & Co Ltd on trust to pay the income arising therefrom to his wife for her life and after her death to hold the same in trust for such person or persons as she should by will or codicil appoint but without any trust in default of appointment. By cl 8 (a) he directed his trustees to pay the income of his residuary estate after payment thereof of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses to his wife for her life. By cl 8 (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f) he directed his trustees to raise various sums out of his residuary estate after the death of his wife. Clause 8 (e) was in the following terms:

h '(e) To invest the sum of Ten thousand pounds in any of the investments for the time being authorised by law for the investment of trust funds in the names of three persons (hereinafter referred to as "the Pension Fund Trustees") to be nominated for the purpose by the persons who at the time at which my Executors assent to this bequest are directors of E. Dingle & Company Limited and the Pension Fund Trustees shall hold the said sum and the investments for the time being representing the same (hereinafter referred to as "the Pensions Fund")

j UPON TRUST to apply the income thereof in paying pensions to poor employees of E. Dingle & Company Limited or of any other company to which upon any reconstruction or amalgamation the goodwill and the assets of E. Dingle & Company Limited may be transferred who are of the age of Sixty years at least or who being of the age of Forty five years at least are incapacitated from earning their living by reason of some physical or mental infirmity PROVIDED ALWAYS that if at any time the Pension Fund Trustees shall for any reason be unable to apply the income of the Pensions Fund in paying such pensions to such employees as aforesaid the Pension Fund Trustees shall hold the pensions Fund and the income thereof UPON TRUST for the aged poor in the Parish of St Andrew, Plymouth.'

Finally by cl 8 (g) the testator directed his trustees to hold the ultimate residue of his estate on the trusts set out in cl 8 (e).

The testator died on 10th January 1950. His widow died on 8th October 1966, having previously released her testamentary power of appointment over her husband's shares in E Dingle & Co Ltd, which accordingly fell into the residuary estate. When these proceedings started in July 1970, the value of the fund held on the trusts declared by cl 8 (e) was about £320,000 producing a gross income of about £17,800 per annum.

E Dingle and Co Ltd was incorporated as a private company on 20th January 1935. Its capital was owned by the testator and one John Russell Baker and it carried on the business of a departmental store. At the time of the testator's death the company employed over 600 persons and there was a substantial number of ex-employees. On 23rd October 1950 the company became a public company. Since the testator's death its business has expanded and when these proceedings started it had 705 full-time and 189 part-time employees and was paying pensions to 89 ex-employees.

The trustees took out an originating summons in the Chancery Division on 30th July 1970 asking the court to determine whether the trusts declared by cl 8 (e) were valid and if so to determine various subsidiary questions of construction—as, for example, whether part-time employees or employees of subsidiary companies were eligible to receive benefits under the trust. To this summons they made defendants (1) representatives of the various classes of employees or ex-employees, (2) those who would be interested on an intestacy if the trusts failed, and (3) Her Majesty's Attorney-General. It has been common ground throughout that the trust at the end of cl 8 (e) for the aged poor in the Parish of St Andrew Plymouth is dependent on the preceding trust for poor employees of the company so that although it will catch any surplus income which the trustees do not apply for the benefit of poor employees it can have no application if the preceding trust is itself void.

By his judgment given on 2nd April 1971 Megarry J held, inter alia, following the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Gibson v South American Stores (Gath & Chaves) Ltd*², that the trust declared by cl 8 (e) was a valid charitable trust but, on the application of the appellant, Betty Mary Dingle, one of the persons interested under an intestacy, he granted a certificate under s 12 of the Administration of Justice Act 1969 enabling her to apply to this House directly for leave to appeal against that part of his judgment, and on 17th May 1971 the House gave her leave to appeal.

Your Lordships, therefore, are now called on to give to the old 'poor relations' cases and the more modern 'poor employees' cases that careful consideration which, in his speech in the Oppenheim case³ Lord Morton of Henryton said that they might one day require.

The contentions of the appellant and the respondents may be stated broadly as follows. The appellant says that in the Oppenheim case⁴ this House decided that in principle a trust ought not to be regarded as charitable if the benefits under it are confined either to the descendants of a named individual or individuals or the employees of a given individual or company and that although the 'poor relations' cases may have to be left standing as an anomalous exception to the general rule because their validity has been recognised for so long, the exception ought not to be a extended to 'poor employees' trusts which had not been recognised for long before their status as charitable trusts began to be called in question. The respondents, on the other hand, say, first, that the rule laid down in the Oppenheim case⁵ with regard to educational trusts ought not to be regarded as a rule applicable in principle to all kinds of charitable trust and, secondly, that in any case it is impossible to draw any logical distinction between 'poor relations' trusts and 'poor employees' trusts, and, that as the former cannot be held invalid today after having been recognised as valid b for so long, the latter must be regarded as valid also.

2 [1949] 2 All ER 985, [1950] Ch 177

3 [1951] 1 All ER at 38, [1951] AC at 313

4 [1951] 1 All ER 31, [1951] AC 297

By a curious coincidence within a few months of the decision of this House in the Oppenheim case⁵ the cases on gifts to 'poor relations' had to be considered by the Court of Appeal in *Re Scarisbrick, Cockshott v Public Trustee*⁶. Most of the cases on this subject were decided in the 18th or early 19th centuries and are very inadequately reported but two things at least were clear. First, that it never occurred to the judges c who decided them that in the field of 'poverty' a trust could not be a charitable trust if the class of beneficiaries was defined by reference to descent from a common ancestor. Secondly, that the courts did not treat a gift or trust as necessarily charitable because the objects of it had to be poor in order to qualify, for in some of the cases the trust was treated as a private trust and not a charity. The problem in *Re Scarisbrick*⁶ was to determine on what basis the distinction was drawn. Roxburgh J—founding d himself on some words attributed to Sir William Grant MR in *A-G v Price*⁷—had held that the distinction lay in whether the gift took the form of a trust under which capital was retained and the income only applied for the benefit of the objects, in which case the gift was charitable, or whether the gift was one under which the capital was immediately distributable among the objects, in which case the gift was not a charity. The Court of Appeal⁶ rejected this ground of distinction. They held that in e this field the distinction between a public or charitable trust and a private trust depended on whether as a matter of construction the gift was for the relief of poverty amongst a particular description of poor people or was merely a gift to particular poor persons, the relief of poverty among them being the motive of the gift. The fact that the gift took the form of a perpetual trust would no doubt indicate that the intention of the donor could not have been to confer private benefits on particular f people whose possible necessities he had in mind; but the fact that the capital of the gift was to be distributed at once did not necessarily show that the gift was a private trust. The appellant in the instant case, while of course submitting that the judges who decided the old cases were wrong in not appreciating that no gift for the relief of poverty among persons tracing descent from a common ancestor could ever have a sufficiently 'public' quality to constitute a charity, did not dispute the correctness of the analysis of those cases made by the Court of Appeal in *Re Scarisbrick*⁶. g

Later in the 19th century came the friendly society cases—*Spiller v Maude*⁸ decided in 1881, *Pease v Pattinson*⁹ and *Re Buck, Bruty v Mackey*¹⁰. In all these cases the court had to consider whether funds held on trust for the relief of poverty among members of a voluntary association were held on charitable trusts—such funds being derived h in each case in part from subscriptions made by the members and in part from donations or bequests by well-wishers. In each case the court held that the funds were held on a charitable trust but it does not appear to have been argued in any of them that the fact that the benefits were confined to persons who were linked by the common tie of membership of an association prevented the trusts from being charitable. The arguments against 'charity' were either that the association in question was really no more than a private mutual insurance society or that at all i

5 [1951] 1 All ER 31, [1951] AC 297

6 [1951] 1 All ER 822, [1951] Ch 622

7 (1810) 17 Ves 371, [1803-13] All ER Rep 467

8 (1881) 32 Ch D 158n

9 (1886) 32 Ch D 154, [1886-90] All ER Rep 507

10 [1896] 2 Ch 727, [1895-99] All ER Rep 366

events on a winding-up so much of the funds as were derived from donations or bequests should be returned to the donors or the estates of the testators and not applied 'cy-près'.

The first of the 'poor employees' cases was *Re Gosling, Gosling v Smith*¹¹. There the testator sought to establish a fund for 'pensioning off' the old and worn out clerks of a banking firm of which he had been a member. It was argued by those interested in contending that the gift was not charitable, that there was no public element in it, and that a distinction should be drawn between the relief of poverty among employees of a firm and the relief of poverty among inhabitants of a geographical area. In rejecting that argument Byrne J said, inter alia, that it was inconsistent with *A-G v The Duke of Northumberland*¹², which was one of the 'poor relations' cases. His judgment continued as follows¹³:

'The fact that the section of the public is limited to persons born or residing in a particular parish, district, or county, or belonging to or connected with any special sect, denomination, guild, institution, firm, name, or family, does not of itself render that which would be otherwise charitable void for lack of a sufficient or satisfactory description or take it out of the category of charitable gifts. I therefore hold it to be a good charitable gift.'

It is to be observed that he does not confine what he says there to trusts for the relief of poverty as opposed to other forms of charitable trust.

In *Re Drummond, Ashworth v Drummond*¹⁴, the testator bequeathed some shares in a company of which he had been a director to trustees on trust to pay the income to the directors of the company—

'for the purposes of contribution to the holiday expenses of the workpeople employed in the spinning department of the said company in such manner as a majority of the directors should in their absolute discretion think fit . . .'

There were some 500 employees in the department. It was first submitted that this was a trust for the relief of poverty. Eve J rejected that submission but, in doing so, he did not suggest that if he could have held that the workpeople in question were 'poor persons' within the meaning of the Statute of Elizabeth the gift would nevertheless have failed on the ground that it was confined to employees of a particular company. Next it was submitted that the gift fell under the last of the four heads of charity set out by Lord Macnaghten in *Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs v Pemsell*¹⁵. It was a trust to secure a holiday for a substantial number of the inhabitants of Ilkley who, although not poor, might in many cases not otherwise be able to get a holiday. Such a trust—it was said—promoted the general well-being of the community; and the beneficiaries could well be considered as constituting a 'section of the community' for the purpose of the law of charity. Eve J—with some regret—rejected that contention saying¹⁶:

'This is not a trust for general public purposes; it is a trust for private individuals, a fluctuating body of private individuals it is true, but still private individuals . . .'

So Eve J, while not disagreeing with the decision in *Re Gosling*¹¹, plainly thought that the words of Byrne J¹⁷ which I have quoted, although true of poverty cases, were not of general application in the law of charity.

¹¹ (1900) 48 WR 300

¹² (1877) 7 Ch D 745

¹³ (1900) 48 WR at 301

¹⁴ [1914] 2 Ch 90, [1914-15] All ER Rep 223

¹⁵ [1891] AC 531 at 583, [1891-94] All ER Rep 28 at 55, 56

¹⁶ [1914] 2 Ch at 97, [1914-15] All ER Rep at 227

¹⁷ (1900) 48 WR at 301

a Next comes Re Laidlaw, *Sir Robert Laidlaw's Will Trusts*¹⁸, a decision of the Court of Appeal given in 1935 but not then reported and only brought to light in 1949¹⁹. There the testator had bequeathed a legacy of £2,000 on certain trusts for the relief of poor members or former members of the staff of Whiteway Laidlaw & Co Ltd. The judge of first instance having held that the gift failed as not being charitable the Court of Appeal reversed his decision and declared that it was a valid charitable legacy. Unfortunately neither the reasons given by the judge for holding that the gift failed nor those given by the Court of Appeal for holding that it was charitable have been recorded; but the decision of the Court of Appeal was plainly in line with *Re Gosling*²⁰.

b In Re Compton, *Powell v Compton*²¹, the Court of Appeal had to decide whether a trust for the education of the descendants of three named persons was a charitable trust. In a reserved judgment in which Finlay and Morton LJJs concurred Lord Greene MR began by stating that no trust could be charitable unless it is directed to the benefit of the community or a section of the community as opposed to the benefit of private individuals or a fluctuating class of private individuals. He went on to say that in his opinion no trust under the terms of which a claimant in order to establish his title as a potential beneficiary has to show that he is related to some individual or that he is or was employed by some person or company can ever be a charitable trust since in such cases a personal relationship to individuals or an individual which is in its essence non-public enters into the qualification. In this connection he expressly approved the decision of Eve J in *Re Drummond*¹ that in the law of charity a class of employees—unlike the inhabitants of a geographical area—must be regarded as a fluctuating class of private individuals and not a section of the public. Next Lord Greene MR said that even if his view that the necessity of founding a claim on the fact of kinship to an individual precluded the possibility of regarding a gift as charitable was too widely stated yet the sort of educational trust which this testator had created must be regarded as a private family trust and not as one for the benefit of a section of the community on any fair view of what that phrase might mean. Finally he said of the 'poor relations' cases that the decisions were given at a time when the public character of charitable gifts had not yet been clearly laid down, that if the validity of such gifts had first come before the courts in modern days they would very likely have been held to be invalid and that, although as they had been accepted as valid for so long it was not possible now to overrule them, they should be regarded as anomalous and not be extended by analogy to cover such a trust as that with which the court was concerned.

g Next year in Re Hobourn Aero Components Ltd's Air Raid Distress Fund, *Ryan v Forrest*², the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Greene MR and Morton and Somervell LJJs, had to consider the character of a fund built up by agreed deductions from the wages of the employees of a company with factories at Coventry, Market Harborough and Kettering, the purpose of the fund being at the relevant time to relieve employees who had suffered damage and distress from air raids. It could not be suggested that the purpose of the trust was the relief of poverty but the Attorney-General argued that it was a charitable trust falling within Lord Macnaghten's fourth category³. In rejecting that submission Lord Greene MR relied largely on the fact that the fund was a mutual insurance fund. In that connection he pointed out that the decisions in the friendly society cases to which I have already referred could only be justified—if at all—because 'poverty' was a necessary qualification for the receipt

j 18 (11th January 1935) unreported

19 See Gibson v South American Stores (Gath & Chaves), Ltd [1949] 2 All ER 985, [1950] Ch 177

20 [1900] 48 WR 300

21 [1945] 1 All ER 198, [1945] Ch 123

1 [1914] 2 Ch 90, [1914-15] All ER Rep 223

2 [1946] 1 All ER 501, [1946] Ch 194

3 See Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs v Pemsel [1891] AC at 583, [1891-94] All ER Rep at of benefits. But both Lord Greene MR and Morton LJ were also clearly of opinion that even if this fund had been provided by the employers or an outside donor it would not have been held on charitable trusts since, as Eve J had held in *Re Drummond*⁴, and they had held in *Re Compton*⁵, the employees of a company were not a section of the public for the purpose of the law of charity.

The facts in *Gibson v South American Stores (Gath & Chaves) Ltd*⁶—the case followed by Megarry J in this case—were that a company had vested in trustees a fund derived solely from its profits to be applied at the discretion of the directors in granting gratuities, pensions or allowances to persons—‘who . . . are or shall be necessitous and deserving and who for the time being are or have been in the company’s employ . . . and the wives widows husbands widowers children parents and other dependants of any person who for the time being is or would if living have been himself or herself a member of the class of beneficiaries.’

The Court of Appeal held that this trust was a valid charitable trust but it did so without expressing a view of its own on the question of principle involved, because the case of *Re Laidlaw*⁷ which was unearthed in the course of the hearing showed that the Court of Appeal had already accepted the decision in *Re Gosling*⁸ as correct.

In *Oppenheim v Tobacco Securities Trust Co Ltd*⁹ this House had to consider the principle laid down by the Court of Appeal in *Re Compton*⁵. There the trustees of a fund worth over £125,000 were directed to apply its income and also if they thought fit all or any part of the capital—

‘in providing for or assisting in providing for the education of children of employees or former employees of British-American Tobacco Co., Ltd. . . . or any of its subsidiary or allied companies . . .’

There were over 110,000 such employees. The majority of your Lordships—namely Lord Simonds (in whose judgment Lord Oaksey concurred), Lord Normand and Lord Morton of Henryton—in holding that the trust was not a valid charitable trust gave unqualified approval to the *Compton*⁵ principle. They held, that is to say, that although the ‘poverty’ cases might afford an anomalous exception to the rule, it was otherwise a general rule applicable to all charitable trusts that no class of beneficiaries can constitute a ‘section of the public’ for the purpose of the law of charity if the distinguishing quality which links them together is relationship to a particular individual either through common descent or common employment. My noble and learned friend, Lord MacDermott, on the other hand, in his dissenting speech, while not challenging the correctness of the decisions in *Re Compton*⁵ or in the Hobourn Aero case¹⁰ said that he could not regard the principle stated by Lord Greene MR as a criterion of general applicability and conclusiveness. He said¹¹:

‘. . . I see much difficulty in dividing the qualities or attributes which may serve to bind human beings into classes into two mutually exclusive groups, the one involving individual status and purely personal, the other disregarding such status and quite impersonal. As a task this seems to me no less baffling and elusive than the problem to which it is directed, namely, the determination of

4 [1914] 2 Ch 90, [1914-15] All ER Rep 223

5 [1945] 1 All ER 198, [1945] Ch 123

6 [1949] 2 All ER 985, [1950] Ch 177

7 (11th January 1935) unreported

8 (1900) 48 WR 300

9 [1951] 1 All ER 31, [1951] AC 297

10 [1946] 1 All ER 501, [1946] Ch 194

11 [1951] 1 All ER at 41, [1951] AC at 317

what is and what is not a section of the public for the purposes of this branch of the law.'

He thought that the question whether any given trust was a public or a private trust was a question of degree to be decided in the light of the facts of the particular case and that viewed in that light the trust in the Oppenheim case¹² was a valid charitable trust.

In Re Cox (decd), Baker v National Trust Co Ltd, *Public Trustee for Ontario (Province) v National Trust Co Ltd*¹³, a Canadian testator directed his trustees to hold the balance of his residuary estate on trust to pay its income in perpetuity for charitable purposes only, the persons to benefit directly in pursuance of such charitable purposes being such as were or had been employees of a certain company and/or the dependants of such employees. This disposition raised, of course, a question of construction—namely whether 'charitable purposes' was simply a compendious mode of referring to any purposes a trust to promote which would be charitable providing that the beneficiaries were the public or a section of the public or whether the words meant such purposes only as having regard to the class of beneficiaries named could be the subject of a valid charitable trust. It was only on the latter construction that the question whether *Gibson v South American Stores*¹⁴ was rightly decided would arise and in fact both the courts below and the Privy Council held that the former construction was the right one. It is, however, to be observed that the Court of Appeal in Ontario unanimously held that even if the second construction was right the trust would still fail for want of any possible purposes since the 'poor relations' cases formed a class apart and the 'poor employees' cases could not stand with the decision in the Oppenheim case¹². The Privy Council expressly refrained from expressing any opinion on this point.

In Re Young's Will Trusts, *Westminster Bank Ltd v Sterling*¹⁵, Danckwerts J held that a gift by a testator of his residuary estate to the trustees of the benevolent fund of the Savage Club to be used by them as they should think fit for the assistance of any of his fellow members as might fall on evil days created a valid charitable trust. In so deciding he referred to Gibson's case¹⁴ and said that he could see no distinction in principle between the employees of a limited company and the members of a club.

Finally, we were referred to the Privy Council case of *Davies v Perpetual Trustee Co (Ltd)*¹⁶. There a testator who died on 21st January 1897, after giving successive life interests in certain property in Sydney to several life tenants, the last of whom died in 1957, gave the property—

'to the Presbyterians the descendants of those settled in the colony hailing from or born in the north of Ireland to be held in trust for the purpose of establishing a college for the education and tuition of their youth in the standards of the Westminster Divines as taught in the Holy Scriptures.'

On an originating summons issued in 1918 by the then sole trustee for the determination of certain questions it was held, inter alia, by the trial judge and on appeal by the Supreme Court of New South Wales that this devise created a valid charitable trust; but after the death of the last life tenant special leave was given to a representative of the next-of-kin to appeal to the Privy Council which held the trust to be invalid. The Board held as a matter of construction that a child would only be eligible to be educated at the college if (i) he was descended from a Presbyterian living on 21st January 1897; (ii) that Presbyterian was himself descended from a Presbyterian who had settled in the colony and (iii) that settler either hailed from or was

¹² [1951] 1 All ER 31, [1951] AC 297

¹³ [1955] 2 All ER 550, [1955] AC 627

¹⁴ [1949] 2 All ER 985, [1950] Ch 177

¹⁵ [1955] 3 All ER 689, [1955] 1 WLR 1269

¹⁶ [1959] 2 All ER 128, [1959] AC 439

born in Northern Ireland. After quoting passages from the judgments of Lord Simonds and Lord Normand in the Oppenheim case¹⁷ the Board held that this class of beneficiaries, the nexus between whom was simply their personal relationship to several propositi, was not a section of the public but merely a fluctuating class of private individuals and that though the purposes of the trust—being for the advancement of religion and education—were prima facie charitable the trust did not possess the necessary public quality and was invalid.

After this long—but I hope not unduly long—recital of the decided cases I turn to consider the arguments advanced by the appellant in support of the appeal. For this purpose I will assume that the appellant is right in saying that the *Compton*¹⁸ rule ought in principle to apply to all charitable trusts and that the ‘poor relations’ cases, the ‘poor members’ cases and the ‘poor employees’ cases are all anomalous—in the sense that if such cases had come before the courts for the first time after the decision in *Re Compton*¹⁸ the trusts in question would have been held invalid as ‘private’ trusts.

Even on that assumption—as it seems to me—the appeal must fail. The status of some of the ‘poor relations’ trusts as valid charitable trusts was recognised more than 200 years ago and a few of those then recognised are still being administered as charities today. In *Re Compton*¹⁹ Lord Greene MR said that it was ‘quite impossible’ for the Court of Appeal to overrule such old decisions and in the Oppenheim case²⁰ Lord Simonds in speaking of them remarked on the unwisdom of—

‘[casting] doubt on decisions of respectable antiquity in order to introduce a greater harmony into the law of charity as a whole.’

Indeed counsel for the appellant hardly ventured to suggest that we should overrule the ‘poor relations’ cases. His submission was that which was accepted by the Court of Appeal in Ontario in *Re Cox (dec’d)*¹—namely that while the ‘poor relations’ cases might have to be left as long standing anomalies there was no good reason for sparing the ‘poor employees’ cases which only date from *Re Gosling*² decided in 1900 and which have been under suspicion ever since the decision in *Re Compton*¹⁸ in 1945. But the ‘poor members’ and the ‘poor employees’ decisions were a natural development of the ‘poor relations’ decisions and to draw a distinction between different sorts of ‘poverty’ trusts would be quite illogical and could certainly not be said to be introducing ‘greater harmony’ into the law of charity. Moreover, although not as old as the ‘poor relations’ trusts, ‘poor employees’ trusts have been recognised as charities for many years; there are now a large number of such trusts in existence; and assuming, as one must, that they are properly administered in the sense that benefits under them are only given to people who can fairly be said to be, according to current standards, ‘poor persons’ to treat such trusts as charities is not open to any practical objection. So as it seems to me it must be accepted that wherever else it may hold sway the *Compton*¹⁸ rule has no application in the field of trusts for the relief of poverty and that there the dividing line between a charitable trust and a private trust lies where the Court of Appeal drew it in *Re Scarisbrick*³.

The Oppenheim case¹⁷ was a case of an educational trust and although the majority evidently agreed with the view expressed by the Court of Appeal in the Hobourn Aero case⁴, that the *Compton*¹⁸ rule was of universal application outside the field of poverty, it would no doubt be open to this House without overruling *Oppenheim*¹⁷ to hold that the scope of the rule was more limited. If ever I should be called on to pronounce on this question—which does not arise in this appeal—I would as at present advised be inclined to draw a distinction between the practical merits of the *Compton*¹⁸ rule and the reasoning by which Lord Greene MR sought to justify it.

17 [1951] 1 All ER 31, [1951] AC 297

18 [1945] 1 All ER 198, [1945] Ch 123

19 [1945] 1 All ER at 206, [1945] Ch at 139

20 [1951] 1 All ER at 35, [1951] AC at 309

1 [1951] OR 205

2 (1900) 48 WR 300

3 [1951] 1 All ER 822, [1951] Ch 622

4 [1946] 1 All ER 501, [1946] Ch 194

a That reasoning—based on the distinction between personal and impersonal relationships—has never seemed to me very satisfactory and I have always—if I may say so—felt the force of the criticism to which my noble and learned friend Lord MacDermott subjected it in his dissenting speech in the Oppenheim case⁵. For my part I would prefer to approach the problem on far broader lines. The phrase a 'section of the public' is in truth a vague phrase which may mean different things to different people. In the law of charity judges have sought to elucidate its meaning by contrasting it with another phrase 'a fluctuating body of private individuals'. But I get little help from the supposed contrast for as I see it one and the same aggregate of persons may well be describable both as a section of the public and as a fluctuating body of private individuals. The ratepayers in the Royal Borough of Kensington and Chelsea, for example, certainly constitute a section of the public; but would it be a misuse of language to describe them as a 'fluctuating body of private individuals'? After all, every part of the public is composed of individuals and being susceptible of increase or decrease is fluctuating. So at the end of the day one is left where one started with the bare contrast between 'public' and 'private'. No doubt some classes are more naturally describable as sections of the public than as private classes while other classes are more naturally describable as private classes than as sections of the public. The blind, for example, can naturally be described as a section of the public; but what they have in common—their blindness—does not join them together in such a way that they could be called a private class. On the other hand, the descendants of Mr Gladstone might more reasonably be described as a 'private class' than as a section of the public, and in the field of common employment the same might well be said of the employees in some fairly small firm. But if one turns to large companies employing many thousands of men and women most of whom are quite unknown to one another and to the directors the answer is by no means so clear. One might say that in such a case the distinction between a section of the public and a private class is not applicable at all or even that the employees in such concerns as ICI or GEC are just as much 'sections of the public' as the residents in some geographical area. In truth the question whether or not the potential beneficiaries of a trust can fairly be said to constitute a section of the public is a question of degree and cannot be by itself decisive of the question whether the trust is a charity. Much must depend on the purpose of the trust. It may well be that, on the one hand, a trust to promote some purpose, prima facie charitable, will constitute a charity even though the class of potential beneficiaries might fairly be called a private class and that, on the other hand, a trust to promote another purpose, also prima facie charitable, will not constitute a charity even though the class of potential beneficiaries might seem to some people fairly describable as a section of the public.

In answering the question whether any given trust is a charitable trust the courts—as I see it—cannot avoid having regard to the fiscal privileges accorded to charities. As counsel for the Attorney-General remarked in the course of the argument the law of charity is bedevilled by the fact that charitable trusts enjoy two quite different sorts of privilege. On the one hand, they enjoy immunity from the rules against perpetuity and uncertainty and although individual potential beneficiaries cannot sue to enforce them the public interest arising under them is protected by the Attorney-General. If this was all there would be no reason for the courts not to look favourably on the claim of any 'purpose' trust to be considered as a charity if it seemed calculated to confer some real benefit on those intended to benefit by it whoever they might be and if it would fail if not held to be a charity. But that is not all. Charities automatically enjoy fiscal privileges which with the increased burden of taxation have become more and more important and in deciding that such and such a trust is a charitable trust the court is endowing it with a substantial annual subsidy at the expense of the taxpayer. Indeed, claims of trusts to rank as charities are just as often challenged by the Revenue as by those who would take the fund if the trust was invalid. It is, of course, unfortunate that the recognition of any trust as a valid charitable trust should automatically attract fiscal privileges, for the question whether a trust to further some purpose is so little likely to benefit the public that it ought to be declared invalid and the question whether it is likely to confer such great benefits on the public that it should enjoy fiscal immunity are really two quite different questions. The logical solution would be to separate them and to say—as the Radcliffe Commission proposed—that only some charities should enjoy fiscal privileges. But as things are, validity and fiscal immunity march hand in hand and the decisions in the *Compton*⁶ and *Oppenheim*⁷ cases were pretty obviously influenced by the consideration that if such trusts as were there in question were held valid they would enjoy an undeserved fiscal immunity. To establish a trust for the education of the children of employees in a company in which you are interested is no doubt a meritorious act; but however numerous the employees may be the purpose which you are seeking to achieve is not a public purpose. It is a company purpose and there is no reason why your fellow taxpayers should contribute to a scheme which by providing 'fringe benefits' for your employees will benefit the company by making their conditions of employment more attractive. The temptation to enlist the assistance of the law of charity in private endeavours of this sort is considerable—witness the recent case of the Metal Box scholarships—*Inland Revenue Comrs v Educational Grants Association Ltd*⁸—and the courts must do what they can to discourage such attempts. In the field of poverty the danger is not so great as in the field of education—for while people are keenly alive to the need to give their children a good education and to the expense of doing so, they are generally optimistic enough not to entertain serious fears of falling on evil days much before they fall on them. Consequently the existence of company 'benevolent funds', the income of which is free of tax does not constitute a very attractive 'fringe benefit'. This is a practical justification—although not, of course, the historical explanation—for the special treatment accorded to poverty trusts in charity law. For the same sort of reason a trust to promote some religion among the employees of a company might perhaps safely be held to be charitable provided that it was clear that the benefits were to be purely spiritual. On the other hand, many 'purpose' trusts falling under Lord Macnaghten's fourth head⁹ if confined to a class of employees would clearly be open to the same sort of objection as educational trusts. As I see it, it is on these broad lines rather than for the reasons actually given by Lord Greene MR that the *Compton*⁶ rule can best be justified.

5 [1951] 1 All ER 31, [1951] AC 297

My Lords, for the reasons given earlier in this speech I would dismiss this appeal; but as the view was expressed in the Oppenheim case⁷ that the question of the validity of trusts for poor relations and poor employees ought some day to be considered by this House and as the fund in dispute in this case is substantial, your Lordships may perhaps think it proper to direct that the costs of all parties to the appeal be paid out of it.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Hatchett Jones & Co, agents for Wolferstan, Snell & Turner, Plymouth (for the appellant); *Vizard*s, agents for Shelly & Johns, Plymouth (for the second to tenth respondents); Treasury Solicitor.

S A Hatteea Esq Barrister.

⁶ [1945] 1 All ER 198, [1945] Ch 123

⁷ [1951] 1 All ER 31, [1951] AC 297

⁸ [1967] 2 All ER 893, [1967] Ch 993

⁹ See Income Tax Special Purposes Comrs v Pemsel [1891] AC at 583, [1891-94] All ER Rep at 55, 56

a Squire v Squire and others

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

RUSSELL, BUCKLEY AND ORR LJJ

15th, 16th, 17th NOVEMBER, 8th DECEMBER 1971

b Pleading – Amendment – Defence – Amendment after close of pleadings – Leave – Leave given to amend statement of claim – Implied leave to amend defence – Scope of power to amend defence without special leave – Whether defendant entitled to amend defence without limit – Whether right to amend defence limited to matters consequential on amendments to statement of claim.

c The plaintiff who was a shareholder and director of a private company allegedly absconded with the company's money. During his absence abroad the management of the company asserted the company's lien on his shares in respect of the sums said to be owing and pursuant to that lien they purported to sell the plaintiff's shares in the company to his brother, a co-director, and his brother's wife and son. On his return the company issued a writ against the plaintiff claiming some £500,000 damages for fraudulent conversion. The plaintiff subsequently issued a writ against d the defendants (the company, his brother, his brother's wife and son) challenging the disposal of his shares, his claim being based on conspiracy to cheat and defraud him and asserting a sale at a gross undervalue. The two actions came on for hearing together. After the trial had started the plaintiff's advisers decided not to rely e solely on the pleaded conspiracy to cheat and defraud but to introduce by amendment allegations of breach of duty by the company in its exercise of its powers of sale, an illegal reduction of capital and an illegal financial aid to the acquisition of the f company's own shares. The plaintiff was given leave to amend the statement of claim accordingly. The defendants, without obtaining leave, amended their defences and for the first time pleaded laches, acquiescence and limitation of actions. The plaintiff contended that although the defendants were entitled to plead (as an amendment consequential on the amendment to the statement of claim) laches, f acquiescence and limitation in respect of the alleged breaches of duty and alleged irregularities, they were not entitled so to plead in respect of the fraudulent conspiracy unless they made a substantive application for leave to do so.

g Held – (i) When after the close of pleadings a plaintiff had been given leave to amend his statement of claim, it did not follow that the defendant had power without leave to make any amendment he chose to the defence; in such circumstances the defendant was only entitled to amend the defence without special leave by introducing con- h sequential amendments, i.e. amendments which did not relate only to those allegations or contentions contained in the statement of claim that were not affected by amend- ments to the latter; accordingly, although leave to amend a defence after pleadings had been closed was always necessary, it could properly be assumed that leave to amend the statement of claim involved without mention leave to amend h consequentially the defence (see p 896 f and g and p 897 c and d, post).

j (ii) The plaintiff's amended statement of claim pleaded a different and wider conspiracy than that originally pleaded and so the defendants' pleas of laches, acquiescence and limitation of actions did relate to a conspiracy that was affected by the plaintiff's amendments and their defences would be allowed to stand amended as delivered (see p 897 e and g, post).

Notes

For amendment of pleadings, see 40 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 32-36, paras 65-74, and for cases on pleading to amendment, see 50 Digest (Repl) 135, 136, 1185-1187.

Interlocutory appeals

These were appeals by the first, second, third and sixth defendants, Percy James Aldritt Squire, Muriel Squire, Gordon Peter James Squire and Henry Squire & Sons Ltd, respectively, from so much of the judgment of Goff J, given on 20th April 1971, as declared that the leave to amend their defences implied in the leave granted to the administratrix of the estate of Harold Aldritt Squire, deceased, to serve a re-amended statement of claim in the action commenced in 1964 by the said Harold Aldritt Squire against the defendants for damages for fraudulent conspiracy, did not authorise the defendants to amend their defences by pleading limitation by way of defence to any of the matters pleaded in para 6^a of the re-amended statement of claim. There was a cross-appeal by the administratrix of the plaintiff's estate from so much of the judgment of Goff J as declared that the leave to amend the defences implied in the leave granted on 17th June 1970 to serve a re-amended statement of claim authorised the defendants to amend their defences by pleading laches and acquiescence by way of defence generally. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Charles Sparrow QC and G B Parker for the first, second and third defendants.
Kenneth Mynett QC, Peter Northcote and Julian Gibson-Watt for the sixth defendant.
Alexander Irvine for the plaintiff.

Cur adv vult

8th December. RUSSELL LJ read the following judgment of the court. These interlocutory appeals from a decision of Goff J dated 20th April 1971 raise procedural questions on which there is a dearth of authority, and we thought it right to take time to consider the form of our judgment.

The background of the case relates to the management of the affairs of a private company; it contains more human interest than the matters for immediate decision, involving the alleged misappropriation many years ago by one Harold Squire, a shareholder and director of the company, of several hundreds of thousands of pounds of the company's money, and his departure with much of his alleged ill-gotten gains to Mexico and points south in the form of diamonds and money. Attempts to obtain his extradition failed. Ultimately he returned in 1962 to this country, and served six months for tax frauds in connection with the company. During his absence those concerned with the management of the company asserted the company's lien on his shares in respect of the sums said to be owing (as above indicated) by him to the company, and pursuant to that lien the company purported to sell in February 1948 his shares to his brother Percy Squire who had been his co-director and held the other half of the shares, his brother's wife and his son at 8s per share, a price offered after a valuation made at 6s per share. In July 1963 the company issued a writ against Harold claiming £500,000 odd damages for fraudulent conversion. In July 1964 Harold issued a writ challenging the disposal of his shares, the claim being based on a conspiracy to cheat and defraud him and asserting a sale at a gross undervalue. The defendants were Percy, his wife and son, and the company; some of the shares having been transferred to the trustees of a settlement those trustees were later joined, since the plaintiff sought to recapture the shares. At some date which is not material Harold died and his daughter as his legal personal representative took his place. The two actions came on for hearing together by agreement, although not formally consolidated, in June 1970. We are only concerned with the action by Harold.

At that stage the plaintiff's claim was framed as follows, so far as now material:

'6. In or about 1947 and onwards the Defendants . . . and each of them wrongfully and fraudulently conspired and agreed together to cheat and defraud the Plaintiff . . .

^a Paragraph 6 as re-amended is set out at p 894 a, post a '7. In pursuance and execution of the said conspiracy or alternatively jointly and severally the Defendants... did the following overt acts: (a) That the Defendant Company did by written Notice dated 3rd January, 1948 to the Plaintiff give him notice that unless he paid to the Defendant Company the b amount of his alleged indebtedness namely £392,197.15.od. within 30 days after the 1st January 1948 the Defendant Company would proceed to enforce its lien on his shares standing solely in his name or jointly in his and the First-named Defendant's name by the sale of such shares under Article 30 aforesaid. (b) That on a date which the Plaintiff is unable to particularise until Discovery herein the Second-named Defendant offered to the Defendant Company to purchase 1000 shares of the 1882 shares standing in the Plaintiff's sole name at a price of 8/- per share which said price was grossly below the true and fair value of the c said shares. The Plaintiff is unable to give the true and fair value of the shares until inquiries are made and accounts taken herein. (c) That on a date which the Plaintiff is unable to particularise until Discovery herein the Third-named Defendant offered to the Defendant Company to purchase 882 shares of the 1882 shares standing in the Plaintiff's sole name at a price of 8/- per share which said price was again grossly below the true and fair value of the said d shares. (d) That on the 3rd day of February 1948 at a meeting of Directors of the Defendant Company at which the First-named Defendant who at all material times was a director of the Defendant Company was present the Defendant Company purported to resolve that the Defendant Company should exercise its lien on the shares in the Company held by the Plaintiff for his alleged debt of £392,197.15.od. that such shares should be sold and the proceeds thereof

e credited in reduction of the Plaintiff's alleged indebtedness to the Defendant Company. At all material times the Defendant Company and the First-named Defendant knew that the Plaintiff was not indebted to the Defendant Company in the said or any sum. (e) That on the 3rd Day of February 1948 the First-named Defendant offered to purchase the interest of the Plaintiff in the 2072 shares standing in their joint names as aforesaid at the price of 8/- per share which f said price was again grossly below the true and fair value of the said shares.
(f) That on the 3rd day of February 1948 the Defendant Company resolved that the above 3 offers be accepted and accordingly the names of the Second and Third Defendants were entered in the Register of Members in respect of their shareholding and the name of the Plaintiff was struck out in respect of his g joint-holding with the First-named Defendant. (g) That afterwards on a date which the Plaintiff is unable to particularise the sum of £1167.4.0. representing the proceed of sale of the Plaintiff's interest in his shares was credited to the Defendant Company.'

As indicated Harold sought to set aside the disposal of his shares, rectification of the register, and damages and other consequential relief. Apparently, until six days before the trial opened, the defendants, while disclosing certain documents, had h withheld them from inspection as allegedly privileged. As the trial developed those advising the plaintiff for one reason or another decided that it was desirable not to rely solely on the pleaded conspiracy to cheat and defraud but to introduce by amendment allegations of breach of duty by the company in its exercise of its powers of sale, an illegal reduction of capital, and an illegal financial aid to the acquisition of its own shares. The projected amendments were put forward in more than one j way, but finally on the 12th day of the trial application for leave to amend the statement of claim was (against opposition) granted in the form the pleading now bears and the action was adjourned. The order was not drawn up, as is frequently the case; nor was any separate application made for leave to deliver an amended defence, it being assumed on all hands that such delivery was open to the defendants.

The amendments to the statement of claim, for which leave was given, resulted in it being in the following form. Paragraph 6 now reads:

'6. In or about 1947 and onwards the Defendants (other than the Fourth-named and Fifth-named Defendants—hereinafter together called "The Trustees") and each of them wrongfully and fraudulently conspired and agreed together to cheat and defraud the Plaintiff, and further or alternatively to cause and procure the Defendant Company to act in breach of duty and unlawfully to the injury of the Plaintiff as appears from paragraphs 9-16 (inclusive) hereof.'

Paragraph 7 was in the same form (including its reference to 'the said conspiracy') but there was added sub-paragraph (h) in the following terms:

'(h) Reliance will also be placed on all of the documents, facts and matters pleaded in paragraphs 10-14 (inclusive) hereof.'

Paragraph 9 was added as follows:

'9. Further or alternatively it was in law the duty of the Defendant Company in enforcing its lien over the aforesaid shares held or held jointly by the Plaintiff by the sale thereof to exercise such power of sale in good faith, with a due and prudent regard to the interest of the Plaintiff and with fair and reasonable precaution to ensure that a proper price was realised for the said shares.'

Paragraph 10 referred to certain documents. Paragraph 11 was in the following terms:

'11. As appears or is to be inferred from all the documents aforesaid the Defendant Company in exercising its power of sale of the said shares acted wrongfully and in breach of its aforesaid duty.'

It then gave particulars of facts alleged to support the contention of a sale in breach of duty. Paragraph 12 alleged that the relevant transactions involved an illegal reduction of capital and an illegal provision of financial assistance by the company for the purchase of the shares, and were, therefore, void. Paragraph 13 alleged that the transactions involved an illegal and void forfeiture of the shares. Paragraph 14 asserted that the notice given to the plaintiff in 1948 in connection with his shares was an illegal and, therefore, ineffective notice of intention to forfeit his shares. It will be recalled that paras 10 to 14 were embodied in the new para 7 (h); and paras 9 to 16 were referred to in the new para 6.

This resulted in amended defences by the first three defendants and the company which were a complete rewriting. We need not go through the details of the defences and their denials, for only one paragraph is in question. In the original defences no point was taken based on the time that had elapsed since the matters complained of; there was no pleading of laches, acquiescence, or limitation of actions. It may be that the defendants then preferred to meet an attack on their honesty head on and confidently. Be that as it may, in the amended defences, and we take that of the first three defendants as sufficient example, is a paragraph in these terms:

'14. If necessary these Defendants will rely on the laches and acquiescence of the Plaintiff and on the provisions of the Limitation Act 1939.'

We have mentioned that no order permitting amendment of the statement of claim was drawn up. However in an order dated 31st July 1970 for security for costs by the plaintiff the following provision was inserted:

'BUT IT IS ORDERED that notwithstanding the immediately foregoing provision of this Order the Defendants Percy James Aldritt Squire Muriel Squire Gordon Peter James Squire and Henry Squire and Sons Limited be at liberty on or before 10th August 1970 or subsequently within 4 days after service of this Order to serve on the Plaintiff such Defences or amended Defences to this Action as they may be advised.'

a This language in terms recognised that there was no limit to the extent to which the defendants were at liberty to introduce new allegations and contentions in the course of amending their defences following the delivery of the amended statement of claim. Goff J, however, in the order now appealed from, corrected that under the slip rule so that it should refer quite neutrally to service of defences.

b Before Goff J it was contended for the plaintiff that, while the defendants were well entitled by amendment to plead (as amendment consequential on the amendments to the statement of claim) laches, acquiescence and limitation in respect of the alleged breaches of duty and alleged illegalities, they were not entitled so to plead in respect of the fraudulent conspiracy, unless they made a substantive application for leave so to do, which might fail or might succeed only on terms. The defendants contended that when leave was obtained by the plaintiff to amend the statement of claim this resulted automatically in an unlimited ability in the c defendants to amend their defences as they thought fit. Alternatively the defendants contended that if this was wrong, and their consequential ability to amend was limited to the introduction of matters that have been described as consequential on the changes introduced into the statement of claim in its amended form, then the plea of laches, acquiescence and limitation was consequential in that sense in respect
d also of the allegation of fraudulent conspiracy. Goff J ruled against the wider contention of the defendants, but concluded that on the narrower approach neither side was wholly correct. He held that the defendants were entitled to plead laches and acquiescence in connection with the conspiracy, but not limitation; if they wished to plead limitation in that connection they would have to make a separate and substantive application for leave to amend.

e As a consequence we have two appeals, by the first three defendants and by the company defendant, asserting (1) that their ability to amend was unlimited and, (2) that in any event if the narrower approach is correct the whole plea including limitation is available to them as consequential on the amendments touching fraudulent conspiracy. We have also a cross-appeal by the plaintiff supporting the f judge on the narrower approach but contending that he should not have allowed the plea of laches and acquiescence in relation to the conspiracy. In the course of the appeal it emerged that neither side found themselves able to support the intermediate solution favoured by the judge. As a consequence it was made plain that success or failure of the cross-appeal would follow successful or unsuccessful resistance to the appeals. Accordingly we have only two problems to decide. The first is whether, when a plaintiff is given leave to amend his statement of claim, the defendant is at g liberty to amend his defence without limit as he may be advised. The second is, if that broad proposition is not correct, what is the narrower proposition, and does it enable the defendants to plead laches, acquiescence and limitation of action to the allegation of fraudulent conspiracy in this case, or does it not?

We turn first to the wider submission. It extends to this; that whatever the amendment allowed by the court to the statement of claim, however slight, the h defendant is given carte blanche to introduce any amendment that he chooses, even when, if the defendant had independently applied to make the amendment, he would not have been allowed it, or would only have been allowed it on perhaps stringent terms as to costs including (for example) the payment of all costs up to the date of amendment. We are not prepared to accept that submission. It is apparently the fact that, under RSC Ord 20, r 3, if a plaintiff takes advantage of sub-r (1) before i close of pleadings to amend his statement of claim once without leave, the defendant is empowered by sub-r (2) to amend his defence without leave or limit. Although r 4 does enable the propriety of such an amendment to the statement of claim to be challenged before the court, the particular reference in r 4 to r 3 (1) does not enable amendments to the defence in such case to be so challenged. The predecessor of RSC Ord 20, r 3 (RSC Ord 28) shows that this is not accidental. The notes in the Supreme Court Practice state the situation too widely. But this situation, obtaining necessarily at an early stage in any proceedings, does nothing in our view to suggest that at a later stage, when the statement of claim has been amended with leave, the defendant has or should have a similar carte blanche. a

For the defendants it was argued that when the amended statement of claim is delivered it is a new and different pleading as a whole, and that the defendant should not be supervised or dictated to by the court in deciding how to plead to this new pleading—how to defend himself. He should be at liberty to plead anew and quite generally. It is not to the amendments that he pleads but to the whole statement of claim in its new form. The defendant, when amendments to the statement of claim are allowed by the court, is not then required to table his proposed amendments for consideration by the court; in practice he simply amends in due time and delivers his amended defence. If his ability to amend is in any way restricted it must result in great inconvenience and proliferation of proceedings, as leading to applications (such as the present) requiring close analysis and decision whether the defendant has overstepped the limits, followed possibly (if he is found to have done so) by a further substantive application by the defendant for leave to amend further to the extent of the excess. An application (it was argued) such as the present one is unknown, which points to an unlimited power to amend the defence. Maybe there are some undesirable features of an unlimited right to amend; but the whole question (it was said) is one of procedure and convenience should tip the scale in its favour. In further support of these arguments we were referred to four or five cases; but we cannot derive guidance from them. b

For the plaintiff it was contended that the right of a defendant to amend in such circumstances was, without special leave, limited to making amendments consequential on the amendments made to the statement of claim. Some criticism having been directed in the course of debate to the word consequential, a definition was, we understand, found acceptable to both sides in the formula that if the right to amend is limited, the extent to which it is limited is that it does not permit amendments of the defence which relate only to those allegations or contentions contained in the statement of claim that are not affected by amendments to the latter. For the plaintiff it was argued, correctly in our view, that apart from RSC Ord 20 a defendant always requires leave to amend his defence; that the need for leave is inconsistent with an unqualified ability to amend the defence after leave is given to amend the statement of claim; although the need for leave is consistent with a universal practice of leave being assumed to be given for consequential amendments as defined above, since justice plainly requires such limited leave. Further (it was contended) it would be unjust that a defendant should, by the slightest amendment permitted to the statement of claim, be able to avoid the imposition of stringent terms on an independent application for leave to amend the defence, or even a refusal of leave. For the defendants to argue that, because the amended statement of claim can be described as a new pleading, the right to the defendant to amend is at large is (it was said) a non sequitur. The fact that, when the plaintiff is given leave to amend his statement of claim, the defendant is not then and there required to formulate the amendments to his defence is precisely because it is assumed that the amendments will be limited and consequential. The defendants' argument (it was said) would confer rights on the defendants wholly unconnected with that which was the sole cause of the ability to amend the defence, i.e. the leave to make particular amendments to the statement of claim. c

Reference was made to Bullen and Leake¹—names at which even Chancery practitioners have been known to bend the knee—where the following is found: d

'Where the Statement of Claim is amended under an order giving leave to amend, such amendment does not, in the absence of special terms in the order, give the defendant any additional time for pleading his Defence or entitle him a to amend a defence already delivered. Accordingly, when an application is made for leave to amend, care should be taken by the opposite party to have it imposed as a term of the order, if any, giving such leave that any alteration or amendment of his own pleading (if any) already delivered which may be necessitated by the amendment of the opponent's pleading may be made by him, otherwise a summons for leave to make such amendment or alterations may be necessary.'

¹ Precedents of Pleadings, 11th Edn, p 64 e

b Atkin's Court Forms² suggests that on such an occasion leave to amend is given in terms, but without saying on the one hand that it is leave to make consequential amendments, nor on the other that it is leave to amend as the defendant may be advised. But costs are referred to as 'costs of any consequent amendment' and see Summons Form 44 which speaks of costs 'of the amendments consequential thereon'. No other textbooks (e.g. Seton's Judgments and Orders) apparently throw any light on the matter.

c In our judgment the arguments advanced by the plaintiff are to be preferred, and the leave to amend the defence in circumstances such as the present is limited to those amendments that are consequential in the sense of the formula above-mentioned. We think, however, that in practice the strict requirements referred to in Bullen and Leake are seldom followed, and that it is commonly and properly assumed that leave to amend the statement of claim involves without mention a leave to amend consequentially the defence.

d We turn now to the particular question whether the allegations of laches, acquiescence and limitation of actions relate only to a conspiracy that is not affected by the amendments to the statement of claim, and accordingly, should not be allowed. The answer to this seems to us to be reasonably plain. We have already referred to the amendments to the statement of claim. Paragraph 6 of the statement of claim as amended, and the addition of para 7 (h), in terms plead a different and wider conspiracy—namely one to cheat and defraud and to cause and procure the company to act in breach of duty and unlawfully as appears from the new paras 9 to 16. Alternatively it alleges as a new and separate conspiracy the addition to the first conspiracy. It was argued for the plaintiff that the additions to para 6 were really irrelevant and could be ignored, leaving para 7 (h) as merely an addition to the overt acts of a conspiracy to defraud the plaintiff by procuring a sale of the plaintiff's shares at a gross undervalue. But the fact remains that the amended paras 6 and 7 are there in the form summarised; they cannot be ignored; any attempt further to amend the statement of claim would be for present purposes too late. It seems to us that it is impossible to say that the pleas of laches, acquiescence and limitation of actions, if now applied to the conspiracy or conspiracies now pleaded, related only to allegations or contentions contained in the statement of claim that are not affected by the amendments to the latter.

e Consequently in our judgment the appeals should be allowed, so that the defences shall stand amended as delivered, and the cross-appeal should be dismissed.

h Appeals allowed; cross-appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: George C Carter & Co (for the first, second and third defendants); Peacock & Goddard, agents for Rigbey, Loose & Mills, Birmingham (for the sixth defendant); A Kramer & Co (for the plaintiff).

Mary Rose Plummer Barrister.

i 2 (2nd Edn) Vol 32, Form 45

Re B (M F) (an infant) Re D (an infant)

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SALMON, EDMUND DAVIES AND STAMP LJJ

9th NOVEMBER 1971

Adoption – Welfare of infant – Severance of adopted child from natural parents – Desirability – Circumstances in which adoption order may be made even though child will continue to see natural parents.

In March 1968 two boys, then aged four and one, were removed from their parents' home as being in need of care and protection and were fostered to the appellants with whom they had subsequently lived for three years. The appellants had shown great love and affection for the boys, who had made great strides under their care and were undoubtedly happy and extremely well cared for in their new home. The home of the natural parents ('Mr and Mrs D') was much less satisfactory; they had two babies and a little girl, Pauline, who had for a time been fostered with the appellants but who had since returned home. Mr and Mrs D were in constant financial difficulties and Mr D had difficulty in finding, or keeping, a job. The appellants applied for an adoption order in respect of the two boys. Both Mr and Mrs D gave their consent. The appellants however took the view that it would be desirable that Mr and Mrs D, for whom they had a lot of sympathy, should visit the boys from time to time and particularly that the boys should be kept in touch with their sister Pauline. The application was opposed by the county council, who took the view that it was undesirable that the boys should continue to see their natural parents after an adoption order had been made and were of opinion that it would be better for the boys to remain as foster children so that the position could remain fluid.

Held – (i) Although it was, as a rule, highly undesirable that, when an adoption order had been made, there should be any contact between the child or children and their natural parents, there was no hard and fast rule that if there were an adoption it could only be on terms that there should be a complete divorce of the children from their natural parents; each case was to be considered on its own particular facts (see p 900 d e and j and p 901 a, post); dictum of Vaisey J in Re A B (An Infant) [1949] 1 All ER at 710 and Re G (D M) (an infant) [1962] 2 All ER 546 followed.

(ii) The facts of the present case were exceptional in that (a) the appellants considered that the occasional encounter between the boys and their natural parents and their sister Pauline would be for their good, (b) the natural parents were not prepared, and were not in the position, to have the boys back, and (c) it was obvious that it would be very much more in the interests of the boys that they should stay where they had been so well cared for during the previous three years; furthermore it was doubtful whether it could conceivably be in the boys' interest to keep the position fluid by allowing them to remain as foster children since, once an adoption order had been made, their legal position vis-à-vis the appellants would be assured and the relationship between the appellants and the boys made secure; accordingly an adoption order should be made (see p 899 j, p 900 a b f g and j and p 901 a, post).

Notes

For the power to make adoption orders, see 21 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 231, para 505, and for cases on the subject, see 28 (2) Digest (Reissue) 823-826, 1353-1365.

Cases referred to in judgment

A B (An Infant), Re [1949] 1 All ER 709, 113 JP 353, sub nom Re D X (An Infant) [1949] Ch 320, 28 (2) Digest (Reissue) 823, 1354.

a G (D M) (an infant), Re [1962] 2 All ER 546, [1962] 1 WLR 730, 28 (2) Digest (Reissue) 839, 1413.

Appeal

b This was an appeal by the proposed adopters against the judgment of his Honour Judge Stansfield on 16th June 1971 whereby he refused to make an adoption order in their favour in respect of two boys aged 7 years and 4 years who had been fostered with the appellants by the local authority ('the county council'). The facts are set out in the judgment of Salmon LJ.

C Q Henriques for the appellants.

T L Dewhurst for the county council.

c

SALMON LJ. This is an appeal from an order of the county court judge refusing to make an adoption order in favour of the prospective adopters of two boys, Martin and Steven. Martin is seven years old and Steven is four years old. These two boys were removed from their parents' home as being in need of care in March 1968. They were removed by the county council. They were fostered to the appellants, the prospective adopters, who have had the two boys with them ever since, that is for just over three years. The appellants have indisputably showered love and affection on these children and given them the most excellent care all the time they have had them. The elder boy was in a very poor way and retarded when he went to them. The younger boy was better but not very well either. The children have made great strides under the appellants' care and are undoubtedly happy and extremely well cared for in their present home.

e The appellants have two little girls living at home who are adopted children, one nine and one eight years of age. The house in which they live has excellent accommodation, and no criticism could be made of the children's environment, nor of the way in which they are treated. In one of the reports submitted by the welfare officer of the county council, the fact is referred to that the home is 'untidy'. Perhaps that is unfortunate. No one, however, suggests that it is dirty. The kitchen could be better, and it is said that its hygienic arrangements are not ideal. I cannot think that this is a significant factor when one is considering whether adoption by the appellants is in the best interests of these two boys.

f The natural parents (I will call them 'Mr and Mrs D') have a home which is nothing like as satisfactory as the appellants' home. They have two babies, one born in October 1968 and one in 1969, and a little girl called Pauline, who for a time was taken from their care and fostered to the appellants. She has gone home, and Mr and Mrs D are in constant financial difficulties. Moreover, Mr D has unfortunately suffered from psychiatric difficulties and finds it impossible to keep a job, or at any rate to keep one for long. Both Mr and Mrs D consent to the proposed adoption. The learned judge, in the exercise of his discretion, refused to make the order. Why he did so is not at all clear to me and certainly does not appear from his judgment or from the notes that he made of the proceedings before him.

g I have assumed that he founded himself on the county council's report. Apparently the view which the county council take is that it would be better for the status quo to be preserved, that is to say for the children to remain as foster children with the appellants. It would have the advantage, so the county council think, of keeping the position fluid. There is no doubt that the position would remain fluid, but I am by no means persuaded that that fluidity could conceivably be in the interests of the children. Once an adoption order is made, then the children's position vis-à-vis the appellants is assured. The appellants would have the same legal obligation to the children as if they were their own natural children. I am not suggesting for a moment that they would not in any event continue to treat the children with the same affection and take the same interest in them and accept the same responsibility for them as they do now; and, of course, I know that the county council has no present intention of taking the children away from them. But the appellants feel—and indeed they feel rightly—that just as the children would have no legal rights against them unless an adoption order is made, so they would have no legal right to keep the children should the county council, in their wisdom, decide to remove the children in the future. I would have thought the insecurity which they not unnaturally feel would be just as unsatisfactory from the point of view of their relations with the children as it would be unsatisfactory for the children to have no security and no legal rights as against their adopters. a

j

The only other point that I should deal with is the fact that the appellants take the view that Mr and Mrs D, for whom they have much sympathy, should from time to time visit the children, and particularly that these two boys should be kept in touch with their sister Pauline. It is quite true that in law Pauline will cease to be their sister after the adoption order is made, but Pauline will remain their natural sister and no order of any court can alter that fact. b

As a rule, it is highly undesirable that after an adoption order is made there should be any contact between the child or children and their natural parents. This is the view which has been taken, and rightly taken, by adoption societies and local authorities as it has been by the courts in dealing with questions of adoption. There is, however, no hard and fast rule that if there is an adoption it can only be on the terms that there should be a complete divorce of the children from their natural parents. I refer to the case of *Re G (D M) (an infant)*¹, which in effect followed the dictum of Vaisey J in *Re A B (An Infant)*². Although the courts will pay great attention to the general principle to which I have referred, namely, that it is desirable in normal circumstances for there to be a complete break, each case has to be considered on its own particular facts. c

The facts of this case are exceptional. Although it may be—I know not—that it would be a good plan if there were a complete break here between Mr and Mrs D and the two boys, the appellants (who I suspect know a good deal more about the situation than I do) consider that the occasional encounters between Mr and Mrs D and the boys and Pauline is for their good. d

It is suggested that in the future the fact that the two boys know the appellants as 'Mummy' and 'Daddy' and their parents as 'Daddy D' and 'Mummy D' may lead to stresses and strains. Mr and Mrs D are not prepared to have these children back. It is all they can do to cope with the three young ones they have at home now, and without any disrespect to Mr and Mrs D, through circumstances over which they have no control, it is obvious that it would be very much more in the interests of the two boys to stay where they have been so well cared for during the last three years. e

There is only one other matter that I should mention although I am certain that the county council does not regard it as a reason for opposing the adoption order. The fact is this, that unfortunately the appellants did not go through the usual procedure of asking for the consent of the county council before they made their application to the court. No doubt it would have been better had they done so, but of course it cannot have made any difference to the attitude which the county council adopt. Their opposition to the order is apparently based solely on the unusual circumstances that the relationship with the natural parents is not and will not be completely severed. I have no doubt myself that it is in the best interests of the children, giving full weight to that factor, that an adoption order should be made rather than refused, and I would allow the appeal accordingly. f

EDMUND DAVIES LJ. And so would I, and I have nothing to add. g

1 [1962] 2 All ER 546, [1962] 1 WLR 730

2 [1949] 1 All ER 709 at 710, [1949] Ch at 320 h

STAMP LJ. I too agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Canter & Martin, agents for F W Ollier, Wilner & Co, Manchester (for the appellants); Solicitor to the Lancashire County Council.

Harold J Hughes Esq Barrister.

Phelan v Back

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND GRIFFITHS JJ

15th DECEMBER 1971

Criminal law – Evidence – Witness – Recall of prosecution witness after defence counsel's closing speech – Quarter sessions – Hearing of appeal by recorder – Recall of witness by recorder to refresh his memory of witness's testimony – Absence of note of witness's testimony – Whether recorder entitled to recall witness – Whether discretion to do so properly exercised.

A recorder of quarter sessions, hearing an appeal against a conviction by magistrates, at the conclusion of all the evidence and after the speech of counsel for the appellant, recalled and further questioned a prosecution witness in order to refresh his memory of that witness's testimony. There was no shorthand note available. The recorder then invited counsel for the appellant to cross-examine the witness and to address the court further. Counsel for the appellant declined both invitations. The recorder found the prosecution case proved and dismissed the appeal. If the witness in question had not been recalled the recorder would not have found the prosecution case proved.

Held – (i) A recorder or chairman of quarter sessions when hearing an appeal, and sitting alone or with magistrates and without a jury, had a discretion to allow evidence to be called after the normal point at which such evidence would be excluded provided the interests of justice required it, and if in the exercise of his discretion he thought it fit and proper to do so (see p 904 c d and h, post).

(ii) In the present case the recorder was entitled to refresh his memory on those parts of the evidence of which he had no note and that being so it was impossible to say that he had exercised his discretion wrongly in doing so (see p 904 e f and h, post).

Dictum of Lord Parker CJ in Webb v Leadbetter [1966] 2 All ER at 115 applied.

Dictum of Avory J in R v Sullivan [1922] All ER Rep at 432 considered.

Notes

For the powers of a judge to recall witnesses, see 10 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 423, para 778, and for cases on the calling of evidence after the close of the defence in criminal proceedings, see 14 Digest (Repl) 321-323, 3107-3130.

Cases referred to in judgment

R v Sullivan [1923] 1 KB 47, [1922] All ER Rep 431, 91 LJKB 927, 126 LT 643, 86 JP 167, 14 Digest (Repl) 322, 3124.

Saunders v Johns [1965] Crim LR 49.

Webb v Leadbetter [1966] 2 All ER 114, [1966] 1 WLR 245, 130 JP 277, Digest (Cont Vol B) 509, 607a.

Case stated

This was an appeal by case stated from an adjudication of the recorder of Plymouth (E S Fay Esq QC) made on 7th January 1971 whereby he dismissed the appeal of Stephen Paul Phelan, the appellant, against his conviction by the Plymouth justices on 3rd December 1970 on a charge preferred by the respondent, Pc Victor William John Back, that the appellant on 28th August 1970 in a public place used threatening words and behaviour, contrary to the Public Order Act 1936, s 5. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Widgery CJ.

Robin Miller for the appellant.

John Beveridge for the respondent.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated from the learned recorder of Plymouth in respect of his adjudication at Plymouth quarter sessions on 7th January 1971. The history of the matter was that a charge had been preferred against the appellant alleging that he had used threatening words and behaviour on an occasion in August 1970. The matter came before the Plymouth justices in the first instance sitting as a magistrates' court. They convicted the appellant and sentenced him to be detained in a detention centre for three months. He appealed to quarter sessions and, as I have already indicated, the matter came before the recorder on appeal on 7th January 1971. The appeal was, of course, a rehearing. What happened which has given rise to the appeal to this court is set out in the case in this way. The recorder says:

'I heard the appeal on the 7th day of January, 1971. The prosecution arose out of confused disturbances outside a youth club involving a large crowd. There was a conflict of evidence between police officer witnesses for the Respondent, and the Appellant and his witnesses. At the conclusion of counsel's speech for the Appellant I found myself unable from my note or my recollection to recall what the Respondent's principal witness had said on certain material points of detail stressed by Appellant's counsel. This witness had impressed me as a fair and reliable witness. I therefore recalled him and questioned him myself. I invited Appellant's counsel to cross-examine and to address me further: both invitations were declined. Having thus ascertained what this witness's evidence was on the material details I found the Respondent to have discharged the burden of proof beyond reasonable doubt and I dismissed the appeal against conviction. If the witness had not been recalled I could not and would not have found the case proved.'

It is contended by counsel for the appellant that the learned recorder was wrong in recalling a prosecution witness in that way, and he says with force that if that point is once established, it is clear from the case that the recorder, without the assistance of that evidence, would have allowed the appeal; accordingly he says that the appeal should be allowed in this court.

There are, of course, rules of procedure governing every court. Those rules derive from law or from convention, and there is no doubt that as a general principle such rules must be observed. That means that if the rules are not observed, or if any departure from them is to take place, that departure must be justified according to the circumstances of the particular case. We must not allow the rules to be our masters, they must remain our servants, and the authorities show a wide range of circumstances in which prosecution witnesses can be called or recalled after the close of the prosecution case. The normal rule, of course, must be that they will be called before the close of the prosecution case, but there are exceptions.

The case principally relied on by counsel for the appellant is *R v Sullivan*¹. That was a trial for murder, and on two occasions the trial judge allowed certain witnesses for the prosecution to be recalled. In the first instance they were recalled to rebut evidence given by the prisoner; later on in the course of his final speech counsel for a the accused had invited the jury to find that another person altogether had committed the murder, whereupon the judge asked that the person so accused be called in order to deny his part in it even though the time at which he was to be recalled was after counsel for the defence had made his speech. We were referred to this case principally for what was said by Avory J². He dealt with an argument which had taken place in the Court of Criminal Appeal whether these witnesses were being recalled

b to add something to what had been said before, or whether they were merely being recalled to repeat what they had said before. With regard to the law Avory J said²:

[Counsel for the appellant] contended that the two police constables were recalled for the mere purpose of stating over again the evidence which they had already given as witnesses for the prosecution. If the Court had come to the conclusion that that objection was well founded, and that these two police constables had merely been recalled for the purpose of restating that which they
c had already sworn to in their examination in chief, the Court would have been bound to hold that the recalling of the two police constables for that purpose was an irregularity, and the Court would then have had to consider whether any substantial miscarriage of justice had been occasioned thereby.'

d Counsel for the appellant contends that that which the recorder did in this case on the authority of *R v Sullivan*³ was an irregularity.

For my part I think there may be a very distinct difference in the application of these rules to a trial on indictment before a jury, and a trial before magistrates or before a recorder. Quite clearly it is most undesirable, and indeed highly irregular, in a trial before a jury to recall a witness who has already given evidence merely e for the purpose of giving the evidence again. One would wonder what the point of such an exercise would be, and in any event with a trial on indictment there is a shorthand note of the evidence and if some serious question arises as to what a witness said when in the box, the proper way no doubt to check it is to turn up the shorthand note. I have no doubt, with respect to Avory J, that what he said in *R v Sullivan*³ in describing as an irregularity the recall of a witness, merely to repeat f what he said before, is entirely correct.

In *Webb v Leadbetter*⁴ this court was concerned with a magistrates' case in which, when the parties assembled to begin the proceedings, one of two prosecution witnesses had not appeared, and rather than have an adjournment the prosecution elected to go on, relying only on the one witness who had appeared. The matter went right through, both cases were closed, the justices retired to consider their g opinion, and the missing witness then appeared with a perfectly genuine story of a car breakdown which had prevented him appearing before. The justices were invited to come back to court to hear him, not as part of the prosecution case, not even before the defence had been closed, but after the justices had retired. Lord Parker CJ, giving the leading judgment, pointed out that such an exercise of discretion was one which was not open to any properly instructed bench of magistrates. He said, h dealing with the principle of the matter⁵:

'It is, of course, quite clear, under our law that he who affirms must prove; therefore, strictly, once the prosecution have closed their case, there would be no opportunity for them to call further evidence, subject of course, to evidence in rebuttal, with which we are not concerned. Nevertheless, it does seem to me
j that there must always be some residuary discretion in the court to allow, in particular circumstances, evidence to be called, but the manner in which that

2 [1923] 1 KB at 57, [1922] All ER Rep at 432

3 [1923] 1 KB 47, [1922] All ER Rep 431

4 [1966] 2 All ER 114, [1966] 1 WLR 245

5 [1966] 2 All ER 114 at 115, [1966] 1 WLR 245 at 247

discretion is exercised must depend on the stage of the case. If one turns to indictable offences, it is perfectly clear that it has become now an established rule of law that no evidence can be called after the summing-up, and a judge who in his discretion sought to exercise his discretion by allowing evidence to be called at that stage would be acting entirely wrongly and the conviction would be quashed. The same considerations do not wholly apply in magistrates' courts, but, nevertheless, as a general rule and in the absence of some special circumstances, it would certainly be wholly wrong for the justices to purport to exercise a discretion to allow evidence to be called once they had retired, and indeed, probably, after the defence had closed their case. At an earlier stage it may well be proper to exercise the discretion in favour of allowing a witness to be called, and indeed that was suggested in a decision of this court in *Saunders v. Johns*⁶.

I would adopt that reasoning, not merely in regard to magistrates' courts, but also in regard to quarter sessions, and I have no doubt that there is an element of discretion in the recorder or chairman of quarter sessions when sitting alone, or with magistrates, when hearing an appeal and when not sitting with a jury, to allow evidence to be called after the normal point at which such evidence would be excluded, if the interests of justice require it, and if in the exercise of his discretion he thinks it is proper so to do. We have been referred to other cases in which on a trial by jury attempts have been made to introduce fresh evidence after the close of the prosecution case, and I do not propose to refer to those cases, because I think they deal with a significantly different situation from that which prevails here.

The short point here, once it is established that the recorder had an element of discretion, is whether he exercised his discretion in a way which this court ought to reject and set aside. In my judgment he was perfectly entitled to refresh his memory on those parts of the evidence of which he had no note. He could not refer to a short-hand note because none existed, and although it might perhaps have been wiser if he had asked counsel in the first instance to see whether they agreed as to the evidence in question, I find it quite impossible to say that he exercised his discretion wrongly in doing what he did in these circumstances.

I am not unimpressed by the fact that when the prosecution witnesses had been recalled and counsel for the appellant was given an opportunity to cross-examine and address the recorder further, that opportunity was not accepted. I feel that if in fact some significant difference in the evidence given at the end of the trial to that given by the witness when first called had appeared, it would have reflected itself in cross-examination and address from counsel for the appellant. In my judgment the contention that there is here an error of law is not made out and I would dismiss the appeal.

ASHWORTH J. I agree.

GRIFFITHS J. I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Bower, Cotton & Bower, agents for Bond, Pearce & Co, Plymouth (for the appellant); Gregory, Rowcliffe & Co, agents for J A Pearce & Major, Plymouth (for the respondent).

Gordon H Scott Esq Barrister.

Birch v Thomas

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, MEGAW AND STEPHENSON LJ

10th DECEMBER 1971

a Negligence – Defence – Volenti non fit injuria – Consent to risk to injury – Agreement to exclude liability – Passenger in vehicle – Notice on windscreen that passengers riding at own risk and on condition no claim made against driver – Driver informing passenger that he is ‘not insured for passenger liability’ – Driver pointing to notice and telling passenger it is to do with the insurance – Passenger injured in collision caused by driver’s negligence in overtaking car when dangerous – Driver exempt from liability – Driver doing all that is c reasonably necessary to draw limitation of liability to passenger’s attention – No misrepresentation as to disclaimer of responsibility for driver’s negligence – Driver’s conduct within protection of notice.

The defendant who was only 19 was not insured for passenger liability; his insurance company had declined to give him this cover because of his age. On the insurance d agent’s advice the defendant had stuck a notice in his car, on the inside of the windscreen on the passenger’s side of the car, which read: ‘Passengers ride at their own risk and on the condition that no claims shall be made against the driver or owner.’ The notice was three inches long and one inch wide, and was printed in red letters less than one-sixteenth of an inch high. One evening the defendant and three other young e men including the plaintiff wanted to visit a social club. They discussed whose car to take. The defendant said to the three that he was not insured for passenger liability but the plaintiff decided to travel in the defendant’s car rather than in another vehicle. When they got into the car the defendant pointed to the notice and informed the plaintiff that it was the sticker ‘to do with the insurance’. At the time it was f daylight so there was no difficulty about reading the notice. Later that evening, when the plaintiff was travelling as a passenger in the defendant’s car, there was a collision in which the plaintiff sustained severe head and brain injuries causing amnesia. He brought an action against the defendant for damages for negligence in overtaking another car when it was dangerous to do so. At the hearing of the action the defendant admitted negligence but contended that he was not liable because the plaintiff was being carried at his own risk. Because of his amnesia the plaintiff could give no g evidence about reading the notice. The judge held that the defendant was not liable for the negligence. He found that the fact that the defendant was not insured for passengers had been brought to the plaintiff’s attention; that the defendant had pointed out to the plaintiff the notice in the car when they set off; that the form of notice was distinct and the inference to be drawn was that the plaintiff must have read it. The plaintiff appealed.

h Held – The defendant was exempt from liability for his negligence, and the appeal would be dismissed, for the following reasons—i (i) even assuming that the judge was not entitled to infer that the plaintiff had read the notice, the defendant had done all that was reasonable in the circumstances to bring to the plaintiff’s attention the condition in the notice; he had not relied on the mere presence on the windscreen of the sticker, which by itself would not have been sufficient to exclude liability; he had informed the plaintiff that he was not insured against passenger liability and on getting into the car had pointed out the notice and said that it was to do with insurance so that if the plaintiff had read the notice he would have seen that the defendant was not insured against passenger liability (see p 907 f to j and p 909 f and h, post);

(ii) there was no misrepresentation by the defendant, for when he said to the plaintiff that he was not insured against passenger liability that meant that if the passenger was injured, even by the negligence of the defendant, the passenger could have no claim against the defendant (see p 907 j to p 908 a and p 909 g and h, post).

(iii) the defendant's conduct in overtaking when it was dangerous to do so was not conduct outside the protection of the notice; it was the very sort of situation in which the exemption was intended to apply, and was not conduct outside the contemplation of the parties in respect of which, under the doctrine of fundamental breach of contract, the defendant could not have relied on the exemption (see p 908 b to d and p 909 c and h, post).

Notes

For agreements to exclude or limit liability for negligence, see 28 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 86, 87, para 91, and for cases on the application of the defence of volenti non fit injuria, see 36 Digest (Repl) 150-155, 781-818.

Cases referred to in judgments

Bennett v Tugwell (an infant) [1971] 2 All ER 248, [1971] 2 QB 267, [1971] 2 WLR 847.

Curtis v Chemical Cleaning and Dyeing Co Ltd [1951] 1 All ER 631, [1951] 1 KB 805, 3 Digest (Repl) 103, 289.

Kenyon, Son & Craven Ltd v Baxter Hoare & Co Ltd and another [1971] 2 All ER 708, [1971] 1 WLR 519.

McCawley v Furness Railway Co (1872) LR 8 QB 57, 42 LJQB 4, 27 LT 485, 37 JP 358, 8 Digest (Repl) 111, 718.

Appeal

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Clive Roosevelt Birch, from the judgment of Talbot J, given on 31st March 1971, whereby the plaintiff's action against the defendant, Roger David Thomas (an infant, through his next friend and guardian ad litem, Mervyn John Thomas), for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff in a road accident in which he was a passenger in the defendant's car, was dismissed. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

Conrad Dehn QC and Hywel Moseley for the plaintiff.

J O Roch for the defendant.

LORD DENNING MR. On 5th May 1967 there was a bad motor accident in the county of Glamorgan. There were a couple of young men in an Austin Mini motor car. The driver, Mr Roger Thomas, was about 19 years of age. He had as his passenger with him Mr Clive Birch, who was about the same age, a young marine engineer. Just before midnight, this car attempted to overtake another car. It came head on into collision with an approaching vehicle. The passenger, Mr Birch, was very seriously injured, especially in his head and brain. He suffered a personality change. If he is entitled to damages, it would be five figures at least.

Now Mr Birch, the passenger, brings an action against the driver, Mr Thomas. There is no doubt that Mr Thomas was negligent. He pleaded guilty in the magistrates' court to a charge of careless driving. At the hearing of this action negligence was admitted on his behalf. But Mr Thomas says that he is not liable because Mr Birch was being carried at his own risk. The judge has held that Mr Thomas is not liable. Mr Birch appeals to this court.

It appears that Mr Thomas, who was only 19 years of age, had previously been covered by an insurance company, but that company had gone into liquidation. So he went to another insurance company. This new company covered him for ordinary liability to third persons but they declined to cover him for passenger liability because of his age. On this account the insurance agent advised him 'to put a sticker in the car'. Mr Thomas heeded that advice. He got a sticker from the father of a friend of his who had a fleet of lorries. He stuck it on the windscreen inside on the passenger side so that it could be seen by the passenger. It was three inches long and a one inch wide. The print was in red letters less than one-sixteenth of an inch high. It said:

'PASSENGERS RIDE AT THEIR OWN RISK AND ON THE CONDITION THAT NO CLAIMS SHALL BE MADE AGAINST THE DRIVER OR OWNER.'

Mr Thomas says that his practice was, if he had a passenger, to bring the sticker to the passenger's attention and to tell him that he was not insured for passenger liability.

b On this particular evening Mr Thomas and Mr Birch and two other young men decided to go to a social club. They discussed whose car to take. At the outset Mr Thomas said to the others, 'I cannot take mine because mine has got a defective tyre and I am not insured for passenger liability'. But the alternative was to ride in a van which was uncomfortable. In the result Mr Thomas decided to take his own car. He said to Mr Birch, 'You can travel with me or travel in the back of the van. It's entirely up to you.' Mr Birch decided to travel with Mr Thomas. Mr Thomas said: 'I pointed to the sticker informing [Mr Birch] that that was the sticker to do with the insurance.' They drove off. Later on that evening there was this accident.

The judge made these findings of fact. He said that he was satisfied—

d 'that the fact that [Mr Thomas] was not insured for passengers was brought to [Mr Birch's] attention. I am also satisfied that [Mr Thomas] pointed out to [Mr Birch] the notice in the car at the time they set off in the car. Furthermore the notice was there to be seen, its form was distinct, and the inference I draw is that [Mr Birch] must have read it.'

e Counsel for Mr Birch challenged that finding insofar as the judge inferred that the plaintiff must have read the notice. Mr Birch himself could give no evidence on it. He was so badly injured that he had a retrograde amnesia going back for two months. It should not be found against him that he had in fact read it. I think there is much force in that criticism. I would not myself be prepared to infer that Mr Birch read the notice. Then what is the position? It is clear law that a driver giving a lift to a passenger is entitled to limit his liability by conditions, so long as he does all that f is reasonable to bring them to the attention of the passenger. So the question becomes this: did Mr Thomas do all that was reasonable to bring the condition to the notice of Mr Birch? I am not at all satisfied that the mere sticking of this notice on the wind-screen would by itself be sufficient. It was not very prominent. Many a passenger would not notice it; or, if he did, he might not read it. But the sticker does not stand alone. The important thing here is that Mr Thomas said to Mr Birch: 'I am not g insured against passenger liability.' Counsel for Mr Birch submitted that those words were not sufficient to exclude the liability of Mr Thomas personally. Counsel emphasised the word 'insured'. He suggested that the words meant: 'If I am negligent you will not be able to claim against the insurance company', leaving it to be inferred that he could claim against the driver personally. That is a lawyer's construction of the words. It is not the meaning which an ordinary man would put on them.

h If any driver tells a passenger 'I am not insured against passenger liability', it is as good as telling him: 'Mark you, you ride at your own risk.' Everyone knows nowadays that, if you are injured in a motor accident, you will recover if the defendant is insured, but you will not recover if he is not insured. At all events you will not recover when the driver is a young man of 19 with no visible assets.

j The other thing was that Mr Thomas, when they got into the car, pointed to this sticker and said: 'That is to do with the insurance.' That means the same thing. It means that: 'If you read that sticker you will see, as I told you, I am not insured against passenger liability.'

Counsel for Mr Birch rather suggested there was some misrepresentation by Mr Thomas. He referred to *Curtis v Chemical Cleaning and Dyeing Co Ltd*¹. But I do not think Mr Thomas made any misrepresentation at all. He simply told Mr Birch the truth, that he was not insured against passenger liability. That means the same as the sticker, 'Passengers ride at their own risk.' It meant that, if the passenger was injured, even by the negligence of the driver, he would have no claim against the driver: see *McCawley v Furness Railway Co*², which was quoted by Ackner J in *Bennett v Tugwell (an infant)*³.

Counsel for Mr Birch made one remaining point. He said this was no ordinary negligence by Mr Thomas. It was conduct so reckless that it was outside the protection of this clause altogether. He reminded us of the cases about fundamental breach and the like (the latest of which is *Kenyon, Son & Craven Ltd v Baxter Hoare & Co Ltd*⁴), where it has been held that a person cannot rely on an exemption clause if his conduct, or the way in which he performs the contract, is such as to be totally different from that which was contemplated in the contract. There seems to me to be a short answer to that point. It was not pleaded, nor was it taken below. In the court below the claim was put against Mr Thomas as a case of ordinary negligence. So in truth it was. He was overtaking when it was dangerous to do so. That is the very sort of situation in which this exemption was intended to apply. In order to come within the doctrine of fundamental breach, the conduct would have to be something quite outside the contemplation of the parties, such as the instance I put in the course of the argument of a man who drove off the road across a field, or who drove up the wrong carriageway, and met with disaster. If a driver was guilty of that sort of conduct, he could not rely on the exception clause.

So that it seems to me that none of the arguments of counsel for Mr Birch prevail. This is just one of those cases where it is reasonable for a party to stipulate for exemption from liability, and it is just for the court to give effect to the stipulation. If a young man like Mr Thomas is not insured against passenger liability, he should give notice to any passenger that he travels at his own risk. Otherwise he might well be ruined by the liability which would be incurred. Especially when damages are assessed at figures which only insurance companies can afford. It will be altogether different when the Motor Vehicles (Passenger Insurance) Act 1971 comes into operation; but that does not come into operation until 1st December 1972. When that Act comes into force every driver will have to be insured against liability to passengers; but up until then a man who is not insured against passenger liability is wise to put on a sticker such as this, so as to protect himself from claims such as this.

I think the judge was right and I would dismiss the appeal.

MEGAW LJ. The part of the evidence which seems to me to be relevant for purposes of this appeal is within a very small compass. The defendant, Mr Thomas, giving his evidence-in-chief, had explained how he had told the plaintiff, amongst others, that his car was not insured. The question had then arisen whether or not the plaintiff was going to travel with the defendant in the defendant's car, because of the discomfort which they had been suffering in the van in which they had previously travelled; and at that stage the defendant had said to the plaintiff: 'It's entirely up to you', meaning that the plaintiff could make up his own mind whether he wanted to come in the defendant's car or not. Then came these questions and answers in the evidence, relating to a time when the defendant's car was outside the defendant's parents' home:

'Q Did he and you get into the car? A Yes.

'Q Before you drove off did you do anything? A I pointed to the sticker informing [the plaintiff] that that was the sticker to do with insurance.'

2 (1872) LR 8 QB 57

3 [1971] 2 All ER 248, [1971] 2 WLR 847

4 [1971] 2 All ER 708, [1971] 1 WLR 519

a And then the judge asked a question to make sure he had got down the answer correctly, to which the defendant replied: 'Words to that effect, yes, sir.' There was uncontradicted evidence that it was daylight, with no difficulty whatever about reading the notice on the windscreen, the notice being on a part of the windscreen where it would be directly under the eye of the plaintiff sitting in the passenger seat in the car. The defendant was accepted by the judge, who had the opportunity of seeing and hearing him, as being a witness of truth.

b On the basis of that evidence the judge's conclusion was as follows:

c 'I am also satisfied that the Defendant pointed out to the Plaintiff the notice in the car at the time they set off in the car. [That finding of fact is plainly justified by the passage in the evidence which I have read, if, as was the case, the judge accepted the defendant as a witness of truth.] Furthermore the notice was there to be seen [a finding of fact at which the judge was entitled to arrive on the evidence], its form was distinct [again it is clear from the evidence that the judge was entitled so to find], and the inference I draw is that the Plaintiff must have read it.'

d Counsel for the plaintiff in this case has suggested not merely that that is not a probable inference, but that it is an inference which is really quite unreasonable or impossible to draw. With great respect, I think that the inference which the judge drew was entirely right, and from the evidence I should have had no hesitation myself in drawing precisely the same inference. The plaintiff's attention was called to this sticker or notice; it was on the windscreen of the car directly in front of him, and I for myself should have thought that the fair, proper and almost inevitable inference from that was that the plaintiff read it. If that is so, that is, as I see it, an end of this appeal.

e Let it be assumed, however, that the judge was not entitled to draw the inference. If on the balance of probability the proper inference was that the plaintiff did not read the notice, I should agree with what Lord Denning MR has said in reaching his conclusion, namely, that the defendant did all that was reasonably necessary in the circumstances, including the particular exemption which was inherent in this notice, to bring to the plaintiff's attention that he, the defendant, was making that stipulation in respect of the plaintiff's intended purpose of using the car as the defendant's guest or passenger. So far as concerns the point made about misrepresentation, I am unable to see how the words used in the answer which I have read from the evidence, informing the plaintiff that that was the sticker 'to do with the insurance', could be regarded as being a misrepresentation by the defendant, or that it was calculated to lead the plaintiff to believe that all that was being said to him was 'I am not insured', without showing a disclaimer of responsibility if the plaintiff, as the defendant's guest in the motor car, was to suffer injury due to his negligence.

g As regards the last point made by counsel for the plaintiff, there is nothing which I wish to add to what Lord Denning MR has said. I agree that this appeal fails.

h STEPHENSON LJ. I agree with Lord Denning MR and Megaw LJ for the reasons they have given that this appeal fails. I would myself have been willing to go as far as the judge and draw the inference which he drew that the plaintiff must have read the notice had it been necessary to do so. In his judgment the judge posed three questions and gave his answers:

i '(1) Was the notice brought to the plaintiff's attention in this case? The answer to that is "Yes". (2) Was the plaintiff bound by the notice? The plaintiff was travelling by leave and licence of the defendant in the defendant's motor car, and it was a condition of the licence that he travelled at his own risk and that no claim should be made against the defendant. He was therefore in my view bound by the notice. (3) Was the notice sufficient to exclude any liability on the part of the defendant in the event of an accident due to his negligence causing injury to the plaintiff, and was he therefore protected? In my view the notice did protect him.' a

I think that the learned judge asked himself the right questions and gave the right answers. On the part of the defendant there was no misrepresentation either pleaded or proved and no fundamental breach of the terms of this gratuitous licence to carry him as a passenger either pleaded or proved. Sad as it is for the plaintiff to get nothing for the grave damage done to him by the defendant's negligence, in my judgment he unfortunately agreed to take the risk of just that, and therefore I agree that this appeal should be dismissed. b

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Tuck & Mann & Geffen, agents for John Loosemore & Co, Cardiff (for the plaintiff); R R Morgan, Sons & Grovers, Cardiff (for the defendant). c

Wendy Shockett Barrister.

Smith v Hawkins

d

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND BRIDGE JJ

15th NOVEMBER 1971

National insurance – Inspector – Powers of inspector – Power to require information for the purpose of ascertaining whether contributions payable – Employed person – Failure of employer to pay contributions – Refusal of employee to furnish information to inspector – Whether inspector having power to require employee to disclose name and address of employer – National Insurance Act 1965, s 90 (3), (4). e

S, an inspector appointed under and for the purposes of the National Insurance Act 1965, interviewed H, having cause to believe that H was an insured person for the purposes of the 1965 Act. S found that H's national insurance card for 1968-69 had not been stamped for 41 weeks. H explained that the absence of contributions for those weeks was because at the material dates he had been an employed person. Then, and on subsequent occasions, S asked H to supply him with the names and addresses of his employers for the relevant weeks. H refused to give this information. H was charged with refusing to furnish information to S, contrary to s 90 (4)^a of the 1965 Act. The justices dismissed the information on the grounds that S's powers under s 90 (3)^b of the 1965 Act to require information regarding contributions did not extend to information as to the names and addresses of H's employers. On appeal, f

Held – The obligation on an insured person under s 90 (3) to furnish information for the purpose of ascertaining whether contributions were or had been payable or had been duly paid was wide enough to enable S to ask H whether he was employed or self-employed and, if employed, to ask H for the names and addresses of his employers; accordingly the appeal would be allowed and the case sent back to the justices to continue the hearing (see p 914 d, post). g

Notes

For the powers of inspectors appointed for the purposes of the National Insurance Acts, see 27 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 677, 678, paras 1224, 1225. h

^a Section 90 (4), so far as material, provides: 'If any person— . . . (b) refuses or neglects to answer any question or to furnish any information . . . when required to do so under this section, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine . . .'

^b Section 90 (3) is set out at p 913 h and j, post

j

a For the National Insurance Act 1965, s 90, see 23 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 357.

Case stated

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the Middlesex area of Greater London acting in and for the petty sessional division of Edmonton in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at the Court House, Lordship Lane, Tottenham N17, on 5th March 1971.

b 1. On 11th January 1971 an information was laid by the appellant, Malcolm Smith, against the respondent, Frank Ville Hawkins, that on or about 17th September 1970 he did refuse to furnish information to the appellant, an inspector appointed for the purposes of the National Insurance Act 1965, when so required by the appellant, contrary to s 90 (4) of the 1965 Act.

c 2. The justices found the following facts. The appellant was an inspector appointed under and for the purposes of the 1965 Act. The respondent was a professional musician. The respondent's national insurance card for 1968-69 was not stamped for 41 weeks and his card for 1969-70 showed that flat-rate contributions were paid only in respect of eight weeks. On 1st December 1969 the appellant (who at all material times had reasonable cause to believe the respondent to be and to have been an insured person) examined the respondent as to the weeks in 1968-69 in which contributions had not been paid. The respondent stated that during those weeks he was an employed person but refused to answer the appellant's question as to the name or names of his employer or employers on the ground that if he did so such employers would give him no further employment. He later offered to pay his share of Class 1 contributions, which offer was refused. On 13th December 1969 the respondent provided a list of his employments for 1968-69 but refused to identity his employers. He stated that he was an employed person and refused on principle the appellant's suggestion that he should be classified as Class 3 and pay contributions on that basis. On 10th March 1970 the appellant asked the respondent for the names and addresses of his employers during periods when he was employed, but the respondent refused to answer such questions or give such information unless he could have a written undertaking from the Department of Health and Social Security that his name would not be disclosed. Letters were sent by the respondent to the Department of Health and Social Security dated 11th January, 15th March, 17th September 1970 and one undated, and by the appellant to the respondent dated 10th March and 15th September 1970. On or about 17th September 1970, by the letter of that date, the respondent refused to furnish information to the appellant, when required to do so by the latter, as to the names and addresses of the respondent's employer or employers during the periods specified by the respondent.

g 3. At the conclusion of the appellant's case it was submitted on behalf of the respondent that there was no case to answer on the following grounds: (a) The request to furnish the required information was unreasonable since by giving it the respondent would risk his livelihood. (b) By the proviso to s 90 (4) of the 1965 Act the respondent was not liable to furnish information tending to incriminate himself, and since the employers were in default under s 8 (2) of the 1965 Act the respondent could be held liable as an aider or abettor in cases where he worked for employers whom he knew did not pay contributions which they were liable to pay. (c) The respondent had given all the information required under s 90 (3) of the 1965 Act in that he had provided all the information necessary for the purpose of ascertaining what contributions 'are or have been payable or have been duly paid' and this information was all that he was required to give.

h i 4. It was submitted on behalf of the appellant: (a) that the names and addresses of the respondent's employers were matters on which the appellant reasonably required information under the 1965 Act, and for the purpose of ascertaining whether contributions were or had been payable, or had been duly paid by or in respect of the respondent; (b) that the respondent had refused to furnish information as to the names and addresses of such employers; (c) that the respondent's first submission set out in para 3 (a) above was mere assertion as no evidence had yet been given; and (d) that as to the respondent's second submission set out in para 3 (b) above the employee where his employer defaulted was not necessarily an aider. a

5. The justices did not accept the first two submissions made by the respondent (as set out in para 3 (a) and (b) above). There was evidence that the respondent had refused to furnish information as to the names and addresses of his employers during the relevant period. The justices were of the opinion, however, that the appellant's power to require information was limited to the furnishing of information 'for the purpose of ascertaining whether contributions are or have been payable, or have been duly paid, by or in respect of any person' under the part of s 90 (3) of the 1965 Act which was relevant to this case. They were of the opinion that the appellant's power to require information in the case did not extend to information as to the names and addresses of defaulting employers. Since the respondent had given information as to the periods when he was employed, unemployed or sick and that information had been accepted as correct and since his national insurance cards showed what contributions had been paid, he could not be required to give the further information sought by the appellant. Accordingly they upheld the respondent's submission as set out in para 3 (c) above and dismissed the information. b
c
d

Gordon Slynn for the appellant.

Henry Boyd for the respondent.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the Middlesex area of Greater London acting in and for the petty sessional division of Edmonton who on 5th March 1971 ruled that the respondent had no case to answer on an information laid by the appellant in these terms. It alleged: e

' . . . that on or about 17 September 1970 he did refuse to furnish information to the Appellant, an inspector appointed for the purposes of the National Insurance Act 1965, when so required by the Appellant, contrary to Section 90 (4) of the National Insurance Act, 1965.' f

The justices find the essential facts quite briefly. They find that the appellant is an inspector duly appointed under the Act of 1965; the respondent is a professional musician; his national insurance card for 1968-69 was not stamped for 41 weeks and his card for 1969-70 was stamped in respect of 8 weeks only. On 1st December 1969 the appellant, who, the justices find, at all material times had reasonable cause to believe that the respondent was an insured person, examined the respondent, and the respondent's explanation of the absence of stamps on his card for the year 1968-69 was that he was an employed person. This, as a brief reference to the legislation will show, is a relevant consideration in that if he is an employed person, employed under a contract of service, the obligation to stamp his card lies on his employer. Having been told by the respondent that the latter was an employed person, the appellant asked for the name and address of the employer and the respondent declined to give the name and address of the employer, giving no doubt what was a highly practical reason, that if he did so, the employers in question would give him no further employment. The matter dragged on for a few months whilst further enquiries were made, but in the end, as the justices find, a point blank request for the identity of the employer was made by the appellant and that was refused. It is consequent on that refusal that the present information was laid against the respondent. g
h
i

To turn to the relevant legislation, s 1 (2) of the 1965 Act provides the three categories of insured persons:

a ' (a) employed persons, that is to say, persons gainfully occupied in employment in Great Britain, being employment under a contract of service; (b) self-employed persons, that is to say, persons gainfully occupied in employment in Great Britain who are not employed persons; (c) non-employed persons, that is to say, persons who are neither employed nor self-employed persons.'

b So far as the obligation to pay contributions is concerned, if a person is employed under a contract of service, the obligation is on his employer to pay for the stamp which represents the total contribution made by both parties to the contract, and then to obtain reimbursement of the appropriate proportion by deduction from the employee's wages. That comes under s 11 of the 1965 Act.

c On the other hand, if the insured person is a self-employed person, the obligation to pay and to affix the stamp is his, and obviously his alone, there being no other party to the contract from whom a share of the contribution is to be derived. As a matter of fact the amount paid by a self-employed person is somewhat less than the combined amount paid in respect of an employed person; on the other hand from the worker's point of view the amount which he pays as a self-employed person is greater than the share which he would pay if he were an employed person.

d Against that background one comes to consider s 90 of the 1965 Act under which the information was laid. Section 90 provides for the appointment of inspectors, and in sub-s (2) provides:

'An inspector appointed under this Act, shall for the purposes of the execution of this Act, have power to do all or any of the following things . . .'

e There are then set out a number of things which the inspector can do; he can enter premises at any reasonable time, he can make examination or enquiry as to whether the Act has been complied with in those premises, and then in para (c) he may examine—

f 'either alone or in the presence of any other person, as he thinks fit, with respect to any matters under this Act on which he may reasonably require information, every person whom he finds in any such premises or place, or whom he has reasonable cause to believe to be or to have been an insured person, and to require every such person to be so examined'.

g Further, under s 90 (2) (d) he is authorised 'to exercise such other powers as may be necessary for carrying this Act into effect'. I pause there to observe that although s 90 (2) seems to be largely concerned with the entry into premises and the examination of persons found therein, it is contended by counsel for the appellant that the concluding words of para (c) and the terms of para (d) are wide enough to authorise examination of persons other than those found on premises entered by virtue of the powers in the section. Section 90 (3) provides:

h 'The occupier of any premises or place liable to inspection under this section, and any person who is or has been employing any person, and the servants and agents of any such occupier or other person, and any insured person, shall furnish to an inspector all such information and produce for inspection all such documents as the inspector may reasonably require for the purpose of ascertaining whether contributions are or have been payable, or have been duly paid, by or in respect of any person, or whether benefit is or was payable to or in respect of any person.'

j Finally s 90 (4) creates the offence of refusing to answer or provide information authorised to be sought under those provisions. Counsel for the appellant contends that it must have been the intention of Parliament that an employee or a person claiming to be an employee whose card was not fully and properly stamped for a particular period should be obliged to give information to the inspector as to the identity of his employer at the relevant time. Counsel for the appellant points out, as in my judgment is clearly correct, that if an employee is not obliged to disclose the name of his employer, the prospect of the inspector ever discovering the identity of the person liable to make the contribution is remote. If in truth the relationship is one of master and servant, then it is the master who is bound to buy the stamp. If it is open to an insured person simply to say, 'I am employed but I will not tell you by whom', then the lead offered from that to the inspector to ascertain who is the person liable to pay the contribution is negligible.

Further, counsel for the appellant submits that the question of whether a person is employed or self-employed will depend on the terms of his contract of service, and that in many instances that contract will not have been reduced into writing. Accordingly, he says, it is in practice impossible for an inspector to determine into which category an insured person falls unless he has access to both parties to the contract of service or services and may thus ascertain from both of them whether they agree as to the nature of the contract.

For my part I have no doubt that as a general proposition what counsel for the appellant contends for is right. I think the obligation under s 90 (3) to furnish information for the purpose of ascertaining whether contributions are or have been payable or have been duly paid by or in respect of any person is an obligation which is certainly wide enough to enable the inspector to ask the insured person whether he is employed or self-employed and the name and address of his employer if he says that he is employed.

However, the matter, on the submission of counsel for the respondent, is not really as simple as that. Counsel for the respondent in the end I think was accepting the general proposition of counsel for the appellant as being correct, but he says that in this particular case there was no obligation on the respondent to supply the information because the appellant had accepted the proposition that the respondent was an employed person and not a self-employed person. Counsel for the respondent I think concedes that if there remained a question to answer whether the insured person was employed or self-employed, then it is open to the inspector to ask for the identity of the employer, but it is contended that once that issue, employed or no, has been got out of the way by acceptance by the inspector, then there is nothing further which can legitimately be called for under s 90 (3), because all that then remains in question is whether or not the contribution has been paid, and that is ascertained simply by looking at the card.

For my part I do not find it necessary to consider what the situation would be if the inspector had in some way estopped himself from investigating the question of whether the insured person was an employed person or not. I am certainly not to be taken as accepting the proposition that the inspector can estop himself in that way, but in the present instance it seems to me perfectly clear from the form of the case that no such acceptance or estoppel arose.

This sentence appears in the last paragraph of the case, and is relied on by counsel for the respondent.

'Since the Respondent has given information as to the periods when he was employed, unemployed or sick and that information was accepted as correct and since his national insurance cards showed what contributions had been paid he could not be required to give the further information sought by the Appellant.'

As I read that, it means no more than that the appellant had accepted, as he no doubt had, over what periods the respondent had been unemployed or sick and consequently over what periods he was an employed or unemployed person. I do not read the case and the correspondence exhibited to it as showing any different attitude on the part of the appellant.

In my opinion therefore there is no departure from the general rule in this case, a and I would accept the submission of counsel for the appellant. I would accordingly allow the appeal and send the case back to the justices to continue the hearing.

ASHWORTH J. I agree.

BRIDGE J. I also agree.

b Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Solicitor, Department of Health and Social Security; Egerton, Sandler Summer & Co (for the respondent).

Gordon H Scott Esq Barrister.

c Moore v News of the World Ltd and another

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, MEGAW AND STEPHENSON LJJ

7th, 8th, 9th DECEMBER 1971

d Copyright – False attribution of authorship – Attribution – Newspaper article – Article about well-known professional singer – Article based on interview with singer – Article written by reporter on basis of notes taken during interview – Published article stated to be ‘by’ the singer ‘talking to’ the reporter – Article in first person singular – Normal practice for reporters of newspapers to put words into mouths of individuals – Whether constituting attribution of authorship to singer – Whether action for false attribution available to persons other than professional authors – Copyright Act 1956, s 43 (2), (8).

e Copyright – False attribution of authorship – Damages – Damages for false attribution to be taken into account in assessing damages in other proceedings arising out of same transaction – Newspaper article – Damages for libel in respect of same article – Damages for false attribution not precluded in proper case – Article concerning plaintiff’s former marriage to well-known actor – Article purporting to consist of words spoken by plaintiff – Innuendo that plaintiff ready to ‘wash her dirty linen’ in public and lend herself to such an article for money – Plaintiff awarded libel damages of £4,300 – Proper case to award additional damages of £100 for false attribution of authorship – Copyright Act 1956, s 43 (10).

f Libel – Justification – Substantial justification – Pleading – Reliance by defendant on substantial justification – Necessary to plead substantial justification if sought to rely on it – Defamation Act 1952, s 5.

h The plaintiff, a professional singer, about whose life there had been much publicity, was interviewed on behalf of the News of the World by one of their reporters, who conducted the show page, for the purpose of writing an article about her. The reporter took down notes of the interview and wrote them up into an article the same night. The plaintiff was not shown the article and knew nothing of its contents until she saw it published in the News of the World. The article was long and described her relationship with her divorced husband. The article stated that it was written ‘by’ the plaintiff followed by the words, in smaller print, ‘talking to’ the reporter. The article was written in the first person as if the plaintiff was herself talking. She had not, however, used the words in the article, and she claimed that much of the article was fiction. The plaintiff brought an action against the News of the World and the reporter in which she claimed damages for libel alleging, in effect, that the words of the article had two defamatory meanings: first that she was a woman who was ready to ‘wash her dirty linen’ in public; secondly, that she was a woman who would lend herself to such an article for money. The defendants pleaded justification to the first meaning but did not seek to justify the second, it being clear that the plaintiff did not give the interview for money. In respect of the claim for libel the defendants also pleaded consent to publication of the article. The plaintiff further claimed damages for false attribution of authorship of the article contrary to s 43^a of the Copyright Act 1956. On the claim for damages under s 43 the judge directed the jury that they could give the plaintiff a small sum for the annoyance and irritation of having the article passed off as hers. The jury found in favour of the plaintiff and awarded her damages of £4,300 for the libel and damages of £100 for the claim under s 43. The defendants appealed. On appeal they contended, inter alia, that the judge ought to have drawn the jury's attention to s 5^b of the Defamation Act 1952 since the words admittedly not true, i.e. that the plaintiff had written the article for payment, did not materially injure her reputation having regard to the other allegation contained in their plea of justification, i.e. that she was an embittered and unprincipled woman.

Held – (i) The defendants were liable for false attribution of authorship contrary to s 43 (2), (8) of the 1956 Act, and £100 was a proper award of damages for that breach of statutory duty because—

(a) in most cases of false attribution of authorship under s 43 there would also be a cause of action for libel; damages for false attribution were not precluded however by the fact that damages were also given for libel in respect of the same article although s 43 (10) prohibited duplication of damages in respect of the same complaint; the present case was a proper one to award some additional damages in respect of the false attribution of authorship; accordingly, there was no error in the judge's direction to the jury, and £100 was not an excessive award (see p 920 f to h, p 921 j and p 922 a and j, post);

(b) the defendants had no defence to the claim under s 43 which applied to everybody and was not intended only to protect professional authors; it was no defence that the words 'talking to' the reporter had been added in the article, for putting the words of the article into the first person constituted attribution to the plaintiff; unless authorised by the individual, this attribution was false and it was immaterial that it was the usual practice of News of the World reporters to put words into the mouths of individuals; the defence that the plaintiff had consented to producing the article in the way in which it had been produced, even if not put to the jury, was sufficiently covered by the defence of consent to the libel; if the plaintiff did not consent to the libel she did not consent to the attribution (see p 920 b to f and p 922 f and g, post).

(ii) If the defendants wished to rely on s 5 of the 1952 Act they should have pleaded the section, even if they only relied on it in the alternative. Since the defendants had not pleaded s 5 they could not contend on the appeal that the trial judge ought to have drawn the jury's attention to it (see p 919 e and p 922 f and j, post).

(iii) Accordingly the appeal would be dismissed.

Notes

For false attribution of authorship in relation to literary, dramatic, musical or artistic works, see Supplement to 8 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) paras 824-826.

For the defence of substantial justification in actions for libel or slander, see 24 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 46, 47, para 81, and for cases on the subject, see 32 Digest (Repl) 110, 1321-1326.

For the Defamation Act 1952, s 5, see 19 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 38.

For the Copyright Act 1956, s 43, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 197.

Appeal

This was an appeal by the defendants, News of the World Ltd and Weston Taylor, who sought an order that the verdict given and judgment entered for the plaintiff,

^a Section 43, so far as material, is set out at p 919 g to j, post

^b Section 5 is set out at p 919 b, post

a Edna May Moore (professionally known as Dorothy Squires), against the defendants on 11th May 1971, at the trial of the plaintiff's action for damages for libel and for breach of statutory duty under s 43 of the Copyright Act 1956, be set aside and a new trial ordered. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

M E I Kempster QC and Charles Gray for the defendants.

Lewis Hawser QC and A T Hoolahan for the plaintiff.

b

LORD DENNING MR. Mrs Edna May Moore, the plaintiff, is a singer who is professionally known as Dorothy Squires. In 1953 she was married to Mr Roger Moore, who has since acquired fame as a television artist known as 'The Saint'. On 20th April 1969 the News of the World came out on the front page with a headline: 'The girl who lost the Saint. When love turns sour. By Dorothy Squires'; and on an inner page a big headline: 'How my love for the Saint went sour by Dorothy Squires'; and, in smaller letters: 'talking to Weston Taylor'. There is a long article describing the relationship of Mrs Moore to her husband. Now in this action Mrs Moore—Dorothy Squires, as I will call her—claims damages for libel from the News of the World, the first defendants, and also, as a subsidiary claim, for damages for a breach of the Copyright Act 1956.

d

The action was tried in May 1971 for six days before Cantley J and a jury; and, after retiring for three hours and 20 minutes, the jury found on the libel for Dorothy Squires damages of £4,300, and on the claim under the Copyright Act 1956 damages of £100. The News of the World appeals to this court.

e

I will first deal with the claim for libel. The defences were, first, justification (that the words were true in their natural and ordinary meaning); secondly, that Dorothy Squires had assented to the publication. The facts appear to be these. Dorothy Squires and her husband were married in 1953. They lived happily together for some seven years; and then unfortunately in about 1961 they separated. The husband then lived with another woman. After some years Dorothy Squires sought a divorce. A decree absolute was made in February 1969. She is a singer, and was anxious to promote her songs. She started up a venture of her own in order to promote them. Early in April 1969 she formed her own business called Dorothy Squires Promotions Ltd. She put an advertisement in The Stage about her songs: 'Your flowers arrived too late', and so forth. About the same time other things were happening. She was tried at London Sessions on a charge of not giving a sample under the breathalyser law. She was found not guilty. Just about the same time her former husband remarried. So there was a good deal of publicity going about.

g

In the midst of it all, on Thursday, 17th April 1969, Mr Weston Taylor, the second defendant, telephoned to her. He is a reporter of long standing with the News of the World. He conducts their show page. He telephoned to Dorothy Squires. He sought an interview with a view to writing an article. She said that he could come that very afternoon. Mr Weston Taylor said he was a 'cheese man', meaning that he only wanted sandwiches with cheese and tea. That is what they had. The interview started at 1.00 p.m. and went on for three hours until 4.00 p.m. At the trial there was an acute conflict about the object of that interview. The plaintiff said that the object was to get an article in support of her new business venture. She wanted 'plugs' in the article to advertise her latest songs. Mr Weston Taylor said that the object was to write a sympathetic article on her domestic relations with her husband and all that happened to her.

j

The second defendant took down notes in shorthand. He worked on them afterwards. He wrote them up that night. On the next day, the Friday, he telephoned to her to clear up one or two points. He put the story into the hands of the sub-editors for the weekend publication. He did not write the headlines. The sub-editor did them. None of the script was shown to Dorothy Squires. She did not sign it. She knew nothing of its contents until she saw the paper on the Sunday morning. At the bottom it said there was to be an instalment next week: 'Next week: Why I decided to give Roger his freedom'. a

When Dorothy Squires read the article, she was extremely annoyed. There is no doubt whatever about it. She telephoned Mr Weston Taylor and made her annoyance quite plain. He tried to soothe her down a bit. After the conversation she says that all her friends were ringing her up, saying 'What is this?' and telling her how awful it was. They thought she was doing it for money, and so forth. b So she rang up Mr Weston Taylor again and said: 'I am going to my lawyers'. She went to them. The lawyers wrote a letter on the Tuesday. They issued a writ for libel. They went to the court and asked for an injunction to restrain the next week's publication. They came to this court. We refused any injunction. The News of the World said that they would on the next Sunday put in a statement to the effect that she had not been paid for the article. c

On 27th April, the next Sunday, they published an article headed 'Why Dorothy Squires set the Saint free'; and then, in smaller print: 'Miss Squires gave these details to our show-business reporter Weston Taylor in an interview, for which she was not paid a fee.' Then there is an article which goes into the circumstances leading to the divorce. Dorothy Squires did not issue a new writ in respect of that article. d

At the trial Dorothy Squires did not complain of any particular words in the first article itself. Her complaint was that people thought she had written it for money; and also that she was 'washing her dirty linen' in public. These two complaints were put by the lawyers in the pleadings in the shape of what is called a 'false innuendo'. They alleged that—

'the said words . . . by reason of the context in which they were published bore the natural and ordinary and inferential meaning that the Plaintiff was an embittered and unprincipled woman who had deliberately prepared and sold for a substantial sum of money a series of articles for publication in the said newspaper in a sensational form and manner revealing private and confidential details of her private life with the said Mr. Roger Moore [the husband].' e

That allegation contains two distinct meanings. The first is that Dorothy Squires was a woman who was ready to 'wash her dirty linen in public'. The second is that she was a woman who would lend herself to articles like this for money. The News of the World said the first meaning was true. They sought to justify it. The second one they did not seek to justify. It is quite clear she did not give the interview for money. In addition to the defence of justification to the first meaning, they also pleaded that she assented. f

In the course of the discussion in this court, it was recognised that the real question was whether Dorothy Squires consented expressly or impliedly or by her conduct to the publication of these words substantially as they were in the News of the World. If she did, then the first meaning was true; and also she assented to the publication. That issue depended on who was to be believed. Mr Weston Taylor said that she told him her story, he took it all down in his notes, and the article was written from it. She said: g

'That is all wrong: that is nearly all fiction: 90% of it is not what I told him. He must have gathered it from somewhere else.' h

The judge put the issue fairly and properly to the jury. Counsel for the defendants, in his careful argument before us, said that, in fairness to Mr Weston Taylor, the judge ought to have stressed the gravity of the charge made by Dorothy Squires against him. She charged him with writing up things which were never said to him. It seems to me the gravity of the matter must have been apparent, and I do not think there is any room for saying the judge misdirected them in any way. j

Next counsel for the defendants raised a point of law. He said that the defendants a did not seek to justify the innuendo about payment; but they did seek to justify the innuendo about 'washing dirty linen in public'. In those circumstances he submits that the judge ought to have drawn the jury's attention to s 5 of the Defamation Act 1952, which provides:

b 'In an action for libel or slander in respect of words containing two or more distinct charges against the plaintiff, a defence of justification shall not fail by reason only that the truth of every charge is not proved if the words not proved to be true do not materially injure the plaintiff's reputation having regard to the truth of the remaining charges.'

c That is a very complicated section, but it means that a defendant is not to fail simply because he cannot prove every single thing in the libel to be true. If he proves the greater part of it to be true, then even though there is a smaller part not proved, nevertheless the defendant will win as long as the part not proved does not do the plaintiff much more harm. Counsel for the defendants submits that this is a case for s 5, because, if the defendants proved that Dorothy Squires was an embittered and unprincipled woman, it did not do her much more harm to say that she wrote the article for payment. He quoted passages from the evidence of Dorothy Squires in which she said, in effect, that the imputation of payment did not matter d so much as the imputation that she was an embittered and unprincipled woman.

e Now s 5 was not pleaded. It was not raised by counsel in the court below. Naturally enough the judge did not refer to it. Not having been raised below, I am of opinion that it cannot be made any ground of complaint here. It seems to me that if a defendant seeks to rely on s 5, he ought to plead it. Even if he only relies on it in the alternative, he ought to plead it. I realise that in the course of the case, as the evidence proceeds, the defendant may realise that he cannot prove every jot or tittle of the libel. If the defendant then wishes to rely on s 5, no doubt the judge will usually allow him to amend. At any rate it is for the defendant to raise the point. He did not do so here.

f Now the copyright point. It is a claim for damages for false attribution of authorship. This is the first time it has come before the courts. Section 43 of the Copyright Act 1956 provides:

'(1) The restrictions imposed by this section shall have effect in relation to literary, dramatic, musical or artistic works . . .

g '(2) A person . . . contravenes those restrictions as respects another person if, without the licence of that other person, he does any of the following acts in the United Kingdom, that is to say, he—(a) inserts or affixes that other person's name in or on a work of which that person is not the author, or in or on a reproduction of such a work, in such a way as to imply that the other person is the author of the work . . .

h '(8) The restrictions imposed by this section shall not be enforceable by any criminal proceedings; but any contravention of those restrictions, in relation to a person, shall be actionable at his suit . . . as a breach of statutory duty . . .

i '(10) Nothing in this section shall derogate from any right of action or other remedy (whether civil or criminal) in proceedings instituted otherwise than by virtue of this section: Provided that this subsection shall not be construed as requiring any damages recovered by virtue of this section to be disregarded in assessing damages in any proceedings instituted otherwise than by virtue of this section and arising out of the same transaction.'

That section makes it a civil wrong for any person falsely to attribute the authorship of a work to a person when it is not his. Up till now a false attribution of that kind has only been caught by the law of libel (if the work is of lower standard than the plaintiff would himself write), or by the law of passing-off (leading other people to think it is the work of the plaintiff). Under this section false attribution of authorship is a civil wrong of its own, but if a plaintiff obtains damages in libel or passing-off in regard to it, then there is to be no duplication of damages in respect of the same complaint. a

I have no doubt that the News of the World were guilty of false attribution. The article purports to be written by Dorothy Squires. It says 'By Dorothy Squires'. That was untrue. She did not write it. The News of the World seek to escape liability on this head because they added: 'By Dorothy Squires talking to Weston Taylor'. But that will not do. They put the words into the mouth of Dorothy Squires as if she was herself talking. The very first line is: b

'When I saw those newspaper placards screaming out, "Roger Moore weds", I knew it was the worst day of my life. Everywhere I looked my ex-husband's name was on newspaper bills in the streets of London.' c

By putting it into the first person, they attribute the very words to her; whereas she did not use them. They were attributed to her by Weston Taylor; and it was a false attribution.

The News of the World also seek to escape liability because, they say, it is their usual practice for reporters to put words into the mouths of individuals in this way. That may be true. But it is no defence to the claim. Unless this format is authorised by the individual, it is a false attribution and contrary to the statute. Then counsel for the defendants suggests that this section did not apply to this case. The section was only intended to protect professional authors, he said, and not other persons like Dorothy Squires who do not make a practice of writing. This suggestion is no good either. The statute protects everybody. It says 'another person', not 'another author'. Lastly on this point counsel for the defendants says that, if Dorothy Squires consented to this way of producing the article, it would be a defence. He says that this defence of consent was not put to the jury. But it seems to me that it was sufficiently covered by the defence of consent to the libel. If she did not consent to the libel, she did not consent to the false attribution. d

The only substantial point on false attribution is whether the award of £100 was excessive. Now, in most cases of false attribution of authorship, there will also be a cause of action for libel or passing-off; and the damages for those causes of action will cover false attribution as well. So there will be little extra for the false attribution. In this case the judge himself made it clear in his summing-up. He told the jury they were not to give double damages. He also told them that they could— e

'give her something for the annoyance and irritation of having somebody take the liberty of passing off this production as hers. But it will be a small sum. I do not mean a derisory sum, but a small sum. I think everybody, both parties are agreed on that. Something, some gentle, gentle amount for a rather technical cause of action.' f

I see nothing wrong in that direction. I think the jury might well give the sum of £100 on this head. Megaw LJ suggested that they might have agreed on £4,400 as the total figure; and then split it up and gave her £100 for the copyright. That would be a common sense way of doing it. g

I do not see any error in the summing-up of the judge or in the award of the jury. I would dismiss this appeal. h

MEGAW LJ. On most of the issues which arise in this appeal I agree entirely with what has been said by Lord Denning MR. i

So far as concerns the libel, the defendants, by their notice of appeal, originally included as one of the grounds that the verdict of the jury was perverse and unreasonable. That ground, not surprisingly, was not pursued on behalf of the defendants in this court. That being so, counsel for the defendants fairly and necessarily recognised that it would not avail his clients to take this court in detail through the evidence a which had been given before the learned judge and the jury in order to try to persuade us that this court, had it been the jury, would have arrived at a different verdict. From what I have seen of the evidence, I think it would be fair to say that it is a case where quite clearly there was a very real and live issue of fact. But the jury saw and heard the witnesses and the jury came to a conclusion. Therefore if it were the case that anyone in this court took the view, by reading the evidence, that he, had b he been a member of the jury, would have been likely to arrive at a different view from that at which the jury did arrive, it would not matter at all. It would not avail the defendants, for the jury were the tribunal of fact; the jury saw and heard the witnesses, and the jury have given their verdict. The only ground on which the new trial for which the defendants ask could be ordered on the issue of libel would be if it could be shown that there had been some material misdirection by the learned c judge in directing the jury. In my view, without going in detail into the various points that have been raised—and they have been already dealt with by Lord Denning MR in terms with which I entirely agree—this direction by the learned judge to the jury is not capable of any criticism as erring in any material respect in relation to the issues that arose with regard to libel. That being so, so far as libel is concerned, this appeal must fail.

d There is, however, one matter on which I feel at any rate a good deal less confident. That relates to the relatively minor issue with regard to the claim under the Copyright Act 1956. That claim resulted in damages in a sum of £100 being awarded by the jury on the basis that the defendants had infringed s 43 of the Act by affixing another person's name, namely the name of the plaintiff, to a work of which that person, the plaintiff, was not the author.

e The work in question was the first of the two articles, the article which is complained of as defamatory, published in the News of the World on 20th April 1969. In that article the headline, in large type, is followed by the words, in smaller type, 'By Dorothy Squires'; and that is followed again in less dark and obvious type with the words 'talking to Weston Taylor'. When one looks at the article itself, it would not be quite correct to say that it is all set out in the first person as though it were f directly written or spoken by Miss Squires herself. The text of the article starts with quotation marks: it contains two paragraphs in quotation marks written in the first person. It then goes on—this is simply by way of example—to contain a paragraph which is not within quotation marks, in which Dorothy Squires is referred to in the third person. It was at any rate possible to argue that, looking at that article as a whole, including the words 'talking to Weston Taylor' in the heading, and the form in which it was set out, it was not a case which fell within s 43 of the g Act. But that matters no longer because the question whether or not it did amount to a breach of the statutory duty imposed by s 43 of the Copyright Act 1956 was properly left to the jury with a proper direction by the learned judge and was decided by the jury adversely to the defendants. No complaint is or can be made about that part of the judge's direction, and therefore it now has to be accepted that there was that breach of statutory duty by the defendants.

h The question which I find more difficult is whether in this case it is right that the plaintiff should have been awarded any more than nominal damages for that breach of statutory duty. I agree fully with Lord Denning MR that s 43, having regard to the provisions of sub-ss (1) (a), (8) and (10), and particularly the proviso to sub-s (10), enables an action such as this to be brought and damages to be given if liability is established; and damages are not precluded by the fact that damages are also given i for libel in respect of the same article or the same words. I disagree in no respect from Lord Denning MR on that question of principle. What does concern me is whether, in this particular case, on the pleadings as they stood, there was any scope left, over and above the jury's award of damages for the libel, for more than merely nominal damages for the breach of statutory duty in respect of wrongful attribution of name. The statement of claim in para 6 contains the normal allegation in libel, that the defendants falsely and maliciously wrote and printed and published; and then the whole of the words of the article are set out, including the hearing, including the words 'By Dorothy Squires talking to Weston Taylor'. Then in para 7 it is said: a

'In addition to their literal meaning, the said words set out in paragraphs 5 and 6 above by reason of the context in which they were published bore the natural and ordinary and inferential meaning that the Plaintiff was an embittered and unprincipled woman who had deliberately prepared and sold for a substantial sum of money a series of articles for publication in the said newspaper in a sensational form.' b

In other words, that paragraph of the pleading, as I understand it, embodies, as it were, every word of the article, including the attribution of authorship, whatever it meant. The claim then is that the plaintiff has been damaged by the defamation in that article, because it means, first, that she was an embittered and unprincipled woman; and, secondly, that she was one who had deliberately prepared and sold this article (including its attribution of authorship) for publication in this manner. To my mind, on that pleading the libel which is alleged, and properly alleged, already covers everything that could be covered in respect of the wrongful attribution of the article, if the jury held that it was indeed wrongly attributed. It is perfectly true, as Lord Denning MR has said, that in the course of the argument I threw out the suggestion that what may have happened here is that the jury thought the appropriate sum of damages for the wrong done to the plaintiff, taken as a whole, should be compensated by the sum of £4,400. 'Now let us, the jury, divide that up and we will divide it as to £4,300 to one head and as to £100 to the other.' It may be that was so; but on reflection I think it would be wrong as against the defendants to make such an assumption. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I should have been minded to say that the award of damages of £100 in respect of the breach of statutory duty under the Copyright Act 1956 could not be sustained and that the damages under that head should have been nominal only. But having regard to the fact that Lord Denning MR takes a different view, and as I understand it, Stephenson LJ who has still to deliver judgment agrees with him on that matter, I am not prepared formally to dissent on that issue. On all the other issues I agree, affirmatively, that the appeal fails. c
d
e
f

STEPHENSON LJ. I agree for the reasons already given that this appeal must be dismissed. The jury were entitled to believe the plaintiff and disbelieve the second defendant on the one crucial issue whether she consented to publication of the information contained in the article of 20th April 1969. Counsel for the defendants has failed to persuade me that there was any material misdirection of fact or law in a full and fair summing-up. There were left out of the summing-up, as out of every summing-up which deserves the name, some of the things which one party and probably both parties would have liked put in; but there was no omission that could have led to misunderstanding or injustice. I should add that in my view we ought not to encourage a plea of s 5 of the Defamation Act 1952 in every defence to a claim for libel or slander, still less a plea of a breach of s 43 of the Copyright Act 1956 in every statement of claim for libel. But I agree that if s 5 of the 1952 Act is likely to be relied on, it ought to be pleaded—and this was such a case—and a false attribution of authorship ought to attract some additional damages in a proper case, but only in a proper case—and this was just, but only just, such a case. g
h
j

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: J Elliott Brooks & Co (for the defendants); M A Jacobs & Sons (for the plaintiff).

Wendy Shockett Barrister.

Hazell v Hazell

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD DENNING MR, MEGAW AND STEPHENSON LJJ

15th, 16th DECEMBER 1971

Husband and wife – Property – Matrimonial home – Both parties contributing to purchase – Direct and indirect contributions – Contribution by wife to family income – House acquired in husband's name by means of loans from his parents and building society – Husband paying mortgage instalments – Husband and wife deciding that wife should go out to work following acquisition of home to help meet increased expenditure – Husband at same time cutting housekeeping allowance to wife – Wife's earnings used for her own and children's clothing and to supplement housekeeping allowance – Wife claiming share in matrimonial home – Whether wife's contributions referable to acquisition of home – Whether relevant that husband could have paid mortgage instalments without wife's contribution.

The parties married in 1942, and had three children born in 1942, 1945 and 1954 respectively. In 1951 the matrimonial home was purchased in the husband's name for £1,850. The purchase price was provided by the husband in part by a loan from his parents amounting to £370 and in part by a loan from a building society of £1,480. Before moving into the house the husband had paid the wife £5 a week housekeeping money out of which she had to pay £1 2s rent a week leaving £3 18s spending money. Following the purchase of the house the parties discussed how the increased expenditure should be met. It was agreed that the wife should go out to work to help and the husband reduced her housekeeping money to £3 10s a week, a figure at which it remained for the rest of their married life. The wife started work at £5 per week out of which she had to pay £1 10s a week for someone to look after one of the children. The balance was used, together with the housekeeping money provided by the husband, for clothing for herself and the children. In 1954, when the youngest child was born, the wife gave up work and stayed at home for four or five years, after which she went out to work again. At about this time the upper flat of the matrimonial home became free from a rent controlled tenancy. It was furnished and let at a rent of £3 10s a week, later £5, which was always paid to the husband. From 1957 until 1966 the wife was at work and earned from £7 to £11 a week. Out of this she provided for her own and her daughter's clothing and paid for housekeeping expenses to supplement the £3 10s provided by the husband. In 1966 the wife left the house and in 1970 the marriage was dissolved on the ground of the wife's desertion. In proceedings under the Married Women's Property Act 1882 the wife claimed to be entitled to a share in the matrimonial home. The judge rejected the claim finding that there was no express or implied agreement to give her a share. He held that the wife's contributions to the family expenses were not referable to the acquisition of the house, since the evidence did not show that the husband could not have obtained the mortgage and paid the instalments on it without that contribution. He rejected, however, a claim by the husband that it was purely coincidental that the wife first went out to work when they moved to the matrimonial home and found that 'there must obviously have been some discussion as to how the increased expenses were to be met'. The wife appealed.

Held – (i) In order to entitle the wife to a share in the proceeds of the matrimonial home it was unnecessary to show an agreement, express or implied, that the wife should have a share; it was sufficient if the contributions made by the wife to the family expenses were such as to relieve the husband from expenditure which he would otherwise have had to bear, thereby helping him indirectly with the mortgage expenses; it was unnecessary to show that if the wife had not made her contribution the husband would have been totally unable to carry out his payments towards the acquisition of the home (see p 925 g, p 926 g and h and p 928 f and j, post). a

(ii) It could not be argued that the wife's contributions were not referable to the acquisition of the house; there was a positive finding by the judge that the wife had gone out to work because the husband would otherwise have found his liabilities on the new house difficult to meet; (per Megaw LJ) it was unnecessary to show that on each occasion when the wife paid her contribution to the household expenses she had positively and affirmatively in mind the intention that that particular sum should help towards the acquisition of the matrimonial home; it was sufficient if, when the contribution began to be made, a reasonable husband would necessarily have realised that her intention in so doing was to make a contribution for that purpose; when that was the initial intention the contribution continued to be for the same purpose until such time as it could be reasonably shown that something had occurred to give the contribution a different purpose or effect (see p 927 c and p 928 c to e and j, post). b

(iii) Accordingly, in view of her contribution to the family expenses, the wife was, in the circumstances, entitled to a one-fifth share of the total value of the house and the appeal would be allowed (see p 927 d and e and p 928 h and j, post). c

Dicta of Lord Reid and Lord Pearson in Gissing v Gissing [1970] 2 All ER at 782, 788, of Lord Denning MR in Falconer v Falconer [1970] 3 All ER at 452 and Hargrave v Newton [1971] 3 All ER 866 applied. d

Notes

For property purchased partly with wife's money, see 19 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 841, 842, para 1372, and for cases on the beneficial ownership of the matrimonial home, see Digest (Cont Vol A) 692-695, 2130a-2130f. e

Cases referred to in judgments

Cracknell v Cracknell [1971] 3 All ER 552, [1971] P 356, [1971] 3 WLR 490.

Falconer v Falconer [1970] 3 All ER 449, [1970] 1 WLR 1333, Digest (Cont Vol C) 435, 2130aca. f

Gissing v Gissing [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886, [1970] 3 WLR 255, Digest (Cont Vol C) 436, 213ag.

Hargrave v Newton (formerly Hargrave) [1971] 3 All ER 866, [1971] 1 WLR 1611.

Appeal

This was an appeal by the wife, Gwendolyn Margaret Hazell, against the judgment of deputy Judge Rafferty in the Willesden County Court on 30th March 1971 whereby it was adjudged that the wife was not entitled to a beneficial interest in the net purchase of the former matrimonial home. By her notice of appeal the wife sought an order that the judgment be set aside and that the husband, Eric Reginald Hazell, be ordered to pay to the wife one-fifth, or other such fraction as might be just, of the net purchase money of the former matrimonial home. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR. g

W R Marshall for the wife. h

D M Hogg for the husband.

LORD DENNING MR. The parties married in 1942. There are three children aged 29, 26 and 17. The parties separated in 1966. They were divorced in 1970.

In 1951 they were in unfurnished rented accommodation. It was too small for them. They decided to buy a house if they could. The wife went round looking at houses. They found 26 Holland Road, Harlesden. The price was £1,850. The house was taken in the husband's name. He provided the purchase price, obtaining it in part by a loan from his parents of £370 and in part by a loan from a building society of £1,480. They had a discussion as to how the increased expenditure should be met. It was agreed that she should go out to work to help. For the next two i a years the wife went out to work for the local grocers. She earned £5 a week. Out of it she paid a mother's help 30s a week and used the rest for housekeeping expenses, including clothing for herself and the children. The husband (who had previously given her £3 18s housekeeping money a week) reduced it to £3 10s a week when she went out to work. He kept it at £3 10s a week for the rest of their married life. She asked several times for more, but he replied that he could not afford it.

b There was a top floor in the house which was originally occupied on a rent controlled letting, but it became empty. The wife decided to furnish it. They let it furnished at £3 10s a week, rising later to £5 a week. The husband took these rents and used them, no doubt, to pay the mortgage instalments and so forth. But he never increased the housekeeping money of £3 10s a week to the wife.

c In 1954 they had their third child. The wife stayed at home for four or five years whilst the child was small. Then she went out to work again, at first part-time and afterwards full-time at wages which rose from about £7 to £11 a week. Out of her earnings she provided for her own clothing and the daughter's and she paid for housekeeping expenses so as to supplement the £3 10s provided by the husband. The husband never told her what his earnings were. His wages must have increased from time to time, but he never increased the housekeeping money of £3 10s. This was 'niggardly' of him, said the judge.

d In 1966 they separated. The wife left the house. The husband stayed in it, paying the outgoings. In 1970 the wife applied under the Married Women's Property Act 1882, claiming that she was entitled to a share in the house. The judge found that she was not entitled in law to any share in it, but that, if he was wrong, he would put it at one-fifth. The wife appeals to this court.

e The judge seems to have thought that, in order to entitle the wife to a share, she had to show an express or implied agreement to give her a share. He found there was no such agreement. He said:

f 'I am satisfied however that there was no express agreement that her contribution to the family income would entitle her to any beneficial interest in the house and she does not claim that there was any such agreement. Nor, in the circumstances, do I think it would be at all realistic to imply any such agreement from the conduct of the parties ...'

g I think the judge was wrong in thinking that the wife had to show some express or implied agreement to give her a share. That is a misreading of *Gissing v Gissing*¹. She may get a share by reason of her contributions, even though there is no agreement, express or implied.

h The judge found that the wife went out to work in order to help, and he found that her contribution must have been very useful. The husband said in evidence that it was a mere coincidence that she started going out to work when they got the house; but the judge did not accept this. He said:

i 'I cannot accept that it was purely coincidental that the wife first went out to work when the family moved to no 26 and there must obviously have been some discussion as to how the increased expenses were to be met.'

Nevertheless the judge found that her contributions did not entitle her to a share in the house; because they were not referable to the acquisition of the house. He quoted these two paragraphs of Lord Diplock's speech in *Gissing v Gissing*²:

'Difficult as they are to solve, however, these problems as to the amount of the share of a spouse in the beneficial interest in a matrimonial home where the legal estate is vested solely in the other spouse, only arise in cases where the court is satisfied by the words or conduct of the parties that it was their common intention that the beneficial interest was not to belong solely to the spouse in whom the legal estate was vested but was to be shared between them in some proportion or other. a

1 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

2 [1970] 2 All ER at 793, [1971] AC at 909

'Where the wife has made no initial contribution to the cash deposit and legal charges and no direct contribution to the mortgage instalments nor any adjustment to her contribution to other expenses of the household which it can be inferred was referable to the acquisition of the house, there is in the absence of evidence of an express agreement between the parties, no material to justify the court in inferring that it was the common intention of the parties that she should have any beneficial interest in a matrimonial home conveyed into the sole name of the husband, merely because she continued to contribute out of her own earnings or private income to other expenses of the household. For such conduct is no less consistent with a common intention to share the day-to-day expenses of the household, while each spouse retains a separate interest in capital assets acquired with their own moneys or obtained by inheritance or gift. There is nothing here to rebut the prima facie inference that a purchaser of land who pays the purchase price and takes a conveyance and grants a mortgage in his own name intends to acquire the sole beneficial interest as well as the legal estate; and the difficult question of the quantum of the wife's share does not arise.' b

The judge observed that the facts in *Gissing v Gissing*³ were very similar to those in this present case. He took the test as being whether the wife's contributions 'were referable to the acquisition of the house'. He thought that her contributions would only be so referable if the husband could not have bought the house without them. He said: c

'I do not think in the circumstances of this case that the contribution made by the wife to the well-being of the family can be rightly said to be referable to the acquisition of no 26 for the evidence does not satisfy me that the husband could not have obtained the mortgage and paid the instalments on it without this contribution ...' d

Counsel for the husband, in his excellent argument before us, agreed that indirect contributions could give a wife a share in the house; but he insisted that they must be referable to the acquisition of the house. Since the judge's decision, however, we have considered those words in *Hargrave v Newton*⁴; and I hope that in future we shall not hear so much of them. It is sufficient if the contributions made by the wife are such as to relieve the husband from expenditure which he would otherwise have had to bear. By so doing the wife helps him indirectly with the mortgage instalments because he has more money in his pocket with which to pay them. It may be that he does not strictly need her help—he may have enough money of his own without it—but, if he accepts it (and thus is enabled to save more of his own money), she becomes entitled to a share. In support of this I would refer not only to the speech of Lord Reid in *Gissing v Gissing*⁵ (which was quoted by Megaw LJ in *Hargrave v Newton*⁶) but also to two sentences by Lord Pearson in *Gissing v Gissing*⁷, where he said: e

'Contributions are not limited to those made directly in part payment of the price of the property or to those made at the time when the property is conveyed into the name of one of the spouses. For instance there can be a contribution if f

3 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

4 [1971] 3 All ER 866, [1971] 1 WLR 1611

5 [1970] 2 All ER at 782, [1971] AC at 896

6 [1971] 2 All ER at 869, [1971] 1 WLR at 1613

7 [1970] 2 All ER at 788, [1971] AC at 903 g a by arrangement between the spouses one of them by payment of the household expenses enables the other to pay the mortgage instalments.'

It was because of those passages in the speeches of Lord Reid⁸ and Lord Pearson⁹ that I summarised the position in *Falconer v Falconer*¹⁰:

b 'It may be indirect, as where both go out to work, and one pays the house-keeping and the other the mortgage instalments. It does not matter which way round it is. It does not matter who pays what. So long as there is a substantial financial contribution to the family expenses, it raises the inference of a trust.'

I am quite aware that some of the other speeches in *Gissing v Gissing*¹¹ are to a different effect; so that we have to choose between them. I think we should follow those of Lord Reid⁸ and Lord Pearson⁹.

c In the present case there is a positive finding that the wife went out to work because otherwise the husband would have found his new liabilities on the house difficult to meet. Stephenson LJ suggested that it might be inferred that her contributions were referable to the acquisition of the house. That seems to be sufficient ground from which the court could and should impute a trust. It would be inequitable for the husband to take the whole when she has helped him so much to acquire it. So I d would reverse the decision of the judge and hold that the wife is entitled to a share in the house. Then the question is, what share? The judge dealt with this. He said that if he were wrong in holding that the wife had no interest, he would put her share at one-fifth of the total value of the house. In reaching this figure, he thought that the husband had contributed much more than the wife, and he took into account the fact that the wife herself left the house five years before, and that the husband e had paid all the instalments ever since, and no doubt the house had increased in value in this time. That is a good reason for saying that she should not have one-half or anything near it: see *Cracknell v Cracknell*¹². I would not, therefore, differ from the judge's assessment of one-fifth. The house has now been sold. The net proceeds are £6,968.

f I would therefore allow the appeal, set aside the judgment, and award the wife one-fifth of the net purchase moneys.

MEGAW LJ. I agree. Counsel for the husband's admirably succinct argument started with acceptance of this proposition: where there is a substantial indirect contribution referable to the acquisition of the matrimonial home, there is a pre-g sumption of an imputed trust. It is a rebuttable presumption. Counsel for the husband then sought to defend the judgment appealed from by reference first to the proposition that in the present case there was no substantial indirect contribution by the wife. That argument I think cannot succeed because of the findings of the deputy county court judge in the last sentence of his judgment, in which he says:

h 'I do not think it would be right to say the [wife's] contribution to the family expenses was not substantial.'

When one cancels out the double negative there, the effect is a finding that the wife's contribution was substantial.

j Counsel for the husband's second and principal point was that the formula which he had accepted did not enable the wife to succeed because the indirect contribution thus made by her, although substantial, was not referable to the acquisition of

8 [1970] 2 All ER at 782, [1971] AC at 896

9 [1970] 2 All ER at 788, [1971] AC at 903

10 [1970] 3 All ER 449 at 452, [1970] 1 WLR 1333 at 1336

11 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

12 [1971] 3 All ER 552, [1971] P 356

the matrimonial home. As I understand it, the principle of the indirect contribution can be extracted from a very few words of Lord Reid's speech in *Gissing v Gissing*¹³. The contributions are sufficient to establish this imputed trust where—and here I quote the words from Lord Reid's speech—

'her contributions are only indirect by way of paying sums which the husband would otherwise have had to pay . . .'

There is a finding of fact in this case to which Lord Denning MR has referred, where the judge says:

'I cannot accept that it was purely coincidental that the wife first went out to work when the family moved to [the matrimonial home] . . .'

Again if that is turned into the positive statement which I think it necessarily connotes, the judge was finding that the conduct of the wife in going out to work was in order to bring in a contribution to the expenses which were going to be incurred because of, and in connection with, the acquisition of the matrimonial home. It would be wrong in my judgment to suggest that in order to make an indirect contribution relevant, it had to be shown that on each occasion when the wife paid her £3 towards housekeeping, or whatever it might be, she had positively and affirmatively in mind the intention that that particular sum should help towards the acquisition of the matrimonial home. It is sufficient if, when the contribution begins to be made, as here, when the wife went out for the first time to work, a reasonable, sensible husband would necessarily have realised that her intention in so doing was to make such a contribution for that purpose. When that is the intention initially, it continues thereafter to be a contribution for the same purpose so long as the contributions do continue from that source until such time as it can be shown reasonably and sensibly that something has occurred to give the contribution a different purpose or effect.

It would also in my view be wrong to say that the law requires that before an indirect contribution can be relevant, it must be shown by the wife that if that contribution had not been made the husband would have been totally unable to carry out his payments towards the acquisition of the house. That, to my mind, is an unreal and impossible burden. I do not think that any of the passages to which we have been referred, particularly in the speeches in *Gissing v Gissing*¹⁴, were spoken with any such point in mind or were intended to lay down any such rule. It would in practice, in my view, be impossible to apply. It would involve investigation of such questions, really reducing the whole proposition to an absurdity, as whether the husband, if the wife had not made this contribution to the housekeeping, could have cut down his smoking or drinking or could have sold his car so as to incur less expenses in that way in order to provide the money which the wife in fact provided by her contribution; whether he could have borrowed the money from a money-lender or relative and other such questions. In my judgment it is sufficient if as a matter of common sense the wife's contribution ought to be treated as being a contribution towards the expenses of the acquisition of the matrimonial home.

I agree that this appeal should be allowed, and I agree with the order proposed by Lord Denning MR as to the proportion to which the wife is entitled.

STEPHENSON LJ. I agree and have nothing to add.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Leggatt & Leggatt (for the wife); Cyril Chody & Co, Kenton (for the husband).

L J Kovats Esq Barrister.

¹³ [1970] 2 All ER at 782, [1971] AC at 896

¹⁴ [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

R v Thorpe

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, PHILLIMORE LJ AND LAWSON J

14th JANUARY 1972

Road traffic – Dangerous driving – Causing death by dangerous driving – Evidence of alcohol consumed by driver – Admissibility – Evidence of blood-alcohol concentration exceeding prescribed limit under the Road Safety Act 1967 – Road Traffic Act 1960, s 1.

The appellant was charged on two counts of an indictment with (1) causing death by dangerous driving contrary to s 1^a of the Road Traffic Act 1960, and (2) driving with a blood-alcohol proportion exceeding the prescribed limit contrary to s 1 (1)^b of the Road Safety Act 1967. He pleaded guilty to count 2 and not guilty to count 1. At his trial the judge ruled that the appellant's plea of guilty on count 2 and the alleged proportion of alcohol in his blood (130 milligrammes per 100 millilitres) could be disclosed to the jury. There was evidence from which the jury could have inferred that the car was being driven at an excessive speed at the relevant time. He was convicted on count 1 and appealed on the ground that the alleged proportion of alcohol in his blood should not have been disclosed.

Held – Evidence that a driver charged with causing death by dangerous driving had, prior to the accident, been drinking was admissible provided that it went far enough to show that the quantity of alcohol consumed was such that it might adversely affect a person driving; proof that the alcohol content of the blood of a person driving exceeded 80 milligrammes per 100 millilitres (the prescribed limit) was sufficient to show that the quantity of alcohol consumed was such that it might adversely affect a person driving, and was therefore admissible, whether or not, in the case of a particular person driving, the quantity of alcohol might or might not have affected him. Accordingly the evidence had been properly admitted and the appeal would be dismissed (see p 931 c h and j, post).

R v McBride [1961] 3 All ER 6 applied.

Notes

For causing death by dangerous driving, see 33 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 622, para 1047, and for cases on the subject, see 45 Digest (Repl) 87, 293-298.

For the Road Traffic Act 1960, s 1, see 28 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 224, and for the Road Safety Act 1967, s 1, see ibid 459.

Case referred to in judgment

R v McBride [1961] 3 All ER 6, [1962] 2 QB 167, [1961] 3 WLR 549, 125 JP 544, 45 Cr App Rep 262, 45 Digest (Repl) 87, 294.

Appeal

This was an appeal by Neal Thorpe against his conviction on 10th March 1971 at Newcastle Assizes before O'Connor J and a jury of causing death by dangerous driving contrary to s 1 of the Road Traffic Act 1960 (count 1). He had pleaded guilty to the charge on count 2 of the indictment of driving with a blood-alcohol

^a Section 1, so far as material, provides: '(1) A person who causes the death of another person by the driving of a motor vehicle on a road recklessly, or at a speed or in a manner dangerous to the public... shall be liable on conviction on indictment to [a penalty].'

^b Section 1 (1), so far as material, provides: 'If a person drives... a motor vehicle on a road... having consumed alcohol in such a quantity that the proportion thereof in his blood... exceeds the prescribed limit... he shall be liable... (b) on conviction on indictment, to a fine or imprisonment...'

proportion above the prescribed limit contrary to s 1 (1) of the Road Safety Act 1967. He was sentenced to a fine of £75 on each count and was disqualified for seven years. He appealed pursuant to a certificate of the trial judge under s 1 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, on the ground that on the trial of causing death by dangerous driving on count 1, the fact that the appellant had pleaded guilty to count 2 of the indictment i.e. driving with a blood-alcohol proportion over the prescribed limit and the degree of blood-alcohol concentration there alleged should not have been disclosed to the jury. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

W H R Crawford for the appellant.

R A Percy for the Crown.

LORD WIDGERY CJ delivered the judgment of the court. The appellant pleaded guilty at Newcastle Assizes to driving a motor vehicle with a blood-alcohol concentration above the limit prescribed by the Road Safety Act 1967, the amount of alcohol in his blood being 130 milligrammes per 100 millilitres of blood. He was also at the same time charged with causing death by dangerous driving; to that he pleaded not guilty and he was tried and convicted. The fact of his plea of guilty and the amount of the alcohol concentration in the blood was known to the jury which tried him on the charge of causing death by dangerous driving. It was known to them because they were in court when the plea was taken and it was quite openly discussed in the course of the trial and referred to in the summing-up. In this court the appellant appeals against his conviction for causing death; he does so on a certificate of the trial judge who certified that the matter was fit for appeal, there being an issue whether the facts of the appellant's plea of guilty to the second count, that is to say the blood-alcohol concentration count and the degree of blood-alcohol concentration therein alleged, should have been disclosed to the jury.

I do not find it necessary to go into the facts of this case to any degree. It really suffices to say that on an afternoon in September at about 3.30 p.m. in a built-up area a four year old girl was knocked down and killed by a Ford Zephyr car driven by the appellant. There was evidence before the jury from which they could have inferred that the car was being driven at an excessive speed immediately prior to the accident. Such evidence consisted of the testimony of witnesses who had seen, I think, in one instance black smoke coming from the rear wheels of the car as it braked before the occurrence, and also evidence as to marks on the road indicative again of a speed of not less than 45 miles an hour. I say no more about the facts because we are here concerned simply with the question of law whether it was proper for the jury to be informed of the fact that the appellant's blood contained alcohol to a degree above the limit prescribed by the Road Safety Act 1967.

The same question arose in 1961 before laboratory specimens were a common factor in cases of this kind and before there was any standard laid down as to the quantity of alcohol in a person's blood which should or should not in itself amount to an offence. The question raised in *R v McBride*¹ was very similar to the one raised in the present case. It was again a case where a man had been charged with causing death by dangerous driving, and the question for the five judges who constituted the court on that occasion was whether it was admissible on such a charge to prove that the accused had been drinking shortly prior to the event. The principle enunciated by that strong court is given in the judgment of the court read by Ashworth J, where he said²:

'In the opinion of this court, if a driver is adversely affected by drink, this fact

¹ [1961] 3 All ER 6, [1962] 2 QB 167

² [1961] 3 All ER at 9, [1962] 2 QB at 172

a is a circumstance relevant to the issue whether he was driving dangerously. Evidence to this effect is of probative value and is admissible in law. In the application of this principle two further points should be noticed. In the first place, the mere fact that the driver had had drink is not of itself relevant: in order to render evidence as to the drink taken by the driver admissible, such evidence must tend to show that the amount of drink taken was such as would adversely affect a driver or, alternatively, that the driver was in fact adversely affected.

The principle which is enshrined in that paragraph is quite clearly this. It would be prejudicial and not probative for the prosecution to seek to show merely that the accused had been in a public house on the evening in question or had been seen with a glass of beer in his hand. If evidence of that kind were allowed to be admitted it might prejudice the mind of the jury and it would have no probative value at all. What this court was saying in *R v McBride*³ was that such evidence is not admissible unless it goes far enough to show that the quantity of alcohol taken is such that it may have some effect on the way in which the person drives. In those days without the sophisticated devices of breathalysers and laboratory tests the way to express that principle was that used in the judgment of the court. Now we can bring that principle up to date, because we now have a well-known method of testing the quantity of alcohol in the person's blood and thus of testing indirectly the quantity which he has consumed, and in applying the principle of *R v McBride*³ we must take advantage of those modern developments.

The question really resolves itself into this: if a person driving is shown to have more than 80 milligrammes of alcohol per 100 millilitres of blood, does that show a sufficient consumption of alcohol to tend to show that the amount of drink taken was such as would adversely affect a driver. I take those last few words, as will be observed, from the judgment of Ashworth J. If it is proved that the alcohol content of the blood of a person driving exceeds 80 milligrammes per 100 millilitres, is that evidence which tends to show that the amount of drink taken was such as would adversely affect a person driving?

Counsel for the appellant, who has assisted the court greatly in his argument, says 'No' to that question because he says that it is well known that the effect on a person of a given quantity of alcohol may differ between one person and another. But I observe that it is not laid down in *R v McBride*³ that it must be shown that the quantity of alcohol would necessarily affect any driver. What is required is to consider whether it is of such a volume as would affect drivers generally or, as the trial judge puts it, affect 'a driver'.

I have no doubt myself that if it is proved that the alcohol content of the blood of a person driving exceeds 80 milligrammes per 100 millilitres, the point has been reached when the consumption of alcohol is such that it can affect a person driving and I say that in full consciousness of counsel for the appellant's argument that, if one took a particular person driving, that quantity of alcohol might or might not have affected him. The point as we see it is that the proof of excess over 80 milligrammes is enough to bring the evidence within that which this court sanctioned in *R v McBride*³.

A further point is taken as to the way in which the trial judge used the evidence, having admitted it, but I find no substance in that, and I do not propose to encumber this judgment by dealing further with the facts of the case. In the judgment of the court the trial judge's ruling on this point was entirely correct, the evidence was properly admitted and the appeal must be dismissed.

3. [1961] 3 All ER 6, [1962] 2 QB 167

Appeal dismissed. Application for a certificate under s 33 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 for leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused. a Solicitors: Registrar of Criminal Appeals (for the appellant); A J Olson, Durham (for the Crown).

N P Metcalfe Esq Barrister.

R v Inner London Area (West Central Division) Betting Licensing Committee, ex parte Pearcy c

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND GRIFFITHS JJ

17th DECEMBER 1971

Gaming – Betting – Licensed betting office – Application for licence – Notice advertising making of application – Validity – Content of notice – Notice containing matter additional to that required by statute – Notice printed with note stating that premises already operating as a licensed betting office – Whether additional matter invalidating notice – Whether licensing committee having jurisdiction to hear application – Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, Sch 1, para 6. d

The applicant applied to the respondent betting licensing committee for a betting office licence under the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963. In accordance with para 6^a of Sch 1 to that Act he had inserted an advertisement in a newspaper indicating that he had made application to the respondent committee for the grant of a betting office licence in respect of a company, thus giving an opportunity for anyone reading the notice to raise an objection to the granting of the licence. However, at the end of the notice was added the sentence: 'N.B. These premises are already operating as a Licensed Betting Office.' The respondent committee declined to hear the application, considering that it had no jurisdiction to hear it in that the added sentence rendered the statutory notice defective. On an application for mandamus directing the respondent committee to hear and determine the application according to law, e

Held – Since the 1963 Act contained no prohibition on the inclusion of additional matter in the notice advertising the application, there was no reason why, provided that the positive requirements of Sch 1 to the 1963 Act were complied with, an unnecessary addition should invalidate the notice unless that addition prevented the notice having its full force and effect. As no possible reduction of the effectiveness of the notice could result from the words following 'N.B.', there was no reason for regarding the notice as being ineffective; it was immaterial that by including the additional words indicating that the premises were a licensed betting office the applicant might unwittingly have committed an offence under s 10 (5)^b of the 1963 Act. Accordingly the respondent committee had jurisdiction to consider the application, and an order of mandamus would be granted (see p 935 d g and h, post). g a Paragraph 6, so far as material, is set out at p 934 a and b, post

R v Leicester Gaming Licensing Committee, ex parte Shine [1971] 3 All ER 1082 distinguished. h

Notes j

For the advertisement of applications for betting office licences, see Supplement to 18 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) para 392D, 4.

b Section 10 (5), so far as material, is set out at p 935 f, post a For the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963, s 10, Sch 1, para 6, see 14 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 553, 606.

Case referred to in judgment

R v Leicester Gaming Licensing Committee, ex parte Shine [1971] 3 All ER 1082, [1971] 1 WLR 1648.

b Motion for mandamus

This was an application by Thomas Ellis Percy for an order of mandamus directed to the respondent betting licensing committee for the Inner London Area (West Central Division) requiring the respondent committee to hear and determine according to law an application made by the applicant on behalf of a company, A Williams & Sons (London) Ltd, for the grant of a betting office licence in respect of premises at 88 Grafton Road, London NW5. The grounds of the application were that the respondent committee, at its meeting on 20th October 1971, declined to hear the application on the ground that it had no jurisdiction to hear the same because due notice of the making thereof had not been given by advertisement on the premises and in a newspaper circulating in the area, whereas the applicant contended that the advertisements placed on the premises and published in a newspaper did comply in all respects with the material statutory provisions, i.e. paras 5, 6 and 7 of Sch 1 to the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Widgery CJ.

Quentin Edwards for the applicant.

The respondent committee did not appear and was not represented.

e LORD WIDGERY CJ. In these proceedings counsel moves for an order of mandamus directed to the Betting Licensing Committee for the Inner London Area (West Central Division) requiring the respondent committee to hear and determine according to law an application made on 17th September 1971 by the applicant, Mr Percy, on behalf of a company for the grant of a betting office licence in respect of premises known as 88 Grafton Road, London NW5. The respondent committee declined to consider the application because it considered itself to be without jurisdiction in view of what it regarded as a defect in the statutory notices leading to such an application. It is contended before us that the respondent committee misdirected itself in law, that there is no such defect in the notice and accordingly that the respondent committee should have adjudicated on the application in the ordinary way.

f The application in question was under the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963 in respect of a betting office licence. The procedure for making application for a betting office licence is to be found in Sch 1 to the Act. In particular, the sections of the schedule beginning with para 3 are headed 'Applications for grant of permit or licence'. One finds in para 3 of the schedule that the authority is to fix a day in each of specific months in which to consider applications; in para 3 there is provision for the making of application by anyone who wishes to have a betting office licence. Paragraph 5 provides:

j 'Any such application as aforesaid may be made at any time and shall be made to the clerk to the appropriate authority in such form and manner, and shall contain such particulars, and, if the application is for a permit, give such references, as may be prescribed.'

Then there is further provision in para 5 for sending a copy of the application to the appropriate officer of police and the local authority.

No question arises in the present case as regards the application itself, which was made on the proper form submitted to the proper authorities and made in proper time; it is the advertisement of the application which is the subject of criticism by the respondent committee. The advertisement is dealt with in para 6 of Sch 1:

'Not later than fourteen days after the making of any such application as aforesaid to the appropriate authority, the applicant shall cause to be published by means of an advertisement in a newspaper circulating in the authority's area a notice of the making of the application which shall also state that any person who desires to object to the grant of the permit or licence should send to the clerk to the authority, before such date not earlier than fourteen days after the publication of the advertisement as may be specified in the notice, two copies of a brief statement in writing of the grounds of his objection.'

There is further provision for a similar notice being placed on the door of the premises. Everything in the present application hinges on the nature of the notice advertised by the applicant in intended performance of the obligations in para 6. The notice which was put into the newspaper and which also was posted on the door is copied for the court and it provides that:

'NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN that on the 17th day of September 1971, I, THOMAS ELLIS PEARCY of 175 Streatham Road, Mitcham, Surrey—duly authorised in that behalf of A. WILLIAMS & SONS (LONDON) LIMITED, whose registered office is situate at 1, Alston Road, London, S.W.17—for and on behalf of the said Company—made application to the Betting Licensing Committee for the Petty Sessional Division of West Central for the grant of a Betting Office Licence in respect of premises at 88 Grafton Road, London, N.W.5 . . .'

It seems to me that no one can doubt that that sentence satisfies the obligation that the advertisement shall contain a notice of the making of the application. The first ten lines or so of the notice are undoubtedly a notice of the making of the application. The notice then goes on strictly in accordance with para 6 to say that any person who desires to object may send notice of his objection to the clerk of the licensing committee at an address, and before a date both of which are mentioned. So far, therefore, it seems to me that the notice used in this case meticulously follows the requirements of para 6. However, underneath the signature at the foot of the notice there appears the following: 'N.B. These premises are already operating as a Licensed Betting Office.' Those words are not contemplated by para 6, and are surplus to the requirements of the paragraph. It was the presence of those words which caused the respondent committee in this case to think that the notice was defective, and indeed so defective as to deprive them of jurisdiction. We are told by counsel for the applicant that the reason why this addition was made is because this is in fact a transfer of a licence from one company to an associated company. The premises are already the subject of a licensed betting office permit, and practice and experience has shown that if in such cases a note is placed at the bottom of the notice that the premises are already used in this way, it prevents people making objections which they would not make if they realised no additional accommodation for use as a betting office was contemplated, so these words have been added with that object. The question for us is whether the inclusion of those words makes the notice invalid to the extent of depriving the respondent committee of jurisdiction. The respondent committee thought that it did, and in reaching that conclusion they were guided by several authorities¹ in this court and in the Court of Appeal dealing with a parallel subject of the grant, renewal and cancellation of gaming licences. These licences are granted under a different Act, namely the Gaming Act 1968, but there is some similarity in the procedure which has to be followed to obtain a gaming licence and e to obtain a betting office permit. In particular, Sch 2 to the 1968 Act sets out the form of application which has to be made for a gaming licence and deals with the advertisement of the application, but this schedule contains in para 6 (4) a provision which has no counterpart in the 1963 Act. Paragraph 6 (4) of Sch 2 to the 1968 Act provides:

¹ 1e R v Pontypool Gaming Licensing Committee, ex parte Risca Cinemas Ltd [1970] 3 All ER 241, [1970] 1 WLR 1299; R v Leicester Gaming Licensing Committee, ex parte Shine, [1971] 3 All ER 1082, [1971] 1 WLR 1648

b 'A notice published or displayed under this paragraph shall not include any matter which is not required by the preceding provisions of this paragraph to be included in it.'

c There has in consequence been more than one case brought to this court, and in some instances going further to the Court of Appeal, in which a notice under the 1968 Act has been held invalid because it contained some matter additional to that required by the terms of the schedule, and the reason in my judgment why in those cases, of which *R v Leicester Gaming Licensing Committee, ex parte Shine*² is the principal example, the additional matter has rendered the notice invalid is simply because in the 1968 Act it is expressly so provided that such an addition is prohibited.

d The present case is quite different because in the absence of any such prohibition one merely has to go back to the requirements of Sch 1 to the 1963 Act and see if they are complied with, and if they are complied with, there is on the face of it no reason why some unnecessary addition should invalidate the notice unless that addition should prevent the notice having its due force and effect. In the present case no possible reduction of the effectiveness of the notice can result from the words following 'N.B.' and in my judgment they are in no sense a reason for regarding the notice as being ineffective. Counsel, in his duty to the court, has drawn our attention to the fact that there may be other reasons for thinking that the addition of these words was unwise in the present case, because he has referred us to s 10 of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963 which in sub-s (5) makes it an offence for a person—

e 'save in a licensed betting office or in such manner as may be prescribed on premises giving access to such an office, [to publish any advertisement]—(a) indicating that any particular premises are a licensed betting office.'

f He said, and I think he is right, that the words 'N.B. These premises are already operating as a Licensed Betting Office' do amount to an advertisement that those premises are what is there described, a licensed betting office. I think probably he is right when he says his clients have perhaps unwittingly committed a criminal offence under s 10 by reason of the addition of those words. For my part I see no reason why that should militate against the effect of the notice for the purpose for which it is given, namely, for the purpose of Sch 1 to the 1963 Act.

g I sympathise with the respondent committee and understand that they could easily have been misled into thinking that the principles applicable to the legislation under one Act must necessarily be the same under the other. In my judgment that is not so. I think they were wrong; I think they had jurisdiction to consider this application and that the order of mandamus should go.

h ASHWORTH J. I agree.

GRIFFITHS J. I also agree.

j Order for mandamus.

Solicitors: F C Roope & Co (for the applicant).

The Joint Law Officers v Inner London Betting Committee N P Metcalfe Esq Barrister.

R v Huchison

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, PHILLIMORE LJ AND LAWSON J

20th JANUARY 1972

Criminal law – Sentence – Evidence of other similar offences – Plea of guilty to charge in respect of single incident – Evidence of other similar incidents forming course of conduct – Incest – Admission of single act of incest with daughter – Allegations by daughter of regular intercourse over long period – Denial of other acts of incest by accused – Judge hearing evidence of accused and daughter before passing sentence – Judge not believing accused and sentencing him on basis that incest committed by accused as regular course of conduct – Effect to deprive accused of right to trial by jury – Propriety of course followed by judge.

The appellant pleaded guilty to a single count of incest with his daughter, who was under 16 at the time. He claimed that only one act of intercourse had taken place, but in her depositions the daughter had stated that there had been regular intercourse over a long period. The judge formed the view that he could not sentence the appellant until he had decided which version was correct, so he adjourned the case to hear evidence both from the appellant and his daughter, the complainant. After hearing that evidence, the judge decided that the appellant was not to be believed, and sentenced him to four years' imprisonment on the basis that the incest committed by the appellant had taken place as a regular course of conduct. On appeal, Held – The course followed by the trial judge had been wrong, for if he thought that he could not do justice in the case by adopting the appellant's admission of one incident and one incident only he ought either to have allowed the prosecution to prefer a voluntary bill charging the other instances as stated by the daughter, or to have allowed the indictment to be amended and then dealt with the whole matter at a later date; accordingly, as the appellant had in effect been deprived of his right to trial by jury in respect of the other alleged offences, the court would allow the appeal to the extent that the sentence would be reduced to one of two years' imprisonment (see p 937 e to g and j, post).

Notes

For matters to be taken into consideration in fixing punishment, see 10 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 488, 489, para 890, and for cases on the subject, see 14 Digest (Repl) 548-550, 5305-5343.

Appeal

This was an appeal by Edward Roy Huchison against a sentence of four years' imprisonment imposed on him by Paull J at Lewes Assizes on 26th July 1971 after he had pleaded guilty to a single count of incest. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

R E Hammerton for the appellant.

PHILLIMORE LJ delivered the judgment of the court. The appellant pleaded guilty on 22nd July 1971 at Lewes Assizes to a single count of incest with his daughter, a girl under 16 at the time. He was sentenced at an adjourned hearing on 26th July to four years' imprisonment.

The position was that he had admitted to one act, but the girl had made a statement in which she had referred to the appellant, her father, making sexual approaches to her from the age of six onwards, to an attempt at intercourse with her when she was about 13, and to another act thereafter in which he succeeded.

a According to her statement he had then taken her out regularly following intercourse, taking her to a night club and to various public houses and giving her presents; then, when his wife left the home, she had moved into his bed and they had had intercourse almost every night up until about February 1970, when he had brought another woman into the house, after which intercourse between herself and the appellant had ceased, and she indeed thereafter had left the house.

b The trial judge felt—and one sympathises with him—that he must make up his mind as to what was the truth of all this, whether the appellant had really only had intercourse on the one occasion with which he was charged and which he admitted, or whether the truth of the matter was as described by the daughter. So on 26th July he proceeded to hear evidence; he heard the appellant, he heard him give evidence-in-chief, cross-examined and re-examined, then he heard the evidence of the daughter. At the conclusion of it all he said this:

c ‘Well, you know, my conclusion is that this story about that one occasion is just not true. I am not saying I am prepared to take [the daughter’s] statement as it stands, but it is perfectly obvious to me that the [appellant] had made a habit of having intercourse with his daughter.’

d He thereafter proceeded to pass this sentence of four years on that occasion, pointing out that this was a disgraceful case.

e What is said by counsel for the appellant is this. He says that the course adopted by the trial judge was wrong. The appellant was in effect deprived of trial by a jury in regard to these additional offences suggested by the daughter; in the result the trial judge heard the evidence, he did not, for example, address his mind, it appears, to the question of whether there was corroboration of all these other incidents, and indeed if there was any corroboration it was extremely slight. Altogether this is quite unsatisfactory. Of course there are cases where the prosecution puts forward a count as a sample count, and in those cases it is well understood that if that course is taken and the defence are notified, a judge is entitled to deal with the whole matter on the basis that the offence in fact was repeated more than once, or there were other similar incidents. But that is not this case; this was put forward as a single offence, and counsel says that in those circumstances the trial judge ought, if he thought he could not do justice in a case by adopting the appellant’s admission of one incident and one incident only, either to have allowed the prosecution to prefer a voluntary bill charging the other instances as stated by the daughter, or to have allowed the indictment to be amended and then to deal with the whole matter at a later date. The court thinks that this contention is right. The course followed by the trial judge was wrong and did in effect deprive the appellant of his right to trial by jury in respect of these other alleged offences.

g So far as the actual sentence is concerned, counsel suggests that since the appellant has now been in prison for some six months, the proper course might be to put him on probation at this stage, and possibly to arrange that he should have medical treatment under s 4 of the Mental Health Act 1959. The court does not think that that is the right course. This was an act of intercourse by a father with his daughter under 16, indeed probably under 14, and the court thinks it was a grave offence and one which on any view must be treated severely. In all the circumstances the court is prepared to reduce this sentence from four years to two years, and to allow the appeal to that extent.

h i Appeal allowed. Sentence varied.

Solicitor: Registrar of Criminal Appeals.

N P Metcalfe Esq Barrister.

Stoker v Stansfield

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, ASHWORTH AND GRIFFITHS JJ

13th DECEMBER 1971

Landlord and tenant – Recovery of possession – Procedure before magistrates – Application to magistrates for warrant – Notice of application – Service of notice – Service on tenant personally – Substituted service where tenant cannot be found – Need to prove due diligence to find missing tenant before substituted service permissible – Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838, s 2.

In 1965 the appellants were granted the tenancy of a council flat. On 3rd April 1971 a valid notice to quit and yield up possession of the premises on 10th May was served by the local authority on the appellants but they did not leave. On 23rd June a notice of intention to make application to the justices to issue a warrant was prepared in accordance with s 1 of the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838. On the same day, at 10.15 am and 2.30 pm, attempts were made by an agent of the local authority to serve the notice on the appellants personally in accordance with s 2^a of the 1838 Act but on each occasion no reply was received when the agent knocked on the door of the premises. On the second occasion a neighbour told him that the appellants would be back 'fourish'. The agent returned to the premises at 4.15 pm and the same neighbour told him that the appellants had been in and had gone out again and that she did not know when they would be back. No further attempts were made by the local authority to serve the notice on the appellants personally but the notice was posted on a conspicuous part of the premises. The local authority then commenced proceedings before the justices for the recovery of possession of the premises under the 1838 Act. The justices held that the local authority had complied with s 2 of the 1838 Act, inasmuch as after three calls the appellants could not be found, and therefore, the notice having been posted on a conspicuous part of the premises in accordance with the proviso to s 2, they had no discretion to refuse a warrant which was duly granted. On appeal, Held – (i) Although s 2 of the 1838 Act provided that the notice 'may be served' either personally or by leaving it with some person who was apparently residing at the premises, the effect of the section was that the landlord was bound to serve it in one of those two ways and to read over and explain the contents to the person receiving it; the landlord could only escape from that requirement and employ the alternative method of substituted service under the proviso to s 2, if he could prove that he had used due diligence to find the tenant and that despite his efforts the tenant could not be found (see p 941 a to c g and h and p 942 g, post); dictum of Palles CB in Blue v Fullerton (1876) 1R 10 CL at 240 applied.

(ii) Although on the day in question the agent of the local authority had called on the premises on three occasions without success it was evident that the appellants were neither away on holiday nor had left the premises for good; it must have been clear to the agent that the appellants were still available within the area and that if he called at some other time, or possibly next day, there would be every chance of his finding them. In the circumstances the local authority had failed to prove that due diligence had been used to find the appellants. The appeal would therefore be allowed and the warrant issued by the justices set aside (see p 941 d e and h and p 942 g, post).

Per Griffiths J (Lord Widgery CJ concurring). Although it was only by virtue of the provisions of s 158 (2)^b of the Housing Act 1957 that the local authority were able to take proceedings under the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838, in doing so the

^a Section 2 is set out at p 940 g and j, post

^b Section 158 (2) is set out at p 942 b, post

- a authority were bound to comply with the strict requirements as to service contained in s 2 of the 1838 Act despite the less exacting requirements contained in s 169^e of the 1957 Act (see p 942 f and g, post).

Notes

- b For recovery of possession before magistrates, see 23 Halsburys Laws (3rd Edn) 710-712, para 1454, and for cases on the subject, see 31 Digest (Repl) 617, 7321-7325.
- For the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838, s 2, see 18 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 424.
- For the Housing Act 1957, ss 158, 169, see 16 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 227, 234.

Case referred to in judgment

Blue v Fullerton (1876) IR 10 CL 233.

c Case stated

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the county borough of South Shields in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at South Shields on 8th July 1971.

- d On 8th July 1971 a complaint was made by the respondent, Alan Stansfield, as agent to the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the borough of South Shields, that the mayor, aldermen and burgesses did let to the appellants, Edward Stoker and Mary Stoker, a tenement situated at 303 Dean Road in the borough under the rent of £2.97 per week, and that the tenancy was determined by notice to quit on 10th May 1971, and that on 23rd June 1971 a notice in writing of intention to apply to recover possession of the tenement was served on the appellants, and that notwithstanding
- e the notice the appellants refused to deliver up possession of the tenement and still detained the same, and the respondent applied to the justices to recover possession under the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838.

- The following facts were found. The appellants were granted the tenancy of the council flat situated at 303 Dean Road, South Shields, from 11th October 1965. Notice to quit and yield up on 10th May 1971 possession of 303 Dean Road was served
- f on the appellants on 3rd April 1971. The appellants did not quit the premises. Notice of intention to make application to the justices to issue a warrant directing the constables of the district to enter and take possession of the tenement and to eject any person therefrom was served on 23rd June 1971 at 4.15 pm by affixing a copy of the notice to the door of the premises and putting a copy of the notice through the letterbox. Two attempts to serve the notice personally had been made previously,
- g at 10.15 am and at 2.30 pm on 23rd June 1971, when after knocking on the door no reply was received. On this latter occasion a lady neighbour was seen who said that the appellants were likely to be back 'fourish'; on returning at 4.15 pm the same lady told Mr Smith (senior housing assistant) that the appellants had been in, gone out and she did not know when they would be back. The reason for the application was complaints from other tenants that they were not allowed to live in
- h harmony in a communal block. Alternative accommodation had been offered to the appellants.

- It was contended by the appellants that the notice of application was not served in accordance with the provisions of s 2 of the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838, because (i) the notice had not been served personally and the purport and intent thereof explained; and (ii) three calls at the premises on the same day without reply
- j did not give cause to suppose that admission could not be obtained, and that the persons holding over could not be found. It was contended by the respondent that the Act made provision for circumstances such as had arisen in this case, and that the requirements had been complied with by posting the notice on a conspicuous part of the premises.

The justices were satisfied that the respondent had complied with the provisions of s 2 of the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838 inasmuch as after three calls at the premises the persons holding over could not be found and admission could not be obtained, the notice was posted on a conspicuous part of the premises, and they had no discretion to refuse the warrant which they granted for possession in not less than 21 nor more than 30 clear days.

J R Reid for the appellants.

G O A Sebestyen for the respondent.

ASHWORTH J delivered the first judgment at the invitation of Lord Widgery CJ. This is an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the county borough of South Shields who on 8th July 1971 heard proceedings initiated by the respondent under the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838 in order to recover possession of a tenement occupied by the two appellants and let to them. The tenancy in question had been determined and duly determined by notice to quit on 10th May 1971, and on 23rd June 1971 a notice in accordance with the 1838 Act was prepared on behalf of the respondent. The main issue in this case is the question whether sufficient proof was before the justices to show that that notice of intention to proceed was duly served as provided by that Act.

The facts are in a very short compass and were not in dispute in the court below. The notice of intention was served, so the case finds, on 23rd June at 4.15 p m by affixing a copy of the notice to the door of the premises and putting a copy of the notice through the letterbox. Two attempts to serve the notice personally had been made previously, at 10.15 a m and at 2.30 p m on the same day when after knocking on the door no reply was received. On this latter occasion a lady neighbour was seen who said that the appellants were likely to be back 'fourish', and that on returning at 4.15 p m the same lady told the housing assistant that the appellants had been in, gone out and she did not know when they would be back. It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the notice was not served in accordance with the 1838 Act. On the other hand, the respondent said that this was just such a case as was caught by the proviso to s 2.

The Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838, as its title shows, was an Act to facilitate the recovery of possession of tenements. It is a cheap and expeditious way of recovering possession, but it has conditions in it which certainly in my view have to be strictly fulfilled, and which are for the most part for the protection of the tenant. I need not read s 1 which is lengthy and in language associated with 1838 as a period. Section 2 is important:

'Such notice of application intended to be made under this Act may be served either personally or by leaving the same with some person being in and apparently residing at the place of abode of the persons so holding over as aforesaid; and the person serving the same shall read over the same to the person served or with whom the same shall be left as aforesaid, and explain the purport and intent thereof'...

Pausing there, it is quite plain that more is required than the mere handing of the notice to the occupant tenant of the house. It is essential that the person serving the same shall read it over to the person served. Moreover, having read it over, the serving authority must explain the purport and intent thereof. However, the section does contain a proviso that—'if the person so holding over cannot be found, and the place of abode of such person shall either not be known or admission thereto cannot be obtained for serving such summons, the posting up of the said summons on some conspicuous part of the premises so held over shall be deemed to be good service upon such person.'

a One point taken by counsel for the respondent was that this was in its own terms a section conferring an option on the landlord or local authority to serve either in one of two ways. I am quite satisfied that that argument is wrong, that in fact the word 'may' does mean 'must' be served in one of those two ways. Of course, that is reinforced by the requirement that the notice must be read over and explained to the person receiving it.

b There is no authority that counsel have found in the courts of this country dealing with this matter, but reference was made to an Irish case, *Blue v Fullerton*¹, where Palles CB emphasised that in a corresponding provision the implication was that due diligence should be used before the alternative remedy of substituted service could be invoked. I for my part would apply precisely the same reasoning to s 2 of the 1838 Act. Before a local authority or other landlord can seek to invoke the summary remedy given by the 1838 Act on the footing that he has served a notice of intent c by posting it on the door, because the tenant cannot be found, he must be in a position in my view not only to state but to prove that he has exercised due diligence in his efforts to find the missing tenant. In this case it is in my view of significance that all the efforts deposed to on behalf of the local authority were concentrated on one day and one only. It is true that on that particular day three visits were paid, but d it also emerges from the facts accepted by the justices that the present appellants were not away on holiday, they had not left the premises for good, and indeed the neighbour said that they were expected back around four o'clock. That must have made it quite evident to the respondent's agent who had been trying to serve the notice that the appellants were at least available within the area of South Shields and if he called at some other time, or possibly next day, there was every chance of his finding them. It is in my view impossible to lay down, so to speak, strict rules as e to the number of occasions on which visits must be paid. Still less is it possible to say on how many days such visits should be paid. But I feel constrained to say in this case that on this evidence there was not due diligence proved in order to serve this summons.

f What I think may have misled the justices is their consideration of the three words 'cannot be found' because their attention was not called to the Irish case of *Blue v Fullerton*² in which the implication of due diligence being necessary was explained, and they may have thought and indeed in giving their reasons the justices rather suggested that it was enough for the present respondent to prove that physically he could not on the date in question find either of the appellants, whereas what he ought to have done was to prove that and prove further that he had taken due diligence to find them. For these reasons I do not feel that the justices really applied g their minds to the important question in a matter which does raise some concern, because as is already stated this is a summary remedy really affecting, as the name of the Act shows, small tenements at low rents with people who may not understand their landlords' remedies. I would be in favour of allowing this appeal with the result that the warrant issued by the justices should be set aside.

h GRIFFITHS J. I agree with the reasons which have been given by Ashworth J for allowing this appeal. I would wish to deal only with a further argument that was put before this court on behalf of the respondent, based on the provisions of the Housing Act 1957. It was argued on behalf of the respondent that it was only by virtue of the provisions of the Housing Act 1957 that they were able to rely on the procedure under the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838 in order to recover possession of these premises; this is because the annual rental of the premises was over j £20 a year. Counsel for the respondent has drawn the attention of the court to the following provisions of the Housing Act 1957. Firstly, to s 158 of the Act, where by sub-s (2) it is provided: a

1 (1876) IR 10 CL 233 at 240

2 (1876) IR 10 CL 233

‘Where a local authority, for the purpose of exercising their powers under any enactment relating to housing, require possession of any building or any part of a building of which they are the owners, then, whatever may be the value or rent of the building or part of a building, they may obtain possession thereof under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, as in the cases therein provided for, at any time after the tenancy of the occupier has expired, or has been determined.’ b

This is the section which empowers the local authority to proceed under the Housing Act 1957. Counsel for the respondent then drew attention to s 169. This relates to the service of a notice under the Housing Act 1957 and provides: c

‘(1) Subject to the provisions of this and the last foregoing section, any notice, order or other document required or authorised to be served under this Act may be served either—(a) by delivering it to the person on whom it is to be served, or (b) by leaving it at the usual or last known place of abode of that person . . .’ d

In this case notice was posted through the letterbox and so, says counsel for the respondent, we have satisfied the requirements of s 169. He thereafter drew attention to s 188 which provides that the powers of the Act are cumulative, and reads:

‘All powers given by this Act shall be deemed to be in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers conferred by Act of Parliament, law, or custom, and such other powers may be exercised in the same manner as if this Act had not passed . . .’ e

So, argues counsel for the respondent, we had the option either to effect service as provided by the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838, or alternatively to use one of the methods provided for by s 169 of the Housing Act 1957. I for my part cannot read s 169 in that light. In my view, if it is desired to proceed by virtue of the Housing Act 1957 under the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838, it is still incumbent on the local authority to abide strictly by the provisions of the Small Tenements Recovery Act 1838. This they have not done in the present case. I also would allow this appeal. f

LORD WIDGERY CJ. I agree with both judgments. In effect the appeal will be allowed and the warrant set aside. g Appeal allowed. Warrant set aside.

Solicitors: Gamlens, agents for T D Marshall, Hall & Levy, South Shields (for the appellants); Lewis, Gregory, Mead & Sons, agents for R S Young, South Shields (for the respondent). h

N P Metcalfe Esq Barrister.

Cowcher v Cowcher

FAMILY DIVISION

BAGNALL J

1st, 2nd, 3rd, 20th, 21st DECEMBER 1971

Husband and wife – Property – Matrimonial home – Husband sole owner at law – Both parties contributing to purchase – Wife's beneficial interest – Apportionment of beneficial interest – Basis of apportionment – Resulting trust – Proportions in which parties contributed to purchase moneys – Inference of agreement or intention as to shares in which parties to be treated as having provided purchase money – Application of principles of equitable accounting – Wife making cash contribution to purchase price – Husband raising balance by means of loans including mortgage on house – Husband solely responsible for mortgage repayments – Wife making overdue interest payments on mortgage.

The parties were married in 1953 and had four children. Until 1962 they lived in rented accommodation, and while she was working the wife made some contribution towards the rent. In 1956 the company of which the husband was a director went into liquidation. After a period of unemployment he obtained employment at a salary of £1,500 per annum. In 1960 the wife's father died and she became entitled to a legacy out of his estate. In 1962 the husband went into business on his own account. In July 1962 the husband and wife found a house which they decided to buy. The purchase price was £12,000. In the same month the wife received £4,000 on account of her legacy and in October she received the balance of £1,191. Between July and November the wife paid £3,063 to the husband's firm and £1,306 to the husband. Meanwhile in September the husband paid a deposit of £1,000 on the house and they went into occupation in December, the purchase being completed in February 1963 when the house was conveyed to the husband alone. The balance of the purchase price was paid by the husband from a loan on overdraft of £3,000 from his bank guaranteed as to £1,000 by a friend and as to £2,000 by the wife's brother. The balance of £8,000 was borrowed by a loan secured by a legal mortgage of the house and an endowment policy on the life of the husband for a sum of £8,000 with profits. The policy was not however effected solely for the husband's benefit. It was written under the Married Women's Property Act 1882 for the benefit of the wife subject to the charge for £8,000. In 1962 and for some years thereafter the husband's business venture brought in £3,000 per annum but in 1967 the business failed. Since then he had had further employment but his earnings were not substantial. The wife meanwhile had received further legacies, including one of £3,150 in 1966 and £500 in 1967. In 1963 her aunt had paid £1,000 for the installation of central heating in the house and in 1966 had given her £438 to be applied in paying an overdue premium on the policy and overdue interest on the mortgage. The wife also paid £517 as premium and interest in 1968. Whilst they were living in the matrimonial home the wife made substantial contributions to general living expenses, including school fees for their children. In 1969 the wife petitioned for divorce and the husband cross-petitioned. Both were granted decrees and the marriage was dissolved in August 1971. The wife brought proceedings under s 17 of the 1882 Act claiming to be beneficially entitled to a half share in the matrimonial home. The value of the home at the time of the proceedings was £18,000 although, subject to planning permission, offers of £42,000 and £50,000 had been received. The husband conceded that the wife had contributed £4,000 to the purchase price and contended that she was entitled in consequence to a one-third share, but no more, in the proceeds of sale.

Held – (i) Under s 17 of the 1882 Act the function of the court was to decide existing rights of property; it had no power, discretionary or otherwise, to confer or vary any such rights; if a person claimed an interest in property other than that of an absolute and beneficial owner the claim was to be determined in accordance with equitable principles relating to trusts; the same principles applied to a dispute between spouses or former spouses as to disputes between strangers where equitable ownership was in question; rights of property were not to be determined according to what was reasonable and fair or just in all the circumstances; in particular those rights did not alter on the break-up of a marriage (see p 947 g and p 948 c, post);

(ii) In cases where one of the parties was the sole owner of the property at law and there was no express trust, the beneficial interest in the property would belong to the owner of the legal estate unless there could be implied a resulting trust based on the proportions in which the purchase money had actually been provided or an agreement (or common intention) to be inferred from all the relevant facts as to the shares in which the parties, as between themselves, should be treated as having provided the purchase money; such an agreement could be inferred from the whole of the evidence including acts of the parties before, at the time of, and after the purchase; an agreement between the parties during the continuance of the trust to alter their respective beneficial interests could only be implied from conduct in the most exceptional circumstances; in particular the mere payment by one beneficial owner of a mortgage instalment properly payable by another could not alter the beneficial interests or imply an agreement to alter those interests (see p 950 d to f and h, p 951 b, p 952 b and p 954 b c and h, post).

(iii) Where a sale of the property took place the proceeds were to be distributed in accordance with the ascertained beneficial interests, applying where appropriate equitable principles of accounting, i.e. (a) that where a fund was being distributed a party could not take anything out of the fund until he had made good what he owed the fund, and (b) that a party who had discharged another's secured obligation, wholly or in part, was entitled to be repaid out of the security the sums paid by him (see p 950 j to p 951 a and p 955 b, post).

(iv) Since in the present case one-third of the purchase price had been provided by the wife and two-thirds by the husband, their respective equitable interests were in the same proportions unless on the totality of the evidence a common intention could be inferred at the time of the purchase that they were to be treated as providing the money in equal shares; on the totality of the evidence the facts could at best only be treated as equivocal and so were not capable of supporting an inference that, in 1962, the parties intended to contribute equally to the purchase of the house; further the fact that the husband had unequivocally treated the insurance policy as his own by settling it on the wife and that in future the husband alone was to be the source of the family income were themselves conclusive against any such inference; accordingly the house was to be held on trust for sale and the net proceeds of sale were to be held on trust for the wife and husband as tenants in common as to one-third thereof for the wife and two-thirds thereof for the husband (see p 957 f and p 958 j to p 959 b, post).

(v) Applying the principles of equitable accounting there were to be debited against the husband's share the whole of the outstanding mortgage as well as the unpaid interest and premiums charged on the house and policy; further the husband was to be debited and the wife credited with the sums paid by her as premiums and interest; however since the whole of the insurance policy had been charged with the mortgage debt, the total surrender moneys were to be applied towards payment of that debt in reduction of the debit against the husband's share and not merely that part which was attributable to the basic sum of £8,000; there were no grounds therefore for the contention that the discounted profit element should be held on trust for the wife (see p 959 c to g, post).

Pettitt v Pettitt [1969] 2 All ER 385 and Gissing v Gissing [1970] 2 All ER 780 applied.

Smith v Baker [1970] 2 All ER 826, Falconer v Falconer [1970] 3 All ER 449, Heseltine v Heseltine [1971] 1 All ER 952, Davis v Vale [1971] 2 All ER 1021 and Hargrave v Newton [1971] 3 All ER 866 considered.

Notes

- a For property purchased partly with a wife's money, see 19 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 841, 842, para 1372, and for a case on the beneficial ownership of the matrimonial home, see 27 Digest (Repl) 264, 2130.

Cases referred to in judgment

- b Balfour v Balfour [1919] 2 KB 571, [1918-19] All ER Rep 860, 88 LJKB 1054, 121 LT 346, 27 Digest (Repl) 201, 1604.
Bedson v Bedson [1965] 3 All ER 307, [1965] 2 QB 666, [1965] 2 WLR 891, Digest (Cont Vol B) 349, 2130fa.
Davis v Vale [1971] 2 All ER 1021, [1971] 1 WLR 1022.
Falconer v Falconer [1970] 3 All ER 449, [1970] 1 WLR 1333, Digest (Cont Vol C) 435, 2130aca.
c Gissing v Gissing [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886, [1970] 3 WLR 255; rvsg [1969] 1 All ER 1043, [1969] 2 Ch 85, [1969] 2 WLR 525, Digest (Cont Vol C) 436, 2130ag.
Grey v Inland Revenue Comrs [1959] 3 All ER 603, [1960] AC 1, [1959] 3 WLR 759, 39 Digest (Repl) 333, 723.
Hargrave v Newton (formerly Hargrave) [1971] 3 All ER 866, [1971] 1 WLR 1611.
Heseltine v Heseltine [1971] 1 All ER 952, [1971] 1 WLR 342.
d Latimer v Latimer (1st December 1970) unreported.
Oughtred v Inland Revenue Comrs [1959] 3 All ER 623, [1960] AC 206, [1959] 3 WLR 898, 39 Digest (Repl) 326, 692.
Outram v Hyde (1875) 24 WR 268, 27 Digest (Repl) 132, 956.
Pettitt v Pettitt [1969] 2 All ER 385, [1970] AC 777, [1969] 2 WLR 966, Digest (Cont Vol C) 429, 621hh. e Pitt v Pitt (1823) Turn & R 180, 37 ER 1065, 27 Digest (Repl) 132, 958.
Rhodesia Goldfields Ltd, Re [1910] 1 Ch 239, 79 LJCh 133, 102 LT 126, 47 Digest (Repl) 428, 3820.
Shephard v Cartwright [1954] 3 All ER 649, [1955] AC 431; rvsg sub nom Re Shephard, Shephard v Cartwright [1953] 2 All ER 608, [1953] Ch 728, 25 Digest (Repl) 564, 124.
Shirlaw v Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd [1939] 2 All ER 113, [1939] 2 KB 206; affd HL [1940] 2 All ER 445, [1940] AC 701, 109 LJKB 461, 164 LT 251, 9 Digest (Repl) 557, 3689. f Sims, Re [1946] 2 All ER 138, 175 LT 113, 27 Digest (Repl) 133, 968.
Smith v Baker [1970] 2 All ER 826, [1970] 1 WLR 1160, Digest (Cont Vol C) 430, 621ll.
Ulrich v Ulrich and Felton [1968] 1 All ER 67, [1968] 1 WLR 180, Digest (Cont Vol C) 465, 6106ba.

g Cases also cited

- Brett v Brett* [1969] 1 All ER 1007, [1969] 1 WLR 487.
Chapman v Chapman [1969] 3 All ER 476, [1969] 1 WLR 1367.
J v J [1955] 2 All ER 617, [1955] P 236.

Summons

- h This was an application under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 by the wife, Agnes Petricia Campbell Cowcher, whereby she sought the determination of all questions between herself and the husband, Paul Thomas Cowcher, in respect of the interest of each in, inter alia, the premises known as Appletrees, Woodside Road, Cobham, in the county of Surrey. The facts are set out in the judgment.
- j A B Hollis QC and A J Phelan for the wife.
Joseph Jackson QC and James Townend for the husband.

Cur adv vult

21st December. BAGNALL J read the following judgment. The parties in this case were married on 23rd March 1953. The husband was then 30; the wife 21. They have had four children: two boys now aged 17 and nearly 12 and two girls now aged nearly 14 and nearly ten. The wife presented a petition for divorce on 21st November 1969 whereby (after amendment) she alleged cruelty and adultery; the husband denied both and cross-petitioned on the ground of adultery. On 14th May 1971 each was granted a decree nisi on the ground of adultery; the allegation of cruelty was not pursued. The marriage was dissolved by decree absolute on 16th August 1971.

During the marriage there were frequent if not continuous financial difficulties. Until 1956 the husband was a director of and employed by a company which went into liquidation, leaving him with substantial liabilities. For a time he was unemployed but then obtained employment at a modest salary of under £1,500 per annum. In 1962 he went into business on his own account as a management consultant under the firm name Paul Cowcher Associates. He says that in six months in 1962 his earnings were £4,000 and that for some years the venture brought in £3,000 per annum. In 1967 the husband's business failed. Since then he has had further employment but his earnings have not been substantial. The wife worked until 1954 and again from 1956 until her second child was born in January 1958. She earned about £300. I am satisfied that until 1962 her financial contributions to the household were small.

Until 1962 the parties lived in rented accommodation and, no doubt, while she was working the wife must be treated as having made some contribution towards the rent. In 1960 the wife's father died and she became entitled to a legacy out of his estate. They decided to look for a house and in July 1962 found Appletrees, Woodside Road, Cobham, Surrey, a substantial property with six bedrooms, three reception rooms, two bathrooms and the usual offices and also some two acres of land. The purchase price was £12,000.

On 13th July 1962 the wife received £4,000 on account of her legacy and on 26th October 1962 she received the balance of £1,191—a total of £5,191. Between July and November 1962 the wife paid £3,063 to or on behalf of Paul Cowcher Associates and £1,306 to the husband, a total of £4,366. During that period and subsequently she also made contributions to the household expenses. On 18th September 1962 the husband paid £1,000 as a deposit on Appletrees. They went into occupation in December 1962 and the purchase was completed on 1st February 1963, when the house was conveyed to the husband alone. The balance of the purchase price was paid as to £3,000 from a loan on overdraft from his bankers guaranteed by a friend, a Mr Carter, as to £1,000, and as to £2,000 by the wife's brother, and the remaining £8,000 was borrowed by the husband from London and Manchester Assurance Co Ltd secured on a legal mortgage of the house and a 25 year endowment policy on the life of the husband for a sum of £8,000 with profits. The rate of interest charged on the mortgage was $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, that is £520 gross per annum, and the annual premium on the policy was £358. The interest was an allowable charge on the husband's income (which for this purpose would include the wife's income if any) for income tax purposes and the husband obtained some income tax allowance on the premiums.

The husband did not effect the policy wholly for his own benefit. It was written under the Married Women's Property Act 1882 for the benefit of the wife, described by name, subject, of course, to the charge for £8,000. Insofar as the policy moneys on maturity were used to pay off the mortgage (as no doubt was the husband's intention) they would accrue for his benefit; any balance representing the profit element would be held on trust for the wife absolutely and indefeasibly. I am told that the present surrender value of the policy is £2,882 and the discounted value of the accrued profits is £1,207.

I understand the value of Appletrees as a dwelling-house is about £18,000, but offers have been received for its purchase conditional on planning permission being obtained to enable the site to be included in a larger scheme of development. One of the offers was for £50,000, another for £42,000. The wife is living in the house with the children and wishes to remain there.

a At the start of the hearing before me, counsel for the husband conceded, and I think rightly conceded, that the wife should be treated as having contributed to the purchase price of the house the whole of the £4,000 paid in cash at the time of the purchase. However, he reserves the right, as I think he is entitled to do, to rely on details of the actual processes of payment in dealing with any inferences which have to be drawn from the conduct of the parties. He submits that the husband must be treated as having contributed the whole of the remaining £8,000.

b The questions relating to property and finance which by order dated 21st July 1971 have been referred to me and which I have to decide are as follows: 1. Under s 17 of the Married Women's Property Act 1882, what, if any, interest in Appletrees and its proceeds of sale is vested in the wife? A similar question relating to other property was also referred to me but has been disposed of by agreement. 2. Under ss 2, 3 and 4 of the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, what provision by way of transfer or settlement of property or variation of settlement or by way of periodical payments maintenance or secured provision (or by any of those ways) shall be made for the wife and the children of the family?

c Under question 1, each party originally claimed to be entitled to the whole beneficial interest; before me those extreme positions were abandoned and the wife claims to be entitled to an undivided half share in the proceeds of sale of Appletrees; the husband contends that she is entitled only to an undivided one-third share therein. It is plain, and indeed common ground, that I must decide this question before I can address my mind to the questions of discretion which arise under the 1970 Act.

d During the course of a very full and helpful argument from counsel on the question under s 17, I was referred to three groups of authorities: first, the decisions of the House of Lords in *Pettitt v Pettitt*¹ and *Gissing v Gissing*²; secondly, four cases decided by the Court of Appeal before the opinions in *Gissing v Gissing*² were delivered; thirdly, decisions of the Court of Appeal after those opinions had been delivered. I am of opinion that every aspect of the problem before me is within the ambit of the ratio decidendi of *Pettitt v Pettitt*¹ and *Gissing v Gissing*², and I do not think it necessary to refer to any, except two, of the earlier cases. However, in relation to some of the later decisions of the Court of Appeal I have found difficulty. I think that the right course for me to adopt is to consider the problem on principle in the light of the opinions expressed in the House of Lords and only thereafter to advert to subsequent decisions in the Court of Appeal.

e In my judgment the following propositions are established beyond doubt by the House of Lords in the two cases I have mentioned:

f 1. Under s 17 the court simply decides existing rights of property; the court has no power, discretionary or otherwise, to confer, or vary, any such rights. This was the unanimous decision in *Pettitt v Pettitt*¹.

g 2. If, under s 17, a person claims an interest in property other than that of an absolute legal and beneficial owner, the claim must be determined in accordance with equitable principles relating to trusts. This was fundamental to the majority opinions in *Pettitt v Pettitt*¹ and was asserted in all the opinions in *Gissing v Gissing*². I add that the relevant principles have been settled for well over 150 years and (apart from some observations on the presumption of advancement which is not here material) none of their Lordships in either case indicated that he was in any way adding to or detracting from the principles so settled.

j 3. The same principles apply if the dispute is between spouses or former spouses as apply to any other dispute where equitable ownership is in question (*Pettitt v Pettitt*³)

1 [1969] 2 All ER 385, [1970] AC 777

2 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

3 [1969] 2 All ER at 397, [1970] AC at 803

per Lord Morris, Lord Upjohn⁴ and Lord Diplock⁵; *Gissing v Gissing*⁶ per Viscount Dilhorne). The contrary proposition, which would have been crucial to the issue in *Gissing v Gissing*⁷ was not asserted by any of their Lordships in that case. In my judgment *Ulrich v Ulrich and Felton*⁸, insofar as it proceeded on the footing that the beneficial interests would differ according to whether the parties did or did not marry, can no longer be regarded as authoritative.

4. The expression 'family assets', although in some contexts convenient, has no legal meaning and its use affords no assistance in determining property rights (*Pettitt v Pettitt*⁹ per Lord Hodson and Lord Upjohn¹⁰, *Gissing v Gissing*¹¹ per Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Diplock¹²). Again the contrary proposition was not asserted by any of their Lordships in *Gissing v Gissing*⁷.

5. Rights of property are not to be determined according to what is reasonable and fair or just in all the circumstances; in particular those rights do not alter on the break-up of a marriage. This proposition was fundamental to the decisions in both cases but was also expressly asserted (Pettitt v Pettitt per Lord Reid¹³, Lord Morris¹⁴, Lord Hodson¹⁵ and Lord Diplock¹⁶).

In any individual case the application of these propositions may produce a result which appears unfair. So be it; in my view that is not an injustice. I am convinced that in determining rights, particularly property rights, the only justice that can be attained by mortals, who are fallible and are not omniscient, is justice according to law; the justice which flows from the application of sure and settled principles to proved or admitted facts. So in the field of equity the length of the Chancellor's foot has been measured or is capable of measurement. This does not mean that equity is past childbearing; simply that its progeny must be legitimate—by precedent out of principle. It is well that this should be so; otherwise no lawyer could safely advise on his client's title and every quarrel would lead to a law suit.

Trust principles are relevant here at three stages, the formation of the trust, its continuance and its winding up, including the taking of equitable accounts on a sale of the property. The principles relating to formation of the trust are stated in substantially the same terms in all the recognised textbooks. I have extracted them (although not verbatim) from Maitland on Equity¹⁷ and Snell on Equity¹⁸. So far as here material and with the relevant statutory provisions they are:

1. There can be no trust unless the nature and quantum of the several beneficial interests are certain at the inception, and during the whole life, of the trust.

2. The trust may be express or implied.

3. Formal words are not required to create an express trust; any words evincing a clear intention to create a trust will suffice and the beneficial interests are determined with certainty as a matter of construction of the words used. As this case is concerned with absolute shares in the property and possibly with equality it is convenient to add some further observations. A trust for A and B without further definition creates an equitable joint interest. This is not, I think, an application of the

4 [1969] 2 All ER at 405, [1970] AC at 813

5 [1969] 2 All ER at 412, [1970] AC at 821

6 [1970] 2 All ER at 785, [1971] AC at 899

7 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

8 [1968] 1 All ER 67, [1968] 1 WLR 180

9 [1969] 2 All ER at 403, [1970] AC at 809, 810

10 [1969] 2 All ER at 408, [1970] AC at 817

11 [1970] 2 All ER at 784, [1971] AC at 899

12 [1970] 2 All ER at 789, [1971] AC at 904

13 [1969] 2 All ER at 394, [1970] AC at 793

14 [1969] 2 All ER at 395, 397, 398, [1970] AC 801, 803, 805

15 [1969] 2 All ER at 402, [1970] AC at 809

16 [1969] 2 All ER at 416, [1970] AC at 825

17 2nd Edn (1936)

18 26th Edn (1966)

a maxim 'equality is equity' but rather of the maxim 'equity follows the law'. A conveyance at law to two or more, without words of severance, creates a joint tenancy at law. Indeed one of the principal illustrations of the maxim 'equality is equity' is equity's dislike of a joint tenancy, which involves the chance of survivorship rather than the true equality of moieties, and the consequent ease with which an equitable joint tenancy can be severed. As between spouses there was, at one time, an unseverable joint tenancy—tenancy by entireties. The Married Women's Property Act 1882 precluded the creation of such tenancies; and by Part VI of Sch 1 to the Law of Property Act 1925 all existing tenancies by entireties were converted into joint tenancies, severable (if equitable) under s 36 (2) of that Act. (See *Bedson v Bedson*¹⁹ per Russell LJ.) Their basis was the outmoded legal concept of husband and wife as one person. I think that their resuscitation would not now be sociologically acceptable and would in any event require legislation. Lastly a joint interest in equal shares is a contradiction in terms, the words of severance creating a tenancy in common; and there is, I think, no such interest known in law or equity as a joint tenancy in unequal shares.

d 4. By s 53 (1) (b) of the Law of Property Act 1925 an express trust must be manifested by and proved by writing signed by the creator of the trust. Notwithstanding this provision an express trust may be created by an agreement of which equity will grant specific performance, that is an agreement under seal or for consideration, including marriage consideration.

e 5. Implied trusts may be resulting or constructive trusts. Strictly, constructive trusts arise where one who is already a trustee or otherwise clothed with a fiduciary character seeks to retain an advantage from his trust; but the expression is often used interchangeably with resulting trust.

e 6. A resulting trust arises where a person acquires a legal estate but has not provided the consideration or the whole of the consideration for its acquisition, unless a contrary intention is proved. This is the crucial principle in the present case and I must, I think, add some elaboration.

f Thus if land is conveyed to A and the purchase money is provided by A as to two-thirds and B as to one-third, there will be a resulting trust for A and B in those proportions unless a contrary intention is proved so as to rebut the presumption of resulting trust. The relevant contrary intention is that of B to confer bounty on A. If the intention of the parties is to create a trust in equal shares or as to a quarter for B and three-quarters for A or any shares other than those in which the purchase price is provided, the trust can only be an express trust; for the beneficial interests neither coincide with the legal estate nor 'result' in equity from the provision of the purchase money. Such a trust would, therefore, require to be evidenced by writing under s 53 (1) (b) or to arise from an enforceable agreement under seal or supported by consideration. I should add my view that if the whole purchase price is provided by A, a trust giving an interest to B can also only be an express trust there being nothing to bring the doctrine of resulting trust into operation.

h However, I think that there is another stage of the transaction at which a common agreement or intention can be relevant; this again can best be illustrated by examples. Suppose a conveyance to A for £24,000 with A admittedly providing £8,000 out of his own free available moneys. The remaining £16,000 may be provided by B in a number of ways: (i) out of his own free available moneys; (ii) by loan from a third party; (iii) by loan from A; (iv) by a loan secured by a mortgage on the freehold of the property. Cases (i) and (ii) are indistinguishable and will give B, if no contrary intention, a two-thirds interest under a resulting trust, leaving A with one-third. In cases (iii) and (iv) A is involved because he either lends the money or it is raised on property in which he has an interest. In my judgment in such a case, prima facie B will also have a two-thirds interest because he or his obligation to repay a loan has been the source of £16,000 of the purchase money. But suppose that at the time A says that as between himself and B he, A, will be responsible for half of the mortgage repayments, a different result ensues. Although as between A and B and the vendor A has provided £8,000 and B £16,000, as between A and B themselves A has provided £8,000 and made himself liable for the repayment of half the £16,000 mortgage namely a further £8,000, a total of £16,000; the resulting trust will therefore be as to two-thirds for A and one-third for B—the reverse of the former situation. It is significant to observe, particularly when one comes to consider the husband and wife cases, that A's agreement to share equally in the mortgage repayments has not produced overall equality, but has given A a larger share than B; overall equality would be produced if either A agreed to be responsible for one-third of the mortgage repayments, £4,000, or A agreed to pay half those repayments and also to treat B as having provided half of A's contribution of £8,000—in effect a gift of £4,000 from A to B. A similar equality would be produced if the £8,000 although nominally paid by A, in fact came from a common fund to which A and B were jointly entitled and, although B nominally raised the £16,000 on mortgage, A and B agreed as between themselves to be equally liable for its repayment.

If my analysis has been correct, there are thus two types of agreement or common intention which may affect A's and B's respective equitable interests: (1) an agreement that, irrespective of the actual payments to the vendor and the legal obligations to an outside mortgagee, as between themselves A and B shall be treated as providing the money (including being liable for mortgage repayments) in, say, equal shares; (2) an agreement that irrespective of the shares in which, as between themselves, the money has been provided, the property shall be held on an express trust for A and B in, say, equal shares. The first type of agreement or common intention could, in my judgment, be inferred from conduct antecedent, contemporaneous or subsequent, for it would be part of the arrangement which gave rise to the resulting trust and consistent with it. On the other hand, in my opinion, it would be extremely difficult to infer the second type of agreement from any conduct, because it would involve relying on conduct to substitute for the resulting trust that would otherwise have been implied also from conduct, a contractual express trust inconsistent with that resulting trust.

So much for the formation of the trust. As to its continuance there can be no doubt that the trust, and the equitable interests arising under it, cannot be changed except with the consent of all interested parties, and that such a change must involve a disposition of all or part of an equitable interest by one party to another (see *Grey v Inland Revenue Comrs*²⁰). By s 53 (1) (c) of the Law of Property Act 1925 such a disposition must be in writing; and this requirement applies to a disposition of an equitable interest arising under a resulting trust (see *Oughtred v Inland Revenue Comrs*¹). In spite of this a parole agreement for valuable consideration to vary the trusts, of which equity would grant specific performance, would be as valid as an assignment in writing; for it would operate as an agreement for sale of an equitable interest on which the vendor would become a trustee for the purchaser subject only to the payment of the consideration. In my opinion such an agreement, having terms of sufficient certainty, could be implied from conduct only in the most exceptional circumstances. In particular the mere payment by one beneficial owner of a mortgage instalment properly payable by the other could not alter the beneficial interests or, in my view, imply an agreement to alter those interests.

Lastly I turn to the winding-up of the trust which, I think, again involves well settled principles; first the principle which—'is of general application that where . . . a fund is being distributed, a party cannot take anything out of the fund until he has made good what he owes to the fund'

a (see *Re Rhodesia Goldfields Ltd*² per Swinfen Eady J); secondly that he who discharges another's secured obligation, wholly or in part, is entitled to be repaid out of the security the amount of the sum or sums paid by him (see *Pitt v Pitt*³, and *Outram v Hyde*⁴). Again an example will illustrate the point. Suppose land be conveyed to A for £24,000, B providing in cash £8,000 and A raising on mortgage of the property the remaining £16,000; suppose A has paid off £5,000 of the mortgage and B (although under no obligation) has paid off a further £2,000 leaving £9,000 outstanding; b finally suppose the property to be sold for £60,000. The shares under the resulting trust are one-third to B and two-thirds to A; but A must account for the outstanding mortgage of £9,000 and B is entitled to be reimbursed the £2,000 paid by him in part discharge of the mortgage. Thus out of £60,000 realised £9,000 goes to the mortgagee, B takes £22,000, his one-third share of £20,000 together with £2,000 paid off the mortgage, and A takes £29,000, that is his two-thirds share of £40,000 less £9,000 c outstanding on the mortgage and £2,000 repayable to B. This must be the result even if A and B are husband and wife if my third initial proposition, that the same principles apply as between husband and wife as between strangers, is sound (see also *Re Sims*⁵). If so, I think that *Ulrich v Ulrich and Felton*⁶ which, as between husband and wife, treated the equity of redemption as the divisible trust property is no longer d authoritative. It may well be, however, that as between husband and wife there will be a clear contrary intention that mortgage instalments, by whomsoever paid, are to be treated as discharging the husband's obligation without giving any right of subrogation to the wife.

I must now return to *Pettitt v Pettitt*⁷ and *Gissing v Gissing*⁸. In each case the legal estate in the matrimonial home was vested in one only of the spouses; in each case the other spouse had made no direct contribution to the purchase price but claimed to be entitled to an equitable interest under an implied or resulting trust. In *Pettitt v e Pettitt*⁷ the spouse so claiming had effected improvements to the property but the House of Lords considered the general principles relating to ascertaining the beneficial interests of husband and wife in the matrimonial home. In *Gissing v Gissing*⁸ the claiming spouse was said to have made a notional or indirect contribution to the purchase price of the matrimonial home. In neither case was the claim held to have f been substantiated.

In *Pettitt v Pettitt*⁷ the minority view was that the function of the court under s 17 was to decide what the spouses would, as a reasonable husband and wife, have agreed as to their respective beneficial interests had they directed their minds to the problem (see per Lord Reid⁹ and Lord Diplock¹⁰). In my judgment the majority opinion may be summarised as that the beneficial interests must be those which arise under g a resulting trust based on the proportions in which the purchase moneys were actually provided or were treated as having been provided under an agreement (or common intention) expressed or to be inferred from all the relevant facts (see per Lord Morris¹¹, Lord Hodson¹² and Lord Upjohn¹³). I anticipate by adding that this seems to me to have been Lord Diplock's analysis in *Gissing v Gissing*⁸ of the minority and majority opinions respectively in *Pettitt v Pettitt*⁷.

h In analysing the ratio decidendi of *Gissing v Gissing*⁸, a difficulty arises at the outset.

2 [1910] 1 Ch 239 at 247

3 (1823) Turn & R 180

4 (1875) 24 WR 268

5 [1946] 2 All ER 138

6 [1968] 1 All ER 67, [1968] 1 WLR 180

7 [1969] 2 All ER 385, [1970] AC 777

8 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

9 [1969] 2 All ER at 390, [1970] AC at 795

10 [1969] 2 All ER at 415, [1970] AC at 823, 825

11 [1969] 2 All ER at 398, [1970] AC at 804, 805

12 [1969] 2 All ER at 403, [1970] AC at 807, 810

13 [1969] 2 All ER at 405, [1970] AC at 818

Lord Reid¹⁴ did not think that he was precluded by the decision in *Pettitt v Pettitt*¹⁵ from repeating the views that he there expressed; Lord Diplock¹⁶ said that the proposition formulated in the minority opinions in *Pettitt v Pettitt*¹⁵ was not the law. But that is a negative approach. I am of opinion that the law on this subject established in *Gissing v Gissing*¹⁷ is that the beneficial interest in the property must either (1) coincide with the legal estate or (2) arise under a resulting trust from the actual provision of the purchase price or (3) arise from a common agreement or common intention (these expressions are I think used interchangeably and I will use the word 'consensus' as synonymous with both) either express or to be inferred from the facts. The first two of these possibilities exist because the question has to be determined under the general law of trusts. As to the third I cite the relevant extracts from their Lordships' speeches. Lord Morris said¹⁸:

'When the full facts are discovered the court must say what is their effect in law. The court does not decide how the parties might have ordered their affairs; it only finds out how they did. The court cannot devise arrangements which the parties never made. The court cannot ascribe intentions which the parties in fact never had.'

Viscount Dilhorne said¹⁹:

'Where there was a common intention at the time of the acquisition of the house that the beneficial interest in it should be shared, it would be a breach of faith by the spouse in whose name the legal estate was vested to fail to give effect to that intention and the other spouse will be held entitled to a share in the beneficial interest. The difficulty where the dispute is between former spouses arises with regard to proof of the existence of any such common intention. It may be, as in this case, that the claim to a share in the beneficial interest is not made until years after the acquisition of the property. It is most likely that there will be no documentary evidence pointing to the existence of any such intention. In a great many cases, perhaps in the vast majority, no consideration will have been given by the parties to the marriage to the question of beneficial ownership of the matrimonial home at the time that it is being acquired. If on the evidence that appears to have been the case, then a claim based on the existence of such an intention at the time must fail . . . I appreciate that there may be very great difficulty in establishing such an intention where the dispute is between former spouses but that does not alter the question to be decided. In every case it has to be established that the circumstances are such that there is a resulting, implied or constructive trust in favour of the claimant to a beneficial interest or a share in it. In the case of former spouses that will ordinarily depend on whether it can be inferred from the evidence that there was such a common intention.'

Lord Pearson said²⁰:

'If the respondent's claim is to be valid, I think it must be on the basis that by virtue of contributions made by her towards the purchase of the house there was and is a resulting trust in her favour. If she did make contributions of substantial amount towards the purchase of the house, there would prima facie be a resulting trust in her favour. That would be the presumption as to the intention of the parties at the time or times when she made and he accepted the contributions. The presumption is a rebuttable presumption; it can be rebutted by

¹⁴ [1970] 2 All ER at 782, 783, [1971] AC at 895, 896

¹⁵ [1969] 2 All ER 385, [1970] AC 777

¹⁶ [1970] 2 All ER at 789, [1971] AC at 904

¹⁷ [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

¹⁸ [1970] 2 All ER at 784, [1971] AC at 898

¹⁹ [1970] 2 All ER at 785, 786, [1971] AC at 900, 901

²⁰ [1970] 2 All ER at 787, 788, [1971] AC at 902

a evidence showing some other intention. The question as to what was the intention is a question of fact to be decided by the jury if there is one or, if not, by the judge acting as a jury . . . an intention can be imputed; it can be inferred from the evidence of their conduct and the surrounding circumstances.'

b It is, I think, clear from the rest of Lord Pearson's opinion that he was not there intending to exclude subsequent circumstances from the facts on which an inference can be based. Lord Diplock said¹:

c 'But parties to a transaction in connection with the acquisition of land may well have formed a common intention that the beneficial interest in the land shall be vested in them jointly without having used express words to communicate this intention to one another; or their recollections of the words used may be imperfect or conflicting by the time any dispute arises. In such a case—a common d one where the parties are spouses whose marriage has broken down—it may be possible to infer their common intention from their conduct. As in so many branches of English law in which legal rights and obligations depend on the intentions of the parties to a transaction, the relevant intention of each party is the intention which was reasonably understood by the other party to be manifested by that party's words or conduct notwithstanding that he did not consciously e formulate that intention in his own mind or even acted with some different intention which he did not communicate to the other party. On the other hand, he is not bound by any inference which the other party draws as to his intention unless that inference is one which can reasonably be drawn from his words or conduct. It is in this sense that in the branch of English law relating to constructive, implied or resulting trusts effect is given to the inferences as to the intentions of parties to a transaction which a reasonable man would draw from their words or conduct and not to any subjective intention or absence of intention which was not made manifest at the time of the transaction itself. It is for the f court to determine what those inferences are . . . The conduct of the spouses in relation to the payment of the mortgage instalments may be no less relevant to their common intention as to the beneficial interests in a matrimonial home acquired in this way than their conduct in relation to the payment of the cash deposit.'

Finally²:

g 'Difficult as they are to solve, however, these problems as to the amount of the share of a spouse in the beneficial interest in a matrimonial home where the legal estate is vested solely in the other spouse, only arise in cases where the court is satisfied by the words or conduct of the parties that it was their common intention that the beneficial interest was not to belong solely to the spouse in whom the legal estate was vested but was to be shared between them in some proportion or other.'

h The same proposition is expressed in the dissenting judgment of Edmund Davies LJ³ in the Court of Appeal which was upheld in the House of Lords⁴:

j 'In the present case, there being no express agreement relating to the matrimonial home, the task is that of inferring what the common intention of the parties would have been expressed to be had they reduced it to words before the matrimonial difficulties arose.'

In cases (which will probably be infrequent) where there is express agreement no

1 [1970] 2 All ER at 790, 791, [1971] AC at 906

2 [1970] 2 All ER at 793, [1971] AC at 909

3 [1969] 1 All ER 1043 at 1048, [1969] 2 Ch 85 at 96

4 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

difficulties are likely to arise; the outcome will depend on the true construction of the agreement, on whether s 53 (1) (b) of the Law of Property Act 1925 applies and if so whether its provisions are satisfied; and perhaps on whether the agreement is one which equity would specifically enforce so as to obviate the necessity for compliance with that section. If there is an express agreement, even if it is ineffective by reason of s 53 (1) (b) or otherwise to achieve the intention of the parties, it must, I think, inevitably preclude any implied consensus.

The crucial question, it seems to me, is which of the two types of implied or inferred consensus to which I have already referred is contemplated in the ratio decidendi of *Gissing v Gissing*⁵; is it consensus as to the proportions in which the parties are to be taken as having provided the purchase moneys (which I will call 'money consensus') thus defining the beneficial interests arising under a resulting trust? or consensus as to what the beneficial interests of the spouses are to be (which I will call 'interest consensus') irrespective of the source or sources of the purchase money—interests inconsistent with and displacing the resulting trust (if any) that would otherwise have arisen? In my judgment the opinions in *Gissing v Gissing*⁵ contemplated money consensus and not interest consensus. I reach that conclusion for the following reasons: 1. Interest consensus postulates an express trust, whereas the basis of all the opinions in the House of Lords is resulting trust. 2. On that footing, if an express trust is to be valid there must be compliance with s 53 (1) (b) of the Law of Property Act 1925 or an enforceable agreement. Apart from the difficulties inherent in such cases as *Balfour v Balfour*⁶, it seems clear from references in the opinions to common intention and other indications that the House of Lords was not contemplating a consensus that was enforceable as an executory contract. 3. If the consensus is treated as rebutting the presumption of a resulting trust, subsequent acts and declarations would be admissible as evidence only against the party doing or making them (see *Shephard v Cartwright*⁷). It is explicit in the opinions in the House of Lords that subsequent acts may found an inference in favour of the party performing them. 4. All the examples given by their Lordships in *Gissing v Gissing*⁵ were of payments of money (directly or indirectly) or the discharge of obligations which would found inferences as to the shares in which the parties were to be treated as having contributed to the purchase consideration; that is would found inferences of money consensus. 5. The maxim 'equality is equity' (for which no great enthusiasm was shown) was treated as applicable (if at all) where it was not possible to quantify the contribution intended to have been made by one or other spouse except by saying that it was substantial.

Accordingly, in my judgment, the steps to be taken in solving the sort of questions with which I am now concerned are: First, determine the actual source or sources of the purchase money, that is from whose bank account or savings account or other resources was it provided, treating the party who assumed liability to a mortgagee as the source of the money so raised. Secondly, determine whether there was any express agreement and if so whether it complied with s 53 (1) (b) of the Law of Property Act 1925 or was enforceable so as to obviate such compliance. Thirdly, from the whole of the evidence including acts of the parties before, at the time of and after the purchase, determine whether there can be inferred consensus as to the proportions in which they were to be treated as providing the purchase money. The test must, I think, be similar to that propounded by MacKinnon LJ in *Shirlaw v Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd*⁸, with this difference, that whereas in commercial dealings the general expectation is that the parties will record all the terms of their bargain, in matrimonial matters it is unlikely that the spouses will record all, or perhaps any, of

5 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

6 [1919] 2 KB 571, [1918-19] All ER Rep 860

7 [1954] 3 All ER 649, [1955] AC 431

8 [1939] 2 All ER 113 at 124, [1939] 2 KB 206 at 227; on appeal HL [1940] 2 All ER 445, [1940] AC 701

a such terms. But in each case it must be possible to infer that to the officious bystander's question, 'Ought you not to record that you are intending to pay for this house in equal (or some other) shares?' their common answer would be 'No; that goes without saying', and to infer moreover that each had the same intention as to what it was, that went without saying. Fourthly, determine whether the initial beneficial interests have been altered by a subsequent agreement (express or implied) or by the creation of a fresh express trust. Lastly, if there is a sale of the property, distribute the proceeds in accordance with the ascertained beneficial interests applying, where applicable, equitable principles of accounting.

b In the normal case the beneficial interest will depend on the conclusion reached under the first, third and fourth of these headings, and particularly whether money consensus can be inferred under the third heading. In a simple case where a couple have consistently applied a system of all purchases out of a common fund the inference c may present no difficulty. Otherwise, for my part, applying the reasoning of the House of Lords and the decision in *Gissing v Gissing*⁹, I think that only in rare cases will it be possible to infer that consensus with sufficient certainty, even if, as a last resort, the maxim 'equality is equity' is invoked. For that maxim can only assist if consensus that both spouses are to be treated as making substantial contributions is established, but the proportions cannot be precisely quantified. The maxim cannot, d I think, found an inference of such consensus if that inference cannot otherwise be drawn; nor, as Lord Pearson said in *Gissing v Gissing*¹⁰, can it displace a consensus that can be quantified.

e I find further support for this view in the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970. That Act by s 37 provided a statutory solution to the type of problem that arose in *Pettitt v Pettitt*¹¹, but it did not deal at all with the problem of ascertaining property rights which arose in *Gissing v Gissing*⁹ and arises in this case. On the other hand, by ss 2 and 4 the Act gave to the court a discretionary power to deal in almost every conceivable way with the assets and property of the parties. Moreover, it is significant that under s 5 (1) (f) the court in exercising that jurisdiction must have regard to 'the contributions made by each of the parties to the welfare of the family, f including any contribution made by looking after the home or caring for the family'. So the principles established in *Gissing v Gissing*⁹, of course, remain applicable in a proper case. But I cannot escape the thought that Parliament evinced an intention that in the vast majority of cases justice would be done by exercising the statutory discretion in relation to all the capital and income resources of the parties rather than by isolating one asset—the matrimonial home—and by inferring a dubious consensus from equivocal facts fitting that particular asset uncomfortably into the framework g of resulting trust.

I must now consider the more recent cases in the Court of Appeal to which counsel have referred me. There are six.

h In *Smith v Baker*¹², Widgery and Karminski LJJ expressly based their conclusion on inferred consensus on the common answer that would have been given to the officious bystander; and I think that that was the implicit basis of Lord Denning MR's judgment. The decision thus anticipated the ratio decidendi of *Gissing v Gissing*⁹ and I think supports my conclusions.

In *Falconer v Falconer*¹³, Lord Denning MR said:

j 'It [the House of Lords] stated the principles on which a matrimonial home, which stands in the name of husband or wife alone, is nevertheless held to belong to them both jointly (in equal or unequal shares). It is done, not so much by

9 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

10 [1970] 2 All ER at 788, [1971] AC at 903

11 [1969] 2 All ER 385, [1970] AC 777

12 [1970] 2 All ER 826, [1970] 1 WLR 1160

13 [1970] 3 All ER 449 at 452, [1970] 1 WLR 1333 at 1336

virtue of an agreement, express or implied, but rather by virtue of a trust which is imposed by law. The law imputes to husband and wife an intention to create a trust, the one for the other. It does so by way of an inference from their conduct and the surrounding circumstances, even though the parties themselves made no agreement on it. This inference of a trust, the one for the other, is readily drawn when each has made a financial contribution to the purchase price or to the mortgage instalments. [He then went on to say:] So long as there is a substantial financial contribution to the family expenses, it raises the inference of a trust.' a

In the earlier passage I think that Lord Denning MR was contrasting an enforceable agreement with the inferred common intention which was the basis of the decision in *Gissing v Gissing*¹³. This accords with the decision of Megaw LJ who upheld the decision of the county court judge on the footing that his inference was based on all the evidence. Sir Frederic Sellers agreed with both judgments. So I think that decision supports my conclusions. I do not understand my second citation from Lord Denning MR to mean that substantial contributions will raise the inference of a trust regardless of all other considerations some of which might point to a contrary inference, because that would be inconsistent with the opinions of the House of Lords that the inference must be based on the whole of the evidence. I think that Lord Denning MR's observation must be read in the light of the facts of that case on the footing that there was no other relevant evidence. c

In *Heseltine v Heseltine*¹⁴, Lord Denning MR said:

'In the usual way the court imputes a trust under which the husband is to hold it for them both jointly in equal shares. But half-and-half is not an invariable division. If some other division is more fair, the court will adopt it: see *Gissing v Gissing*¹³. In the present case the registrar said that the division should be as to three-quarters to the wife and one-quarter to the husband. That seems to me to be entirely fair.' e

Karminski LJ¹⁵ agreed with Lord Denning MR and did not deal separately with the matrimonial home. Megaw LJ upholding the registrar's decision said¹⁶:

'I am unable to see how the proportion of three-quarters to one-quarter on which the registrar decided can be challenged as being unfair or excessive in relation to the husband's interest therein.' f

Looked at literally those statements seem to be a reference to the fair and reasonable test which was rejected by the House of Lords; but reading the judgments as a whole I think that the word 'fair' must indicate those proportions in which, as a matter of inference on the whole of the evidence, both parties intended to contribute to the purchase price. On that footing again the decision supports my conclusions. g

In *Latimer v Latimer*¹⁷ (which is unreported, but I was supplied with a transcript of the judgment) the decision must, I think, have proceeded on a similar basis of inferred common intention notwithstanding Lord Denning MR's reference to what the court orders and Edmund Davies LJ's statement that the Court of Appeal's conclusion 'more nearly approximates to justice than the decision of the learned registrar'. h

In *Davis v Vale*¹⁸ the basis of the decision was also, in my view, inference of consensus as to proportions of contribution. Lord Denning MR said¹⁹:

'... what is the proper trust for the courts to impose or infer? What is the

13 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

14 [1971] 1 All ER 952 at 954, [1971] 1 WLR 342 at 345

15 [1971] 1 All ER at 957, [1971] 1 WLR at 348

16 [1971] 1 All ER at 959, [1971] 1 WLR at 351

17 (1st December 1970) unreported

18 [1971] 2 All ER 1021, [1971] 1 WLR 1022

19 [1971] 2 All ER at 1026, [1971] 1 WLR at 1027 j

- a extent of the beneficial interests of each? What is "just in all the circumstances of the case?"

I think that the last question must imply that that solution is just which accords with the inferred consensus. Edmund Davies LJ asked the question²⁰ 'whether, in all the circumstances, an implied agreement should be inferred; and, if so, how it affected the beneficial interest'. Stamp LJ's approach¹ was the same although he expressed reservations whether the facts justified the inference that was drawn.

- b The last case, *Hargrave v Newton*², has caused me the greatest difficulty. The registrar found that there was an adjustment to the wife's contribution to expenses referable to the acquisition of the house when she went out to work. But she went out to work and attained her highest earnings before the house was acquired; and the whole of the purchase price was raised on loan. The Court of Appeal upheld the registrar's decision that each had a half share in the house but not on that ground. It seems that the basis of the decision was the mere fact that the wife made contributions to general expenses. Both Lord Denning MR and Megaw LJ relied on the opinion of Lord Reid in *Gissing v Gissing*³ which, so it seems to me, in significant respects did not accord with the other four opinions. The principal reason (although not the only reason) why the wife was able to make the contributions she did make was a wholly unforeseen and unforeseeable windfall of over £5,000. None of this was used (as it might have been) to repay all or part of the mortgage loan. I myself find difficulty in seeing how the windfall could have been a fact raising the inference of a common intention at the time of the purchase that the wife was to be treated as contributing one half of the purchase price of the house. I am respectfully of the opinion that the decision can only be reconciled with the principles in *Gissing v Gissing*³ if the Court of Appeal did draw that inference.

In my judgment those authorities do not compel me to resile from the conclusion of law that I have reached on a consideration of the relevant principles and the decisions in *Pettitt v Pettitt*⁴ and *Gissing v Gissing*³.

- c Counsel for the husband submitted that I should approach the question at issue on the footing that the purchase price was actually provided as to £4,000 by the wife and £8,000 by the husband, and that their respective equitable interests must be in those proportions unless on the totality of the evidence I can infer a common intention at the time of the purchase that they were to be treated as providing the money in equal shares. On the facts, he submitted that no such common intention could be inferred. Further he submitted (and counsel for the wife did not dissent) that there was no agreement express or implied to vary the original beneficial interests after the date of purchase. Counsel for the wife submitted that as a matter of equitable principle if the wife contributed to the purchase of the house, directly or indirectly, then if her contributions (either at the time of the purchase or subsequently) were substantial she was entitled to an equal share unless there was an express agreement to the contrary. Alternatively, on the facts, he submitted that a common intention that the wife was to be treated as having contributed half the purchase price was to be inferred. I have no doubt that on any view of the matter the wife's contribution here was substantial. But for the reasons I have indicated I think that the submission of counsel for the wife on the law is unsound, and I accept the submission of counsel for the husband on the principles to be applied. I must, therefore, consider what (if any) common intention is to be inferred on the footing that one-third of the purchase price was actually provided by the wife and two-thirds by the husband and that there was no relevant express agreement.

20 [1971] 2 All ER at 1026, 1027, [1971] 1 WLR at 1027

1 [1971] 2 All ER at 1028, [1971] 1 WLR at 1029

2 [1971] 3 All ER 866, [1971] 1 WLR 1611

3 [1970] 2 All ER 780, [1971] AC 886

4 [1969] 2 All ER 385, [1970] AC 777

The facts on which counsel for the wife relied as establishing a common intention for equal contributions are as follows. It was only when the parties knew that the wife had a substantial legacy under her father's will that they started to look for a house; if there had been no legacy there would have been no house. The husband had no capital. The total amount of the legacy (£5,591) substantially exceeded the £4,000 paid in cash. The wife had paid some rent, but admittedly only after she had received her legacy. The wife had received other legacies; £80 in 1962 at about the time of the purchase; £3,150 in 1966; £500 in 1967. Her aunt had paid £1,000 to have central heating installed in the house in 1963 and had given her £438 in 1966 to be applied in paying (as it was applied) an overdue premium on the policy and overdue interest on the mortgage. The wife paid that premium and interest in 1966 and also £517 as premium and interest in 1968. In addition, when the husband paid the first premium and instalment of interest he had had moneys from the wife although not expressly for that purpose. While the parties were married and living together in the matrimonial home the wife made substantial contributions to general living expenses (including school fees). Since July 1962 she had received from outside sources a total of £9,221 (including her father's legacy), £4,000 of which admittedly went towards the purchase price. The whole of the balance was spent either for family purposes or in supporting the husband's business. Since the parties separated the wife paid £650 as mortgage interest. According to the wife's evidence, at the time of the purchase she assumed that the house would be put in her name or joint names, and she relies on a letter dated 2nd July 1962 from the husband to the vendor containing references to 'we' and 'us' in relation to the purchase. The whole picture, says counsel for the wife, is one of a joint venture, and a joint venture means an equal venture.

Counsel for the husband relies on the following facts which, he submits, preclude any inference of a common intention to make equal contributions. The parties never had a joint banking account or joint savings or any other pooling of resources. The husband regarded himself as purchasing the house, notwithstanding his receipt of over £4,000 from the wife; he raised an overdraft with guarantees for the purpose. He also referred to himself as the purchaser in contemporary correspondence. Whatever the wife assumed at the time of the purchase, she made no representations on the subject to the husband; in any event her assumption that she was to have an interest would be as consistent with a one-third share as with an equal share. If the intention had been for equal contributions, each would have been equally entitled to the surplus policy moneys. But the husband unequivocally treated the policy as his own by settling it under the Married Women's Property Act 1882 in trust for the wife. Indeed in her evidence she referred to it as 'his' policy. Although in fact the wife made contributions to general expenses and eventually paid some premiums and interest she was able to do so only because of unexpected legacies and gifts. No inferences as to the state of mind of the parties in 1962 can be drawn from what the wife did with such legacies and gifts in 1966, 1967 and 1968. Indeed, in 1962, whatever past experience might have been, and whatever suspicions the wife might have had as to the future based on them, they both thought that the husband was firmly established in a business which would provide for their needs and neither contemplated that in future the wife would go out to work to supplement the family income, or receive money from any source other than the husband, or do anything other than carry out the normal duties of a wife and mother. Since 1962 and while the parties were together the husband received from outside sources over £25,000 all of which was disbursed either on living expenses (including payments of premiums and interest) or on the husband's business which, although it turned out unsuccessfully, was in 1962 intended to be the basis of the family's prosperity.

The submissions of counsel for the wife have cogency and attraction. But in my judgment, looking at the totality of the evidence and putting the matter at its highest in his favour, the facts are equivocal; and I am wholly unable to draw from them an a inference that the parties in 1962 intended to contribute equally to the purchase of the house. But I go further. I am of opinion that the settlement of the policy on trust for the wife and the then contemplation of the parties that in future the husband alone was to be the source of the family income are themselves conclusive against any such inference. I propose, therefore, to declare that Appletrees is held on trust for sale and that the net proceeds of sale are held on trust for the wife and the husband as tenants in common as to one-third thereof for the wife and two-thirds thereof for the husband.

b The parties are agreed that there should be a sale of the house, and I so order. I will deal in chambers with the question of the terms as to date of completion and otherwise on which the sale should take place and with the wife's right of occupation in the meantime. I shall also adjourn to chambers the question of provision for the wife and children under the 1970 Act to be determined after the purchase price for the house has been ascertained.

c I must, however, deal with the question of equitable accounting. It is common ground, in the light of my conclusion on the facts, that the parties must be regarded as having treated their moneys separately for this purpose. It follows that there must be debited against the husband's share the whole of the outstanding mortgage and the unpaid interest and premiums that are charged on the house and the policy. There must also be debited against his share a sum of £1,500 which he raised on the security of the policy and £1,749 the subject of a charging order on the house as a result of a judgment against the husband for a business liability; also the sum owed to Mr Carter and the wife's brother on their guarantees. The wife must be credited and the husband debited with the sums of £517 and £438 paid by her as premiums and interest and with the £650 that she has paid since the separation for interest. So much is common ground. There is, however, a question as to the policy. It is agreed that it must be surrendered. Counsel for the wife submits that only the surrender moneys attributable to the basic sum of £8,000 should enure for the benefit of the husband and that the discounted profit element should be held on trust for the wife on the footing that that would have been the result if the policy had matured by effluxion of time or on the husband's death. Although the submission has some superficial attraction, I cannot accept it. The whole policy is charged with the mortgage debt. Only subject to that charge has the wife any beneficial interest in it. All the premiums were paid with the primary object of repaying that debt. In my opinion the total surrender moneys must be applied towards payment of that debt in reduction of the debit against the husband's share. There should be liberty to apply in chambers in event of any dispute in working out this order.

g I am constrained to add one further observation. The purchase of a matrimonial home cannot be accomplished without professional advice and assistance. In dealing with the purchase solicitors make many common form enquiries dealing with such matters as planning, registration of charges, and so forth. Although it is not for me to dictate such matters I think that it would be desirable, also as a matter of common form, that they should make specific enquiries of the spouses of their intentions as to beneficial ownership. The just resolution of future disputes would be facilitated; the additional costs would be insignificant; and I cannot think that connubial harmony would be unduly jeopardised.

Order accordingly.

j Solicitors: Geoffrey S Beccle & Co (for the wife); Crane & Hawkins (for the husband).

Alice Bloomfield Barrister.

C H Giles & Co Ltd v Morris and others

CHANCERY DIVISION

MEGARRY J

5th, 9th, 29th NOVEMBER 1971

Specific performance – Contract to execute service agreement – Service agreement not specifically enforceable – Contract containing provision requiring defendants to appoint third party managing director of company for five years – Contract requiring only the performance of single act, i.e. execution of service agreement – Contract specifically enforceable – Immaterial that service agreement as a contract for personal services not specifically enforceable.

By a contract dated 6th November 1970, I P Ltd, a firm of insurance brokers, whose shares were all owned by the defendants, agreed with G and G's company, G Ltd (the plaintiffs) to adopt new articles of association, to reorganise its share capital and to sell certain shares to the plaintiff company. The contract contained a variety of other provisions, one of which was that the defendants would procure that G should be appointed by a service agreement as managing director of I P Ltd for five years. Completion of the contract did not take place owing to disagreement among the defendants and on 22nd June 1971 the plaintiff company issued a writ claiming specific performance of the contract. The application was heard before a master on 8th September when all the defendants, after taking legal advice, consented to the master making an order for specific performance by 4th October. The order was for the defendants to procure, inter alia, the execution by I P Ltd of the service agreement with G. The board of I P Ltd met on 4th October but refused to appoint G as managing director on the ground that he had not appropriate insurance experience. By a motion the plaintiffs sought committal of three of the nine personal defendants who had refused to take the necessary steps to procure G's appointment as managing director in accordance with the consent order, and for leave to sue out a writ of sequestration in respect of the tenth defendant, a limited company. It was contended on behalf of the defendants that they had been wrongly advised to give their consent to the order of 8th September and that the court should not use the remedies of committal and sequestration to secure the appointment of G to a position under a service agreement from which he would be promptly excluded in breach of contract, thus giving rise to a claim for damages.

Held – The defendants were in contempt of court for their disobedience to the order for specific performance of 8th September and there was no defence to the plaintiffs' motion. Although the court would not usually decree specific performance of a contract for personal services, all that the decree required in the present case was the procuring of a single act, i.e. the execution of the service agreement. The mere fact that the contract to be made was one of which the court would not decree specific performance was not a ground for refusing to decree that the contract be entered into. Furthermore the obligation to enter into a service agreement was merely one part of a contract that dealt with many other matters; it did not follow that, because a contract contained one provision which by itself would not be specifically enforceable, the contract as a whole could not be specifically enforced (see p 968 a and f and p 970 e, post).

Per Megarry J. It should not be assumed that as soon as any element of personal service or continuous services can be discerned in a contract the court will, without more, refuse specific performance (see p 970 b, post).

- a* Quaere. Whether since the enactment of s 15 (4)^a of the Administration of Justice Act 1956 the court has jurisdiction to entertain a motion to set aside or discharge an order made by a judge or master in chambers (see p 966 a e g and j to p 967 a, post).

Notes

For specific performance of contracts for personal service or work, see 36 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 268, para 366 and for cases on the subject, see 44 Digest (Repl) 15, 16, 66-75.

- b* For the Administration of Justice Act 1956, s 15, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 702.

Cases referred to in judgment

- Ainsworth v Wilding* [1896] 1 Ch 673, 65 LJCh 432, 74 LT 193, 50 Digest (Repl) 531, 1979.
- c* Boake v Stevenson [1895] 1 Ch 358, 64 LJCh 261, 71 LT 722, 51 Digest (Repl) 638, 2470. Fortescue v Lostwithiel and Fowey Railway Co [1894] 3 Ch 621, 64 LJCh 37, 71 LT 423, 44 Digest (Repl) 16, 75.
- Giles, Re, Real and Personal Advance Co v Michell* (1890) 43 Ch D 391, 59 LJCh 226, 62 LT 375, 51 Digest 638, 2478.
- d* Granville v Betts (1848) 18 LJCh 32.
- Heatley v Newton* (1881) 19 Ch D 326, 51 LJCh 225, 45 LT 455, 51 Digest (Repl) 805, 3618.
- Holloway v Cheston* (1881) 19 Ch D 516, 51 LJCh 208, 51 Digest (Repl) 638, 2471.
- Johnson, Re, Manchester and Liverpool Banking Co v Beales, Johnson v Hooley* (1889) 42 Ch D 505, 59 LJCh 99, 61 LT 160, 51 Digest (Repl) 638, 2477.
- e* London Permanent Benefit Building Society v de Baer [1968] 1 All ER 372, [1969] 1 Ch 321, [1968] 2 WLR 465, Digest (Cont Vol C) 719, 3141a.
- Mileage Conference Group of the Tyre Manufacturers' Conference Ltd's Agreement, Re* [1966] 2 All ER 849, [1966] 1 WLR 1137, Digest (Cont Vol B) 711, 227a.
- Paxton v Newton* (1854) 2 Sm & G 437, 65 ER 470, 31 Digest (Repl) 369, 5003.
- Purcell v F C Trigell Ltd* (trading as Southern Window and General Cleaning Co) [1970] 3 All ER 671, [1971] 1 QB 358, [1970] 3 WLR 884, Digest (Cont Vol C) 1095, 3232a.
- f* Ryan v Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association [1893] 1 Ch 116, 62 LJCh 252, 67 LT 820, 44 Digest (Repl) 23, 141.
- Stocker v Wedderburn* (1857) 3 K & J 393, 26 LJCh 713, 30 LTOS 71, 44 Digest (Repl) 19, 101.
- Thomas, Re, Bartley v Thomas* [1911] 2 Ch 389, 105 LT 59, 51 Digest (Repl) 626, 2388.
- g* Wilson v West Hartlepool Railway Co (1865) 2 De GJ & Sm 475, 34 LJCh 241, 11 LT 692, 34 Beav 187, 44 Digest (Repl) 45, 315.
- Wilson v Wilson* (1854) 5 HL Cas 40, 23 LJCh 697, 23 LTOS 134, 27 Digest (Repl) 241, 1944.

Motion and cross-motion

- h* The plaintiffs, C H Giles & Co Ltd moved for an order for the committal to prison of Jessie Marie Stuart Morris, Yvonne Stuart Matthews and Leonard Arthur William Thurgood and leave to sue out a writ of sequestration against Defiance Investments Ltd who were among ten defendants in an action by the plaintiffs for specific performance of a contract dated 6th November 1970. The contract was the subject of an order for specific performance made with the consent of the parties by Master

- j* a Section 15 (4) provides: 'Section sixty-two of the [Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925] (which enables orders of a judge in chambers to be set aside or discharged by a judge in court or by a Divisional Court) and paragraph (g) of subsection (1) of section thirty-one of that Act (which requires the leave of the judge or of the Court of Appeal for an appeal against any order of a judge in chambers unless an application has been made to have it set aside or discharged as aforesaid) shall cease to have effect, without prejudice, however, to the power of rules of court to make provision corresponding to the said section sixty-two.'

Dinwiddy on 8th September 1971. By cross-notice of motion the aforementioned defendants sought to vary or discharge that consent order. The facts are set out in the judgment.

F P Neill QC and Richard Sykes for the plaintiffs.

Jeremiah Harman QC and L H Hoffman for the defendants to the motion.

Cur adv vult

29th November. MEGARRY J read the following judgment. This is a motion by the plaintiff company to commit three of nine personal defendants, and for leave to sue out a writ of sequestration in respect of the tenth defendant, a limited company called Defiance Investments Ltd, which I shall refer to as 'Defiance'. The matter arises out of a consent order for specific performance made by Master Dinwiddy on 8th September 1971. The contract in question was made on 6th November 1970 and is of considerable complexity. The defendants between them own all the issued shares in a company called Invincible Policies Ltd, which I shall call 'Invincible'. Invincible carries on the business of insurance brokers, and has a subsidiary called Trafalgar Insurance Co Ltd (which I shall call 'Trafalgar') which carries on a motor insurance business; and Invincible owns well over 75 per cent of the shares in Trafalgar. The broad picture is that the moving spirit in Defiance and Invincible was Mr Arthur Stuart Morris, who for many years had been chairman and managing director of both companies. In 1970 Mr Morris, who was well on into his sixties and was contemplating ultimate retirement, entered into discussions with a Mr C H Giles, a man in his middle twenties who had experience of lending money on second mortgages, but who seems to have had no experience with motor or other insurance. The upshot of these discussions was the agreement of 6th November 1970. Just over two months later, Mr Morris died suddenly; and the first and second defendants, against whom orders of committal are sought, are the administrators of his estate.

Under the agreement, Mr Morris and all the other defendants (save his administrators, who stand in his shoes) are named as the vendors; Defiance, which is also one of the vendors, is named as the second party, the then directors of Invincible as the parties of the third part, Mr Giles as the fourth party, and Mr Giles's company, C H Giles & Co Ltd, the plaintiffs, as the fifth party. It is the plaintiffs in the action who are bringing this motion. The contract provides for Invincible to adopt new articles of association and reorganise its share capital, and also for the sale of certain shares in Invincible to the plaintiffs on certain terms, together with a variety of other provisions, filling over 40 pages of foolscap; but I think I need mention only two provisions in any detail.

Clause 2 provides that 'On or before completion the Vendors will procure the following to be done'. Among the seven paragraphs of the clause appears para (f): 'Mr. Giles shall enter into a Service Agreement with [Invincible] in the form of the draft annexed hereto marked "A"'. The draft marked 'A' provides for Mr Giles to be appointed 'as a Managing Director' of Invincible for five years, and for him to exercise such powers and comply with and perform such directions and duties consistent with his office as 'a Managing Director' in relation to the business and affairs of the company 'as may from time to time be vested in or given to him by the Board of Directors of [Invincible] . . .'. There is a further provision in the contract, in cl (2 g), that 'Mr. Giles shall be appointed a Director of Trafalgar'. It is from the first of these two provisions that the main difficulty arises. By cl 8 the sale and purchase of the shares was to be completed 'as soon as practicable'.

After the death of Mr Morris on 10th January 1971 various discussions took place which all came to nothing. Completion was originally fixed for 31st December 1970 but did not take place. During March and April 1971 various dates for completion were arranged, but still completion did not take place. On 18th March the solicitors for the defendants gave the plaintiffs notice to complete within seven days, a so that some time after the death of Mr Morris the defendants, far from resisting completion, were pressing for it. Five of the defendants have for over five months expressed themselves as being willing to comply with the terms of the agreement, and no order is sought against them on this motion; nor is any order sought against the defendant Mr Tyson, who is abroad and has not been served. The respondents to the motion for committal and sequestration are the defendants Mrs Morris and Mrs Matthews, who are the administrators of Mr Morris; Mr Thurgood; and Defiance.

b The plaintiffs' writ claiming specific performance was issued on 22nd June 1971; and on 8th September 1971 Master Dinwiddy heard an application by the plaintiffs for summary judgment for specific performance under RSC Ord 86. The defendants who are willing to perform the contract were represented by solicitors; the first defendant was in person, and the other defendants were represented by counsel. c All defendants consented to the master making an order for specific performance; and the order made was for the defendants to procure that various specified acts be done before 4.00 pm on 4th October 1971 or subsequently within four days after service of the order. Two of the acts in question were the execution by Invincible of the service agreement with Mr Giles, and the appointment of Mr Giles as a director of Trafalgar.

d On 4th October 1971 the board of Invincible met. By then, four additional directors had been appointed; and by six votes to one the board refused to appoint Mr Giles as a managing director of Invincible on the terms of the service agreement or at all. The board has also expressed its refusal to have Mr Giles appointed as a director of Trafalgar. The board's objections to Mr Giles are based on allegations of his inexperience in motor insurance, his conduct while taking part in the running of Trafalgar for a period which began over three months before Mr Morris's death and e continued for some six months in all, and a number of other matters, including the importance to the public of a motor insurance business being conducted on sound financial lines, and allegations of Mr Giles's intention to adopt policies of which the board does not approve. The board recognises that the agreement is legally binding, and has expressed the willingness of the board to perform the whole of it except the f two provisions that I have mentioned; but the board seeks to be released from the order so far as it relates to these two provisions.

As I have mentioned, the order is a consent order. The consent was given on the advice of experienced junior counsel practising in this Division. Every objection to performing the two disputed obligations was known to the defendants when they gave their consent to the making of the order. Leading counsel now says on behalf g of the defendants for whom he appears that the advice given them by junior counsel was wrong, and that had they put forward the objections which they now urge it is at least highly doubtful whether the order would have been made. That may be so, or it may not. The facts remains that, with no change of circumstances, the defendants are refusing to carry out the order for specific performance to which, on advice, they consented. Counsel for the defendants says that they are willing to pay h damages, but that the court should not use the remedies of committal and sequestration to secure the appointment of Mr Giles to directorships and a position under a service agreement from which, said counsel, Mr Giles would be promptly excluded in breach of contract, thus giving rise to a claim for damages.

It is true that the defendants cannot directly control the directors of Invincible in this respect; but the defendants have sufficient control of Invincible to be able to remove the appointment of a managing director to the company in general meeting, j and in that way 'procure' the necessary appointment in accordance with the agreement and the order. The plaintiffs in fact have put forward a draft special resolution for this purpose in an affidavit sworn over a week before day 1 of this motion. The defendants have done nothing towards taking this step. Nor have they done anything towards setting aside the judgment. Until in court on day 1, the defendants had not even mentioned to the plaintiffs' solicitors or counsel that they intended to do anything of the kind. There was no more than a part of a single sentence in an affidavit sworn the day before day 1 by one of the directors of Defiance and Trafalgar who is not a party to these proceedings, respectfully asking on behalf of the board of Invincible that they should be released from any part of the order which would compel them to appoint Mr Giles a managing director of Invincible. Not only did that request somewhat miss the point, but also it seemed to be advanced merely as part of a defence against the motion for committal and sequestration, on the footing that the order of the court would remain in force but that to this extent the defendants should not be required to obey it.

The course of the proceedings was that on day 1 counsel for the plaintiffs opened the motion, and towards the end of the day counsel for the defendants began his reply. Initially, counsel for the defendants appeared to be proceeding on the footing of putting forward a defence to the motion based on contentions such as the order for specific performance being an order that never should have been made, the public importance of motor insurance companies being properly conducted by experienced persons, and the futility of procuring the appointment of Mr Giles as a managing director of Invincible when the board would, he asserted, promptly dismiss him in breach of contract and pay damages. However, counsel for the defendants ultimately accepted that there were difficulties in this line of argument so long as the order for specific performance stood, not least in the contention that it was a good defence to a motion for contempt that there was a firm resolution to persist in the contempt. He accepted that it was necessary or at least desirable for him to apply to vary or discharge the consent order.

A weekend happily intervened, and on day 2, with counsel for the plaintiffs not objecting to the shortness of notice, counsel for the defendants moved under a cross-notice of motion to vary or discharge the consent order. The question that then arose was whether it was possible for him to proceed in this way in respect of a consent order that had been perfected, or whether a new action to vary or set aside the order was requisite. In the latter case, I would have no jurisdiction to vary or discharge the order on counsel for the defendants' cross-motion. I am here concerned, of course, not with the process of adjournment from a master to a judge before any order is entered, but with a perfected order. Furthermore, counsel for the defendants' submissions took on a somewhat different aspect. His emphasis was on cl 2 (f) of the contract, relating to the service agreement with Invincible whereunder Mr Giles would become a managing director of that company. This, he said, was a contract for personal services, and so on the face of the order it was plain that the master should never have made it, even by consent. Ultimately, the whole of counsel for the defendants' contention that specific performance should not have been ordered came down to cl 2 (f). By the end of the argument he had accepted the obligation to perform all the provisions of the contract, including the appointment of Mr Giles as a director of Trafalgar under cl 2 (g). But to the performance of cl 2 (f) counsel for the defendants offered the strongest opposition, although stressing that the defendants for whom he appeared were willing to pay damages, and accepting their vulnerability as regards costs. The two issues before me were thus the procedural matter and the question of specific performance. I shall consider the procedural point first.

A convenient starting point is the headnote to *Ainsworth v Wilding*¹. This reads as follows:

'After a judgment has been passed and entered—even where it has been taken by consent and under a mistake—the Court cannot set it aside otherwise than in a fresh action brought for the purpose unless (1.) there has been a clerical mistake or an error arising from an accidental slip or omission within the meaning of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, Order XXVIII, r. 11, or (2.) the judgment as drawn up does not correctly state what the Court actually decided and intended to decide—in either of which cases the application may be made a by motion in the action. Semble, that different considerations apply to interlocutory orders; but that even if a judgment has not been passed and entered the Court will not always interfere on motion, e.g., where from the nature of the ground relied on conflicting evidence is essential.'

This decision has been repeatedly applied and approved; and on the face of it the decision appears to require that a fresh action should be brought in a case like this.

b However, motions to discharge or vary an order have long been known, and so the question is what part is left for them to play. In 1965 a *Practice Direction*² was made which seemed to recognise their role. By para 2:

'If a master's order is drawn up and perfected, no party can thereafter require that matter to be adjourned to the judge. Any dissatisfied party must then proceed by motion to apply for the order to be discharged or varied.'

c This *Practice Direction*², I may say, was helpfully discussed in *London Permanent Benefit Building Society v de Baer*³. An obvious question is how this part of the *Practice Direction*² is to be reconciled with *Ainsworth v Wilding*⁴. Counsel for the defendants contended that the distinction was not between interlocutory and final orders (although *Ainsworth v Wilding*⁴ recognises that there may well be a distinction of this kind), nor between orders made by the master and orders made by a judge, but between orders made in chambers, whether by a master or a judge, and orders made in court. He submitted that, though perfected, an order made in chambers is open to review on motion, whereas an order made in court, at all events if a final order, can be discharged or varied only by means of a new action. In *Ainsworth v Wilding*⁴, the order, a final order made by consent, was made in court during the trial, and was not an order made in chambers. Here, of course, the consent order was made by the master.

f That may indeed have been the distinction; the question is not easy and requires further consideration. But it is pointless to embark on this if the process of moving to vary or discharge an order in chambers no longer exists, at any rate where the order is a master's order; and on this issue counsel for the plaintiffs referred me to the Administration of Justice Act 1956, s 15 (4). The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, s 62, which replaced the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, s 50, enabled orders of a judge in chambers to be set aside or discharged on motion by, inter alia, a judge sitting in court. There are many instances where motions to vary or discharge orders in chambers have been recognised as having been brought under these provisions: see, for example, *Heatley v Newton*⁵, *Re Johnson*⁶, *Re Giles*⁷ and *Boake v Stevenson*⁸. In support of counsel for the defendants' distinction between orders made in chambers and orders made in court, I may say that in three of these cases the order was a judge's order, and in one, *Re Johnson*⁶, it was an order of a chief clerk (as the masters were formerly called), so that no distinction between a judge's order and a master's order seems to have been made. Furthermore, in days past the words 'judge in chambers' plainly included the master acting as deputy for the judge: see, for example, per Warrington J in *Re Thomas*⁹, quoted in de Baer's case¹⁰. The Administration of Justice Act 1956, s 15 (4), however, provided that the Judicature Act 1925, s 62, should cease to have effect, without prejudice to the power of rules of court to make corresponding

2 [1965] 3 All ER 306, [1965] 1 WLR 1259

3 [1968] 1 All ER 372, [1969] 1 Ch 321

4 [1896] 1 Ch 673

5 (1881) 19 Ch D 326 at 334

6 (1889) 42 Ch D 505

7 (1890) 43 Ch D 391

8 [1895] 1 Ch 358

9 [1911] 2 Ch 389 at 396

10 [1968] 1 All ER at 375, [1969] 1 Ch at 328

provisions. Accordingly, it appears that the power to move to vary or discharge an order made in chambers can no longer be based on the statute book, and so, unless it is an inherent power of the court, must be based on some rule of court. No question has arisen before me on the absence of the word 'vary' from the statute, for doubtless a power to set aside or discharge an order a fortiori includes a power to vary it.

In this respect, the only rule that counsel for the defendants relied on was RSC Ord 58, r 7 (2) (a). This is dealing, inter alia, with appeals to the Court of Appeal from 'any judgment, order or decision of a judge in chambers' in the Chancery Division. The sub-rule provides that the appeal is to lie 'after an application to set aside or discharge the judgment, order or decision has been made to the judge sitting in court and has been refused'. One question, then, is whether this sub-rule confers the power to move to vary or discharge an order which had formerly been contained in the Judicature Acts.

There are a number of difficulties. First, the sub-rule appears to be assuming that the power to make such an application exists; it does not in terms purport to confer such a power, either for the purpose of appeals to the Court of Appeal or, a fortiori, generally. In the case of appeals, I may say, the purpose of the adjournment into court is so that the judge may have the opportunity of delivering a judgment which will enable the Court of Appeal to understand the reasons for his decision: see *Holloway v Cheston*¹¹. Secondly, the sub-rule is derived from RSC (No 1) 1957, as amended by RSC (No 1) 1958, which added a new RSC Ord 55, r 14D, to the Rules of the Supreme Court as they then stood; and I cannot see anything in these statutory instruments (1957 No 1178 and 1958 No 650) to suggest any conscious exercise of the power conferred by the Administration of Justice Act 1956, s 15 (4). If the Rules Committee was seeking to confer under the rules the power which the Judicature Acts had formerly conferred in terms, I can only say that, with the words of the power under the Judicature Acts presumably in mind, the different language chosen for the new rule seems singularly oblique, phrased as it is in terms of assumption and of condition precedent to an appeal. Thirdly, the present RSC Ord 58, r 7 (2), is dealing only with appeals from 'a judge in chambers', and I do not think that in the present rules, the Rules of the Supreme Court 1965, the phrase 'a judge in chambers' includes a master. Under RSC Ord 1, r 4 (2), 'the Court' includes masters; the old phrase 'the Court or a Judge' has in the main disappeared from the rules: see Supreme Court Practice 1970¹². 'Judge' now means 'judge', and not 'master' and the rules show themselves perfectly capable of using the word 'master' when 'master' is meant: see RSC Ord 58, r 3, another rule in the order that I have to construe.

As for the inherent jurisdiction, I suppose that it may be that some such jurisdiction has subsisted throughout, and that, although cast into shadow while the statutory power existed, that jurisdiction has now, over 80 years later, emerged once again into the light. But there is nothing before me to suggest that there is such a jurisdiction, and such a point could hardly be resolved without further consideration. The assumption in the Supreme Court Practice 1970¹³, in the notes to RSC Ord 58, r 7, is that motions to set aside or discharge an order in chambers may still be brought. Confidence in this assumption would be greater if there had been any reference to the Administration of Justice Act 1956, s 15 (4); but according to the Table of Statutes¹⁴ the book, although citing sub-ss (2) and (3) of the section, nowhere even mentions sub-s (4).

In those circumstances, the question is what course I ought to take. It may perhaps be that I have jurisdiction to hear counsel for the defendants' motion, and it may well be that I have not. It is possible, of course, that there is some simple explanation

¹¹ (1881) 19 Ch D 516

¹² Page 5, para 1/4/2

¹³ Page 763, para 58/7/1

¹⁴ Page ccix

a that has yet to come my way. Certainly without further argument I should be unwilling to decide the point unless I had to. I have discussed it, I fear at some length, as it was argued in this case, and is a point of some procedural importance which, I think, merits the attention of the Rules Committee, if only because it may arise in some case which cannot be decided on other grounds. In this case, however, I have in fact reached a clear conclusion on the question of specific performance, and this makes it unnecessary for me to decide the question of jurisdiction. After b I have dealt with one other matter, I shall accordingly turn from the question of jurisdiction to that of specific performance. The matter that I should deal with first is that counsel for the defendants' notice of motion also seeks an extension of time for his cross-motion. This is because the courts have adopted a time limit for such motions, and this, originally 21 days, is now 14 days: see *Re Johnson*¹³, *Re Giles*¹⁴ and the Supreme Court Practice 1970¹⁵. The master's order is dated 8th September c 1971 and the defendants' notice of motion is dated 5th November 1971, so that on the face of it the cross-motion is out of time. There is, moreover, very little material before me to support any such extension as is sought. At the least I should require to know in some detail when and under what circumstances the allegedly erroneous advice to the defendants was replaced by the allegedly sound advice; and on this d there is no real evidence before me, although I think counsel for the defendants accepted that it was not until day 1 that the allegedly sound advice was given. Furthermore, for reasons that will appear, I do not think that the cross-motion has any real substance in it. I bear in mind, too, that the burden of setting aside a consent order made on legal advice is very high: see, for example, *Purcell v F C Trigell Ltd*¹⁶. If I have jurisdiction to hear the cross-motion, I can only say that on the evidence e before me I cannot see any real grounds for extending the time; and I therefore would refuse to extend it.

I should, however, be reluctant to dispose of this case on the ground that, if I have jurisdiction, the defendants' cross-motion is out of time and the time ought not to be extended. I should also be reluctant to dispose of the case on the footing that f since the Administration of Justice Act 1956 it is no longer possible to proceed by way of a motion to vary or discharge the order but that a fresh action must be brought; for that would involve expense, delay and prolonged uncertainty. I accordingly think that the right course is for me to assume that I have jurisdiction on the cross-motion, despite my doubts, and consider the question of specific performance, which is also one of the factors that I have borne in mind in holding that no extension of time ought to be granted. Furthermore, there is plainly no question about my g jurisdiction under the plaintiffs' motion, and on that motion it seems at least of some relevance to determine whether or not the order that has been disobeyed is one that ought never to have been made. What I have to consider is whether the presence in the agreement of cl 2 (f), providing for Mr Giles to enter into a service agreement with Invincible in the form of the draft annexed to the contract, prevents the court from decreeing specific performance of the entire agreement, including that sub-clause. It will be observed that there is no question of the plaintiffs seeking to enforce h any order of the court which will compel any of the defendants to carry out, either as employer or employee, any personal services. The order made is an order to procure 'the execution by the Company of the engrossment' of the service agreement. The question is whether such an order falls within the principle that the court will not decree specific performance of a contract for personal services.

j On the face of it the answer must be No. There is no question of the execution of the decree requiring constant superintendence by the court of a continuous series

13 (1889) 42 Ch D 505

14 (1889) 43 Ch D 391

15 Page 763, para 58/7/1

16 [1970] 3 All ER 671, [1971] 1 QB 358

of acts such as arose in *Ryan v Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association*¹⁷, a case that was mentioned but not cited during argument. All that the decree requires in this respect is the procuring of a single act, namely, the execution of the service agreement. When that has been done, the question of any breach of the service agreement and any remedies for that breach is one between Invincible and Mr Giles, and not between Invincible and the plaintiffs. Invincible, too, is a party neither to the contract nor to the action.

The distinction between an order to perform a contract for services and an order to procure the execution of such a contract seems to me to be sound both in principle and on authority. I do not think that the mere fact that the contract to be made is one of which the court would not decree specific performance is a ground for refusing to decree that the contract be entered into. During the argument, counsel for the defendants cited *Fry on Specific Performance*¹⁸ in support of the proposition that the court will not order specific performance of a contract of hiring and service. This, however, is not the whole of the story; and if one turns on¹⁹ one finds *Ryan's case*¹⁷ cited, together with certain other cases. To one of the latter, *Wilson v West Hartlepool Railway Co*²⁰ I drew the attention of counsel towards the conclusion of counsel for the plaintiffs' argument. A variety of points arose in that case, in which Sir John Romilly MR had decreed specific performance¹. On appeal, Knight Bruce and Turner LJJ disagreed, and so the decision was affirmed, in accordance with the judgment of Turner LJ. So far as relevant, the difference between the Lords Justices was on whether or not the agreement in question provided for the execution of any further instrument. Knight Bruce LJ thought not, but Turner LJ held the contrary. However, Knight Bruce LJ said²:

'I agree that there may be and have been cases in which it may well be and has been held that there may, under a bill for specific performance of a contract, be a decree against a Defendant to execute a deed containing covenants on his part to do acts of which, from their nature, specific performance could not directly be enforced. But the present is I think not a case of that description.'

As Turner LJ held not only that the agreement did contemplate the execution of a further deed, but also that the execution of such a deed should be specifically enforced, I think it is clear that both members of the court took the view that specific performance may be decreed of an agreement to execute an instrument even if the obligations under that instrument would not be specifically enforced. It is true that the ground on which specific performance was resisted in that case was not that the further instrument related to acts of personal service but that it was too indefinite in its obligations, requiring a contracting party to use a particular railway 'in preference to all others', 'whenever reasonably practicable', and 'for the longest distance it is reasonably capable of use'. However, in this context I can see no sensible distinction between this objection to specific performance and an objection based on the performance of personal services; and I do not think that the judgments support any such distinction.

That is not the only authority to this effect. Thus there is *Granville v Betts*³, of which Fry⁴ says, 'the real contract here which the Court enforces is a contract to execute

¹⁷ [1893] 1 Ch 116

¹⁸ 6th Edn, 1921, pp 50, 51

¹⁹ See pp 388-390

²⁰ (1865) 2 De GJ & Sm 475

¹ (1864) 34 Beav 187

² (1865) 2 De GJ & Sm at 488

³ (1848) 18 LJCh 32

⁴ 6th Edn, 1921, p 389

a the deed'; and see *Stocker v Wedderburn*⁵. So too in *Wilson v Wilson*⁶, Lord St Leonards said:

b '... it does not at all follow, because the Court of Equity compels the Appellant in this case to enter into a covenant that he will not, by the force of ecclesiastical censures, compel restitution of his conjugal rights, that the Court would enjoin him from breaking that covenant which he has entered into; the Court, I apprehend, would leave him to answer any action that might be brought for damages upon the covenant.'

c Indeed, were the rule otherwise, I do not see why a lessor could not resist specific performance of a contract to grant a lease if that lease contained any term of which specific performance would not be granted, such as a provision like that in *Ryan's case*⁷ for the services of a porter, or for repairs; yet he cannot: see *Paxton v Newton*⁸.

d There is a further consideration. The obligation to enter into a service agreement is merely one part of a contract which deals with many other matters; and that obligation is the only part of that complex which is said not to be specifically enforceable. Now there is authority for saying that the mere presence in a contract of one provision which, by itself, would not be specifically enforceable (because, for example, it requires the performance of personal services) does not prevent the contract as a whole from being specifically enforced. This is so even if the obligation to perform personal services could be enforced only, for instance, by ordering sequestration: see *Fortescue v Lostwithiel and Fowey Railway Co*⁹, and *Fry*¹⁰. In such cases, the contract must be regarded as a whole, and the court may refuse to let the disadvantages and difficulties of specifically enforcing the obligation to perform personal services outweigh the suitability of the rest of the contract for specific performance, and the desirability of the contract as a whole being enforced. After all, pacta sunt servanda.

e One day, perhaps, the courts will look again at the so-called rule that contracts for personal services or involving the continuous performance of services will not be specifically enforced. Such a rule is plainly not absolute and without exception, nor do I think that it can be based on any narrow consideration such as difficulties of constant superintendence by the court. Mandatory injunctions are by no means unknown, and there is normally no question of the court having to send its officers to supervise the performance of the order of the court. Prohibitory injunctions are common, and again there is no direct supervision by the court. Performance of each type of injunction is normally secured by the realisation of the person enjoined that he is liable to be punished for contempt if evidence of his disobedience to the order is put before the court; and if the injunction is prohibitory, actual committal will usually, so long as it continues, make disobedience impossible. If instead the order is for specific performance of a contract for personal services, a similar machinery of enforcement could be employed, again without there being any question of supervision by any officer of the court. The reasons why the court is reluctant to decree specific performance of a contract for personal services (and I would regard it as a strong reluctance rather than a rule) are, I think, more complex and more firmly bottomed on human nature. If a singer contracts to sing, there could no doubt be proceedings for committal if, ordered to sing, the singer remained obstinately dumb. But if instead the singer sang flat, or sharp, or too fast, or too slowly, or too loudly, or too quietly, or resorted to a dozen of the manifestations of temperament traditionally associated with some singers, the threat of committal would reveal

5 (1857) 3 K & J 393 at 403

6 (1854) 5 HL Cas 40 at 61

7 [1893] 1 Ch 116

8 (1854) 2 Sm & G 437

9 [1894] 3 Ch 621

10 Specific Performance, 6th Edn, 1921, p 53

itself as a most unsatisfactory weapon; for who could say whether the imperfections of performance were natural or self-induced? To make an order with such possibilities of evasion would be vain; and so the order will not be made. However, not all contracts of personal service or for the continuous performance of services are as dependent as this on matters of opinion and judgment, nor do all such contracts involve the same degree of the daily impact of person on person. In general, no doubt, the inconvenience and mischief of decreeing specific performance of most of such contracts will greatly outweigh the advantages, and specific performance will be refused. But I do not think that it should be assumed that as soon as any element of personal service or continuous services can be discerned in a contract the court will, without more, refuse specific performance. Of course, a requirement for the continuous performance of services has the disadvantage that repeated breaches may engender repeated applications to the court for enforcement. But so may many injunctions; and the prospects of repetition, although an important consideration, ought not to be allowed to negative a right. As is so often the case in equity, the matter is one of the balance of advantage and disadvantage in relation to the particular obligations in question; and the fact that the balance will usually lie on one side does not turn this probability into a rule. The present case, of course, is a fortiori, since the contract of which specific performance has been decreed requires not the performance of personal services or any continuous series of acts, but merely procuring the execution of an agreement which contains a provision for such services or acts.

It follows that in my judgment the agreement is specifically enforceable, the consent order was properly made, and the advice given by junior counsel that there was no defence to the action on this score was sound advice. In those circumstances, I can see no defence to the plaintiffs' motion to enforce the order. There is no suggestion that any of the procedural requirements have not been satisfied: see in particular RSC Ord 45. Apart from procedural matters, in the end the sole point comes to the specific enforceability of the agreement in view of cl 2 (f); and that point has now been resolved. The question that remains is what order should be made on the plaintiffs' motion for committal and for leave to sue out a writ of sequestration.

In response to a question from the bench, counsel for the plaintiffs, after taking instructions, very properly told me that he was not seeking any immediate order; and accordingly, when I reserved judgment, I told the defendants that no such order would be made, and that they thus would have a locus poenitentiae. Subject to what counsel may have to say on the point, what I propose to do is to adjourn the case for a short while in order to enable the defendants to consider their position, and to take advice on what course they should take and what undertakings, if any, they should proffer to the court. I bear in mind that there is authority for the proposition that it is no defence to proceedings for contempt that the acts or omissions which constituted the contempt were effected reasonably on legal advice: see *Re Agreement of the Mileage Conference Group of the Tyre Manufacturers' Conference Ltd*¹¹. The defendants have in the past shown that they are capable of acting on legal advice, and if they take prompt and vigorous steps to comply with the decree in this case, now that there has been a full ventilation of the opposition to it, that, of course, may materially affect the order that I shall make on the motion. So that there may be no misunderstanding, let me say in terms that I hold the defendants Jessie Marie Stuart Morris, Yvonne Stuart Matthews, Leonard Arthur William Thurgood and Defiance Investments Ltd in contempt of court for their disobedience to the order for specific performance made on 8th September 1971 in the terms stated in the plaintiffs' notice of motion. Subject to one matter, I shall proceed to hear counsel on the question of the adjournment; and if it will facilitate matters, I shall rise for a short while so that counsel may take instructions and discuss the matter.

a That one matter is this. In this judgment I have referred to a number of authorities not cited in argument. On the procedural point I have reached no final conclusion, and so the citation of additional authorities in that respect does not raise any particular difficulty. But it is otherwise in relation to the question of specific enforceability. On this, the only authority cited to me by either side was Fry¹², cited by counsel for the defendants. *Wilson v West Hartlepool Railway Co*¹³ came into the picture because, looking at Snell's Equity¹⁴ during the argument, I found the case cited there on what seemed to be the relevant point, and I drew counsel for the plaintiffs' attention to it; and at the conclusion of leading counsel for the plaintiffs' argument his junior read me certain passages from the case in support of the plaintiffs' cause. The case was thus both mentioned and cited before counsel for the defendants began his reply; and at an earlier stage I had put questions to him based on there being a distinction between a contract for personal services and a contract to enter into a contract for personal services. At the conclusion of the argument, I intimated that I might require further argument, particularly as my copy of the report of *Wilson's case*¹³ showed that the decision had been referred to in a number of subsequent cases. I have now pursued these references, and find that they relate to issues in *Wilson's case*¹³ other than that of the specific enforceability of the agreement. In those circumstances, I have not thought it right to involve those concerned in the trouble and delay that would result from restoring the case for further argument. The point and the leading authority on it were fairly before counsel, and the other authorities seem to me in the main merely to support and amplify that authority. Indeed, *Granville v Betts*¹⁵, *Stocker v Wedderburn*¹⁶ and *Wilson v Wilson*¹⁷ were all cited in *Wilson's case*¹⁸. *Fortescue's case*¹⁹, it is true, exemplifies a different aspect, but even if in some way it could be shown to be nihil ad rem, that would not destroy either the authority of *Wilson's case*¹³ or the principle. *Fortescue's case*¹⁹, I may say, is duly cited in Fry²⁰, two pages on from the passage which counsel for the defendants cited to me. I am dealing explicitly with this point because, of course, this is a committal case, with all that that implies, and the citation in a judgment of authorities not discussed during argument is a matter that must be approached with caution. Accordingly, although I do not require further argument, if counsel on either side desire that there should be any further argument, I shall readily listen to any application for the purpose.

[After a short adjournment counsel intimated that they did not wish to address any further argument to his Lordship and counsel for the defendants gave an undertaking to set in motion the necessary procedures to comply with the consent order. The case was adjourned until 12th January 1972 when the court, on being satisfied that the order had been complied with and that the defendants had tendered apologies, made no order on the motion or cross-motion save that the defendants to the motion should pay the plaintiffs' costs of the motion and cross-motion on a common fund basis.]

Solicitors: Herbert Smith & Co (for the plaintiffs); Goodman, Derrick & Co (for the defendants to the motion).

R W Farrin Barrister.

12 6th Edn, 1921, pp 50, 51

13 (1865) 2 De GJ & Sm 475

14 26th Edn, 1966, p 646

15 (1848) 18 LJCh 32

16 (1857) 3 K & J 393

17 (1854) 5 HL Cas 40

18 (1865) 2 De GJ & Sm at 486, 487

19 [1894] 3 Ch 621

20 6th Edn, 1921, p 53

Norwich Pharmacal Co and others v Commissioners of Customs and Excise

CHANCERY DIVISION

GRAHAM J

2nd, 3rd, 6th, 7th, 8th, 16th DECEMBER 1971

Discovery – Production of documents – Parties – Defendant for purpose of discovery only – Circumstances in which order may be made – Purpose of order to obtain information so that proceedings might be brought against third parties – Information obtained by defendant under statutory powers – Commissioners of Customs and Excise – Information in possession of commissioners including names and addresses of importers of drug – Import of drug constituting infringement of plaintiffs' patent – Plaintiffs seeking order for discovery against commissioners to enable plaintiffs to proceed against importers – Plaintiffs entitled to order for discovery limited to names and addresses of third parties.

The plaintiffs were the registered proprietors of letters patent which covered the specific compound known as furazolidone, a drug used as a medicament for poultry. Third parties, who were unknown to the plaintiffs, imported furazolidone into the United Kingdom thereby infringing the letters patent, subject to the possibility that certain consignments had in fact been licensed by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs accordingly, wishing and intending to take proceedings against the third parties when they had discovered their identity, commenced an action against the Commissioners of Customs and Excise seeking, inter alia, an order that the commissioners give to the plaintiffs the names and addresses of the importers in question and all documents relating to the imported furazolidone. In carrying out their duties, and by virtue of their powers under s 28 of the Customs and Excise Act 1952, the commissioners required importers to fill up certain forms stating, inter alia, their names and addresses and the amount of goods imported. It was those documents which the plaintiffs claimed should be produced. The commissioners objected to the discovery of the documents on the following grounds: (i) that the documents were subject to Crown privilege in that it was contrary to the public interest that the commissioners should make the disclosure since that would hamper them in discharging their statutory duties effectively because consignors and importers would tend to withhold information from or falsify information given to the commissioners if it were known that the latter were liable to be compelled to disclose such information; (ii) that the commissioners could legally only use information received in carrying out their duties under the 1952 Act for purposes authorised by that Act; and (iii) that even if the commissioners had power to disclose the information requested they were under no duty to disclose and could not be compelled to do so in proceedings in which they were mere witnesses and in which the only order that could be made against them was the order for discovery.

Held – (i) The claim to Crown privilege in respect of the documents could not be upheld; the only basis on which such a claim could be made was that the document fell within a class which the public interest, in the sense of the proper functioning of the public service, required should be withheld; since there was little substance in the contention that the disclosure in the limited form sought would discourage other importers from fulfilling their legal obligation to supply correct information to the commissioners, the grounds for the claim were outweighed by the public interest in ensuring that the administration of justice was expeditiously dispatched and not thwarted or delayed by the withholding of information the disclosure of which could do no harm to anyone except those who were admitted wrongdoers (see p 980 f and p 981 f to h, post); dicta of Lord Reid and Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest in Conway v Rimmer [1968] 1 All ER at 888, 900, 901, applied.

a (ii) There was no absolute rule that the commissioners could not legally use information obtained in the course of their duties for purposes other than those for which it was collected unless there was some statute authorising them to do so; furthermore the provisions of s 3 of the Finance Act 1967 authorising the commissioners to disclose certain information on notification by the Secretary of State could not by implication overrule the right of the court to direct that discovery of relevant matters should be given in what the court considered to be a proper case; in special circumstances information about third parties which could normally be classed as confidential might have to be disclosed; the fact that the information had been obtained as a result of statutory power rather than in some other way made no difference to the circumstances under which it should or should not be disclosed (see p 984 g to p 985 a, post).

c (iii) Although in general no independent action for discovery lay against a party against whom no reasonable cause of action could be alleged or who was in the position of a mere witness in the strict sense, the rule was not invariable; in appropriate circumstances an action would lie against an 'interested' party to make him discover the names of persons who from the facts must be presumed to be wrongdoers; even though the only order which could be successfully made against him was based on that discovery there was power to make such an order in exceptional cases where it could properly be said that the evidence might be relevant to an issue in the main action and where discovery would aid the proper and expeditious administration of justice (see p 983 d and p 986 b to f, post); Upmann v Elkan (1871) LR 12 Eq 140, Orr v Diaper (1876) 4 Ch D 92 and Panthalu v Ramnord Research Laboratories Ltd [1965] 2 All ER 921 applied.

e (iv) The present case was exceptional in that it concerned the infringement of letters patent and also in that the main issues, i.e. the validity of the letters patent and the nature of the infringement, were clear on the record; the only possible outstanding point was whether any particular consignment was licensed, an issue which the plaintiffs would immediately be able to prove or disprove when they learnt who the importers were; accordingly, in order that justice might be done as speedily and cheaply as possible, it was highly desirable that the short cut should be taken and the plaintiffs enabled to obtain the names of admitted infringers from the commissioners; an order would therefore be made against the commissioners for discovery limited to the names and addresses of the importers in question (see p 986 f and g and p 987 a, post).

Notes

g For discovery when party defendant for purposes of discovery only, see 12 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 10, 11, para 11, and for cases on the subject, see 18 Digest (Repl) 6-7, 17-23.

For privilege where disclosure of documents is contrary to public interest, see 12 Halsbury's Laws (3rd Edn) 53-55, para 73, and for cases on the subject, see 18 Digest (Repl) 139-142, 1256-1282.

h For the Customs and Excise Act 1952, s 28, see 9 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 80. For the Finance Act 1967, s 3, see ibid p 432.

Cases referred to in judgment

Burchard v Macfarlane, ex parte Tindall [1891] 2 QB 241, [1891-94] All ER Rep 137, 60 LJQB 587, 65 LT 282, 18 Digest (Repl) 20, 141.

j Burstall v Beyfus (1884) 26 Ch D 35, 53 LJCh 565, 50 LT 542, 18 Digest (Repl) 7, 31.

Carver v Pinto Leite (1871) 7 Ch App 90, 41 LJCh 92, 25 LT 722, 18 Digest (Repl) 14, 86.

Conway v Rimmer [1968] 1 All ER 874, [1968] AC 910, [1968] 2 WLR 998, 112 Sol Jo 191, Digest (Cont Vol C) 299, 1264b.

Crompton (Alfred) Amusement Machines Ltd v Comrs of Customs and Excise (15th July 1971) unreported.

- Dixon v Enoch* (1872) LR 13 Eq 394, 41 LJCh 231, 26 LT 127, 18 Digest (Repl) 184, 1589. a
- Edmondson v Birch & Co Ltd* [1905] 2 KB 523, [1904-7] All ER Rep 996, 74 LJKB 777, 93 LT 462, 18 Digest (Repl) 185, 1609.
- Elder v Carter, ex parte Slide & Spur Gold Mining Co* (1890) 25 QBD 194, 59 LJQB 281, 62 LT 516, 54 JP 692, 18 Digest (Repl) 90, 738.
- Glasgow Corp'n v Central Land Board* 1956 SC (HL) 1, 1956 SLT 41; affg 1955 SC 64, 1955 SLT 155, 16 Digest (Repl) 279, *167.
- Hillman's Airways Ltd v Société Anonyme d'Éditions Aéronautiques Internationales* [1934] 2 KB 356, 103 LJKB 670, 151 LT 451, 18 Digest (Repl) 184, 1590. b
- Hope v Brash* [1897] 2 QB 188, [1895-99] All ER Rep 343, 66 LJQB 653, 76 LT 823, 18 Digest (Repl) 64, 502.
- Murray v Clayton* (1872) LR 15 Eq 115, 42 LJCh 191, 27 LT 644, 18 Digest (Repl) 200, 1728.
- Nobel's Explosives Co Ltd v Jones, Scott & Co* (1881) 17 Ch D 721, on appeal (1882) 8 AC 5, 52 LJCh 339, 48 LT 490, 36 Digest (Repl) 920, 2735. c
- Orr v Diaper* (1876) 4 Ch D 92, 46 LJCh 41, 35 LT 468, 18 Digest (Repl) 6, 17.
- Panthalu v Ramnord Research Laboratories Ltd* [1965] 2 All ER 921, [1966] 2 QB 173, [1965] 3 WLR 682, 109 Sol Jo 496, Digest (Cont Vol B) 265, 6942cb.
- Plymouth Mutual Co-operative & Industrial Society Ltd v Traders' Publishing Assn Ltd* [1906] 1 KB 403, 75 LJKB 259, 94 LT 258, 18 Digest (Repl) 186, 1610. d
- Portugal (Queen of) v Glyn* (1840) 7 Cl & Fin 466, 7 ER 1147, 18 Digest (Repl) 8, 41.
- Saccharin Corp'n Ltd v Chemicals & Drugs Co Ltd* [1900] 2 Ch 556, 69 LJCh 820, 83 LT 206, 17 RPC 612, 18 Digest (Repl) 200, 1727.
- Tournier v National Provincial & Union Bank of England* [1924] 1 KB 461, [1923] All ER Rep 550, 93 LJKB 449, 130 LT 682, 32 Digest (Repl) 80, 1028.
- Upmann v Elkan* (1871) LR 12 Eq 140, on appeal (1871) 7 Ch App 130, 41 LJCh 246, 25 LT 813, 36 JP 36, 46 Digest (Repl) 156, 1014. e
- Upmann v Forester* (1883) 24 Ch D 231, 52 LJCh 946, 49 LT 122, 47 JP 807, 46 Digest (Repl) 157, 1033.

Cases also cited

- Beecham Group Ltd v Bristol Laboratories Ltd* [1967] RPC 406. f
- Crompton (Alfred) Amusement Machines Ltd v Comrs of Customs and Excise* [1971] 2 All ER 843.
- Fraser v Evans* [1969] 1 All ER 8, [1969] 1 QB 349.
- Gartside v Outram* (1856) 26 LJCh 113.
- Grosvenor Hotel, London, Re* [1964] 1 All ER 92, [1964] Ch 464.
- Hargreaves (Joseph) Ltd, Re* [1900] 1 Ch 347.
- Henderson v M'Gown* 1916 SC 821. g
- Hubbard v Vosper* (1971) The Times, 20th November.
- Initial Services Ltd v Putterill* [1967] 3 All ER 145, [1968] 1 QB 396.
- International General Electric Co of New York v Comrs of Customs and Excise* [1962] 2 All ER 398, [1962] Ch 784, [1962] RPC 235.
- Meters Ltd v Metropolitan Gas Meters Ltd* (1911) 104 LT 113, 28 RPC 157. h
- Penn-Texas Corp'n v Murat Anstalt (No 2)* [1964] 2 All ER 594, [1964] 2 QB 647.
- Pfizer Corp'n v Ministry of Health* [1965] 1 All ER 450, [1965] AC 512.
- Palermo, The* [1883] 9 PD 6.
- R v Lewes Justices* [1971] 2 All ER 1126, [1971] 2 WLR 1466.
- Shaw v Kay* [1904] 5 Tax Cas 74.
- Weld-Blundell v Stephens* [1919] 1 KB 520, [1920] AC 596. i

Adjourned summons

By consolidated actions, the plaintiffs, Norwich Pharmacal Co (now known as Morton-Norwich Products Inc), Smith Kline and French Laboratories Ltd and Norwich Pharmacal Co, claimed against the Commissioners of Customs and Excise (1) a declaration that the commissioners were infringing or had infringed and were causing,

- a enabling or assisting and had caused, enabled or assisted others to infringe letters patent no 735,136; (2) a declaration that it was and had at all material times been the commissioners' statutory duty to forfeit all imported furazolidone in their possession, custody or control which was not licensed for importation by the plaintiffs, and (3) an order that the commissioners (a) set forth and disclose to the plaintiffs in the case of each consignment of the furazolidone imported without the licence of the plaintiffs, the names and addresses of the consignors and consignees thereof, the quantity of furazolidone therein and the date thereof, (b) give the plaintiffs full and complete discovery of all documents which were or had been in their possession, custody or control relating to such imported consignment of furazolidone. This was a summons by the plaintiffs in the action seeking production of documents enumerated in Part 3 of Sch I to the commissioners' list of documents dated 7th April 1970. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Anthony Walton QC and Robin Jacob for the plaintiffs.

Sydney Templeman QC, J P Warner and W Bruce Spalding for the commissioners.

Cur adv vult

- d 16th December. GRAHAM J read the following judgment. The issue in this case is whether in all the circumstances the plaintiffs, the proprietors of letters patent no 735,136, are entitled to obtain by discovery from the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, the names and addresses of third parties who have imported a drug called furazolidone into this country in infringement of such letters patent. The matter was fully argued before me and as will be seen hereafter involves the consideration of a number of points some of which I do not find easy to decide and in particular whether there can be special circumstances in which a plaintiff can obtain discovery against a defendant primarily at any rate for the purpose of bringing further actions against other persons who can clearly be shown to have committed wrongs against the plaintiff.

- f The relevant facts are as follows. Patent no 735,136 claims chemical substances falling within a general formula for N-(5-nitro-furyl)-Alkylidene-3 amino-2-oxazolidones and in particular covers the specific compound, known as furazolidone, which is being imported into this country. Furazolidone has the precise chemical formula N-(5-nitro-1 furfurylidene)-3 amino-2 oxazolidone, which is within the above general formula, and is used as a medicament for poultry and is, inter alia, incorporated in feeding stuffs for poultry on a large scale by manufacturers and particularly by large users of such foods. It is, however, the plaintiffs say, very difficult for them to find out by whom this is being done, particularly in the case of large users of the material who import it direct and then incorporate it in their own feeding stuff on their own poultry farms. These facts are dealt with in the affidavit of Mr Pickford dated 28th June 1971.

- h It is well understood that the mere fact that letters patent have been granted and subsist is no guarantee that such letters patent are valid, and that in addition to the issue of validity a patent action also frequently involves the often equally difficult question as to whether infringement is proved or not. The present case is exceptional in these respects in that, by paras 2 and 3 of the re-amended defence in action 1969 N230 and by the corresponding paras 2 and 3 in the defence in action 1970 N 1809, the two actions being consolidated, the commissioners have admitted validity of the letters patent no 735,136 for the purposes of this action, and also that goods described as furazolidone have been imported into the United Kingdom. No samples have been taken or analysed by the commissioners to show, and no suggestion is made, that the goods in question are not in fact furazolidone, i.e the compound having the specified chemical formula, and I consider therefore I must assume for present purposes that such importation, unless licensed, is in the circumstances in infringement of the admittedly valid letters patent. I conclude therefore that the plaintiffs, subject to the possibility that perhaps some consignments might have been licensed by them, have established that actionable torts, contrary to the provisions of the royal grant giving to the plaintiffs their letters patent, are for practical purposes certain to have been committed by some at any rate of such importers. As I have said, the circumstances are exceptional and in the normal case of importation of alleged patented goods, where in the event of an action there would probably be outstanding issues of both validity and infringement to be decided, the position would be quite different and the basic facts constituting the commission of torts by importers would not have been proved.

In the present action the commissioners are themselves sued, the relief asked for being (1) a declaration that they have infringed and caused or enabled the importers to infringe the said letters patent; (2) a declaration that the commissioners are under a duty to forfeit all furazolidone in their possession, custody or control which has not been licensed for importation by the plaintiffs, and (3) orders that the commissioners give to the plaintiffs, inter alia, the names and addresses of the importers in question and all documents relating to such imported furazolidone.

It was made clear however by counsel for the plaintiffs that his clients of course had no quarrel with the commissioners and provided the latter gave the information asked for it was improbable that questions of their infringement or aiding and abetting infringement would be pressed further against them. Although therefore the plaintiffs do not abandon any rights which they may have against the commissioners in respect of their infringement, counsel for the plaintiffs agreed that on one branch of his case, which for reasons which will appear I will call the *Orr v Diaper*¹ argument, the present proceedings can be treated as a pure action for discovery against the commissioners for the production of documents giving information as to the identity of third parties, who are admittedly wrongdoers and against whom the plaintiffs wish and intend to proceed as soon as they find out who they are.

It will be convenient at this stage to make reference to a number of sections in various Acts and to passages in the royal grant of letters patent no 735,136 which are relevant to the present matter.

The appointment and general duties of the commissioners are governed by s 1 of the Customs and Excise Act 1952. They are an authorised department for the purposes of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 and by s 21 (2) of the Patents Act 1949 the Crown, apart from having wide rights of user, is bound equally as is the subject by letters patent. The commissioners by s 1 of the 1952 Act are charged with the duty 'of collecting and accounting for, and otherwise managing, the revenues of customs and excise'. By ss 13, 14 and 17 they can appoint ports, wharves, and transit sheds 'for the deposit of goods imported . . . and not yet cleared from customs charge'. Section 28 enables them to give directions to importers to deliver such particulars as are required in relation to goods imported and appropriate penalties for failure to do so can be enforced. By s 33 regulations relating to the unloading, landing movement and removal of goods may be made.

Section 34 governs duties payable, no dutiable goods being removable by an importer until the appropriate duty is paid. Section 44 deals with forfeiture and states that any goods imported, landed or unloaded contrary to any prohibition or restriction for the time being in force with respect thereto under or by virtue of any enactment shall be liable to forfeiture. A number of examples of goods which are 'prohibited' goods by virtue of various enactments are given in the note to the section in 9 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 91. General provisions in regard to the procedure to be followed in cases of forfeiture are contained in Sch 7. Schedule 6 makes provision for ascertaining the value of imported goods and at para 3 states:

'Where the goods to be valued—(a) are manufactured in accordance with any a patented invention . . . the normal price shall be determined on the assumption that the price covers the right to use the patent . . .'

In carrying out their duties the commissioners by virtue of their powers under the Act and in particular s 28 require importers to fill up forms such as XS107 and C105, which, inter alia, show the names and addresses of such importers and the amount of goods imported. It is these documents, itemised in Part 3 of Sch 1 to the commissioners' list of documents dated 7th April 1970, which the plaintiffs claim should be and the commissioners claim should not be produced. The commissioners' objection is based on two grounds: (a) that the commissioners are precluded by law from disclosing them and (b) that their disclosure would be injurious to the public interest because they contain confidential information about the affairs of persons other than the plaintiffs furnished to the commissioners by such persons pursuant to ss 26, 28 and 29 of the Customs and Excise Act 1952.

c From the royal grant it will be seen that the letters patent were granted as of 27th February 1953, the date of filing the complete specification, and would therefore normally have expired on 26th February 1969. They were however extended, as I was told, under s 24 of the Patents Act 1949 for three years and four months on the grounds of war loss and will therefore expire on 26th June 1972. The words of the royal grant which are material for present purposes are (1) those in the first part of the grant:

e 'that the said patentees by themselves, their agents or licensees and no others may . . . at all times hereafter during the term of years herein mentioned make use exercise and vend the said invention within the United Kingdom . . . and that the said patentees shall have and enjoy the whole profit and advantage from time to time accruing by reason of the said invention during the term of sixteen years from the date hereunder written . . .'

and (2) those in the prohibition:

f ' . . . and to the end that the patentees may have and enjoy the sole use and exercise and the full benefit of the said invention we do . . . command all our subjects . . . that they do not at any time . . . directly or indirectly make use of or put in practice the said invention nor in anywise imitate the same without the consent . . . of the said patentees in writing . . . on pain of incurring such penalties as may be justly inflicted on such offenders for their contempt of this our Royal Command, and of being answerable to the patentees according to law for their damages thereby occasioned.'

g The plaintiffs' argument is founded on two bases. (1) On the authority of such cases as *Orr v Diaper*² and *Upmann v Elkan*³ an action lies against the commissioners for discovery of the names and addresses of the importers in question because they are in possession of information as to an admitted wrongdoing which it is in the public interest should be disclosed, and because they are not mere witnesses but have such an interest in or control over the goods as to make them liable to discovery in the circumstances. The argument goes as far as saying that even if it is agreed that the commissioners have not themselves infringed the patent by making, using, exercising, or vending the invention their interest is such that they and the eventual disposal of the goods for the time being in their hands are likely to be affected by a decree in the action against them and/or in the proposed actions against importers. (2) The commissioners are themselves infringers of the letters patent in question because (i) they are making a profit out of the patent in charging duties on the patented material which are higher than they would be if the goods were not patented. This is based on the words in Sch 6 quoted above and on the words of the grant reserving

2 (1876) 4 Ch D 92

3 (1871) LR 12 Eq 140

